UT cancels library loans for all private colleges

MC senior thesis students and faculty to be most affected Library staff gives advice on how to deal with situation

by Martin Lin
Echo Staff

If you are working on your senior thesis and would like to borrow helpful books and material from UT library - forget it. On August, 15 1991, the University of Tennessee, Knoxville terminated the borrower agreements with all private colleges, including Maryville College.

The "borrower agreement" was a library card issued by the University of Tennessee, which allowed senior thesis students (formerly independent study) and faculty members to check out books from the UT library.

Joan H. Worley, director of Lamar Memorial Library, said that 25 Maryville College seniors and 6 faculty members were using the borrower privileges. In return, 28 students attending the University of Tennessee had access and check-out rights at Maryville College's library, which are now cancelled.

"The reason why the agreement was terminated was, according to UT, the cut in state legislature funds," Worley said.

Worley also said that Maryville College, despite its good relationship with the University of Tennessee, was not the only institution affected by the termination. Tusculum and Lincoln Memorial University were among those private colleges that were denied an extension of the agreement. Public institutions such as Pellissippi and Roane State, however, can still use the borrower card rights.

The borrower card, which was free, can now be purchased at the UT library facilities for $50 per year or $30 for six months.

Christine Nugent, head of reference at Lamar Memorial Library, believes that interlibrary loans will now increase dramatically. Interlibrary loan is not only time-consuming, but also costly.

"Borrower card privileges were free, but interlibrary loans involve time looking for the books, postage and a waiting period. The decision to terminate the agreement might even involve higher costs than before, which were supposed to be avoided," Nugent said.

Maryville College students therefore have the choice of either to purchase the relatively expensive borrower card or to rely on interlibrary loans that could involve a waiting period of at least ten days, according to Nugent.

Both Worley and Nugent suggest that the simplest and cheapest alternative to UT for collecting data and research material for senior theses is to search the library here on campus for information. If that information cannot be found, one could drive to Knoxville and use either the UT library or the public library to copy the material desired.

The decision to terminate the agreement might have been a very costly one for the UT; because there seems to be no possibility in the near future that a new agreement between UT and private colleges will be taken under consideration, senior thesis students will be forced to get their material and data in a way that is inefficient, complicated and costly to UT as well to the private colleges.

Wales exchange program finalized

by Stephen Williams
Echo Staff

Through a series of formal and informal exchanges of faculty, Maryville College and North East Wales Institute (NEWI) of Clwyd, Wales, signed an agreement on Aug. 7, 1991 to begin a faculty and student exchange program.

Concerning the initiation of a program with NEWI, Academic Vice President Dean Boldon said, "Our first contact came because Dr. [Lori] Schmied's husband works at UT and they had had an arrangement with the College of Education of North East Wales Institute. When some of the Wales people came to visit UT, they also came to Maryville, and that was our first meeting."

At this first talk, Boldon said, participants discovered that MC and NEWI actually had more in common than did UT and NEWI.

The agreement "encourages faculty members to participate in the teaching, research and development of the partner college." The agreement goes on to say that it "encourages the exchange of students in identified programmes of study such as English, History, Geography, Environmental Studies, Business Studies, Nursing, Community Studies, and Art."

As far as tuition is concerned, the agreement states, "Tuition will be paid by the student to their home institution as normal. Accommodations, food etc. will be paid by the student to the host institution."

President Richard Ferrin said, "I think the advantages of moving into a different culture are mind opening. And if it is a culture where the

Echo awarded a First Place rating in ACP critiques of newspapers

The Highland Echo for 1990-91 has been awarded a First Class rating in the Associated Collegiate Press and National Scholastic Press Association's national critique of college newspapers for last year. In addition, the judge awarded the Echo two marks of distinction; one for coverage and content, and one for campus leadership. The Echo editors for last year were Travis Crabtree and Skip Heverly.

The Echo was cited for its "strong voice on campus" and for its "aggressiveness" in addressing campus issues. The judge singled out for special commendation the stories on MC students who were called up for military service in the Persian Gulf war and on secret societies on campus. He also commended the balance of the Echo's sports reporting.

"As advisor to the Echo, my sense is that the paper has been wildly erratic in its coverage of campus news over the last couple of years," Dr. Leonard Butts said. "One helpful aspect of being critiqued by this national service is that we can

MACCO has a new director and a new season p. 4

Appalachian Ballet/Dance Studio to leave campus p. 6

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial...

Move of Appalachian Ballet/Dance Studio is a loss for Maryville College and the fine arts on campus

One unfortunate result of having so many historical structures on our campus is the ever-present danger of fire. The mere thought of the "chimney effect" that a fire in the basement or on the first floor of Anderson Hall could create is enough to make one check the fire exits and extinguisher locations each day.

So it is not difficult to sympathize with the concerned parents who reported to the local fire marshal that they thought the Appalachian Ballet/Van Metre Dance Studio's offices and classrooms on the third floor of Fayerweather Hall posed a threat to the instructors and children who train and dance there every day. A fire in that building during the times that the rooms on the third floor are occupied by children would indeed be a tragedy for parents, the dance company and the college.

Because of the lack of available space on our campus and the building renovations underway or about to get underway, the ballet company and dance studio apparently must now leave the campus where they have resided for the past 15 years. At a time when students, faculty, staff and administrators are more concerned than ever about what it means to be a liberal arts college, especially one with a strong Fine Arts department, it seems a shame for Maryville College to lose the residency of an enterprise of the arts that has achieved such acclaim and recognition.

We will miss the status of having an accredited regional ballet company in residency on our campus. We will miss the rehearsals and preparations for each year's major production and for the dance studio's spring recitals. We will miss the contributions that guest dancers have made in teaching on our campus. But most of all we will miss the sounds of young children climbing the stairs in Fayerweather to enrich their lives by participating in an art form that is one of the most beautiful and most natural forms of human expression—dance.

Wales exchange program to benefit students/faculty

The finalization of a student/faculty exchange agreement between Maryville College and North East Wales Institute is applauded by the Echo. Although our students and faculty regularly travel to study and teach in Japan, South Korea, Africa and western Europe, what has been lacking at MC are similar opportunities in Great Britain. With the extensive emphasis placed on the culture, history and literature of the British Isles in our humanities curriculum, this new program should be especially welcomed by our literature and history majors.

That the institute to which we will soon be traveling is in Wales adds a bit of intrigue to the program, for as any native of Wales will be only too happy to tell you, Wales is not England and England is not Wales. The differences will be apparent to anyone familiar with the history of these two countries and to those of you who successfully pursue this new opportunity.

Prodigal Son

by Mark Farmer

College is filled with opportunities like this one where I am able to comment on a variety of things that will hopefully make you stop and go hmmm....

If Madonna is like a virgin then why is she campaigning so hard for AIDS research? If Guns and Roses has no talent then why is their album number one? If you did not write a song or the music then you are not sampling, you are stealing: Ice, Ice, Lazy! If you don't like rap music you're not listening hard enough: "Let's talk about sex!" If disco is making a comeback, how come I can't hear it, and if it is someone get a shotgun and stop it dead in its tracks. "Ring my bell?" PLEASE! With all the world turmoil, don't you think lyrics should include more literacy and depth. Shouldn't music be used for noble campaigns such as Don Henley's fight for Walden Woods or Sting's campaign for the rainforests.

If the cafeteria food sucks so bad, how come everyone has an extra pound or two. If the cafeteria has a budget for improvement, hey! how about cooking something that is not deep fried, greasy or crawling? How about a monthly exterminator? Da! I don't believe wearing racist statements on T-shirts will lessen the problem of racism. If this is a Presbyterian school and we have to call ourselves a Presbyterian school, then how about some Presbyterian dollars?

If you do not believe that drinking occurs on this campus then you must be an overpaid politician who is out of touch with the students. If you like living and you don't mind cutting loose every Friday and Saturday night, wouldn't a Students Against Drunk Driving program be acceptable. Can anyone name an institution that does not have a S.A.D.D. program? I could pretend that students are not going to drink, but I won't and they don't think they should be called alcoholics for having a beer and they shouldn't be ignored if they did. It should not take a tragedy for the administration and the students to get together and discuss a badly needed S.A.D.D. program. I'm sure some kind of compromise can be reached instead of standing behind a rule book. Life is not dictated and college should be used to promote change and fit the needs of all. From what I've seen so far, the staff people are saying "That's just the way it is!" but college is not an absolute place and there must be flexibility in policy or else there is no room for change and improvement.

The football team is winning and helping to push a dark cloud away that has been over this college for far too long. Fall is in the air and soon will be apparent in the leaves. Change is happening all around us, but it's not enough. Too many of us are waiting for things to happen, but no one is gutsy enough to speak out or actually do something. If the cafeteria is not doing what you think it should be, then by god, tell them how you feel. If there is not enough fun stuff going on, march your butt into the student programming office and give them a suggestion. I know everyone is filled with ideas. Don't let administration or anyone tell you how things have to be. Use this time that your parents

by Dr. Scott Brunger

Guest Columnist

Southern humorist Loyal Jones speaking at Maryville College some years ago said, "All Southerners are Baptists—Methodists are Baptists who don't like water, Episcopalians are Baptists who made good investments, Unitarians are Baptists who can't count, and Presbyterians are Baptists who went to college."

He indicates a relationship that needs explanation between college and the Presbyterian church, since Maryville is a Presbyterian college. Presbyterian scholarship originated during the reformation in the writings of John Calvin (Jean Calvin 1509-64), a college-educated theologian from Paris, France, who settled in Geneva, Switzerland. Calvin wrote his "Institutes of the Christian Religion" (1536), whose renaissance theology makes heavy reading today even for seminary students. Calvin's followers spread to England, where they were called Huguenots. In Scotland, John Knox (no relationship to Knoxville) founded the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Scottish Presbyterians brought it to America. Hence the name "Maryville Fighting Scots."

The term "Presbyterian" (which requires a college education to spell correctly) derives from the Greek word for "Church elder." The distinctive organization of the Presbyterian Church is based on representation by church elders and is designed to prevent control by government or by bishops, as in Europe. It became a model for constitutional government in the United States. The Presbytery or regional church council legally owns church property: the congregation does not, as in Baptist practice. The Presbytery does not own Presbyterian colleges, which have their own boards of directors. The covenant between the Presbyterian Church and Maryville College therefore insures our academic freedom.

Presbyterian concern for founding colleges is based on belief that the ministers must obtain an advanced education before ordination. In addition, educated church members can appreciate the minister's sermons. The importance of education led to the founding of 68 Presbyterian colleges in the U.S.A., beginning with Princeton University in 1812, then Maryville College in 1819. As the frontier moved west, more Presbyterian colleges were founded. Overseas, famous Presbyterian colleges were built for the same purpose at the same time, such as the American University of Beirut in Lebanon, and International Christian University in Tokyo, Japan. Maryville College graduates have helped to staff some of these colleges.

Letters to the Editor....

Dear Editor:

In a sense this is a letter from the editor to the editor, but the message is aimed at you—our readers.

The response to this year's first issue of the Echo has been very supportive, and the staff appreciates the comments of those of you who found the issue informative and interesting. We also appreciate the written responses that we have received, but we must remind you that letters to the editor will not be published unless you include your name and student (or faculty or staff) rank. We think that your comments and suggestions are important and need to be heard and hope that you will accommodate us in this matter.

In addition, I wish once again to remind those of you who found the first issue less than rewarding that our staff is comprised primarily of students in the English 217 journalism class. These students, who are working hard at developing basic reporting skills, are going to make mistakes. Please be understanding. If there are factual errors in stories, report them to us and we will publish them under a Corrections or We Stand Corrected heading each week.

Thanks for your support.

MACCO begins season with new conductor

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

The Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra, known as MACCO, has a new artistic director and conductor. Bill Robinson has replaced Paul Thiessen, MACCO's former conductor, who is now musical director of the Opera House in Plowuen, Germany.

Robinson received his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. He also did some earlier course work at Maryville College. Robinson is currently the director of the orchestra program for the Maryville city schools and has lived in Maryville for 13 years.

According to Dr. Dan Taddie, chair of the department of fine arts at Maryville College, Robinson is actively recruiting college and community players for MACCO. MACCO consists of several MC students and faculty of varying ages, many area adults (from community business people to homemakers) and some students from area high schools.

Robinson said that the members of MACCO are "developing a more positive attitude this year." He said he feels that members are encouraged for the upcoming year and that there is more support among the members. Robinson thinks that this positive attitude is derived from the fact that there is such a wide diversity of players. The members learn to "relate with people from different backgrounds."

Robinson encourages any student who is interested in playing with MACCO in future concerts to contact him at the Fine Arts Center.

Taddie is optimistic about

MACCO and Robinson's leadership. "We are pleased with his efforts to invoke a greater number of students and faculty members," Taddie said.

Robinson said that he wants to "encourage college students to attend the concerts and expose themselves to music that they are not familiar with." He said that students should take advantage of the opportunity the college offers to participate in MACCO, whether it be playing in MACCO or attending the concerts. The concerts are free for all Maryville students who show their I.D.'s at the door.

The selected pieces that MACCO will be performing this year vary in their style and content. Robinson feels that a wider variety of music will be more appealing to more types of people. Robinson does not believe in limiting the selected music to only one genre, for variety exposes the listener to music that he or she may be unfamiliar with and gives the members of MACCO a chance to study new horizons.

There are six performances scheduled for 1991-1992.

Oct. 21: "Light Classics" featuring Beethoven's "Triple" Concerto. Featured artists include, former Maryville College student Carol Zinavage, a pianist and keyboardist of the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra; Martha Clifford, violinist and assistant Concert Master for the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra; and Lee Richey, cellist for the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra and Knoxville Chamber Orchestra.

Dec. 9: Featured music is Handel's Messiah, the Christmas portion of the Hallelujah Chorus. The Maryville College Community Chorus, directed by Taddie will be performing.

Feb. 24: The selected music is Handel's Concerto in B flat, Op. 4, No. 6, and Rodrigo's Concierto de Aranjuez. The featured artist is harpist Yolanda Kondonasis.

March 25: The Woody Herman Band will be the featured artists. The music is Big Band. The director is Frank Teberi.

April 13: This performance features area artists. The theme is "A Dogwood Arts Festival Special."

May 4: The featured artist is John Fox, violinist. Fox is a member of the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra and is an adjunct instructor of string instruments at Maryville College.

All concerts will begin at 8 p.m. in Wilson Chapel.

MC Library embarks on automating catalog system

by Matt Osborne
Echo Staff

If you are tired of the old card-catalog dinosaur in Thaw Hall, you'll be happy to know it's going to be extinct.

The MC library is ready to embark on a three-year plan to completely automate and update the library files, replacing the cumbersome and confusing old system with a single database for all the library's needs.

Debbie Nichols, the coordinator of computer services and acquisitions for the library, spoke candidly of the changes you will see. "We want a completely integrated library system that can be used from any terminal on campus," she said, referring to the planned campus network. "You can look up books from Anderson, Sutton, maybe even your dorm room."

The plan, which has not been announced, will be in action soon. This year, Nichols and the library staff will lay the groundwork by finding the automated system that works best for our library. They will select one of several national vendors who specialize in updating libraries. Then the staff will begin to process the catalog, removing "items that don't need to be in the collection, like old science books that are out of date," Nichols said.

"It will take two years before you see anything, and three years before we finally install the system. We'll do the installation during the summer of 1994 to minimize the disruption for students," she said.

But that isn't the only news about the library. There have been many technical changes lately, such as the addition of a FAX machine last Christmas with the help of a grant from the Department of Education. The FAX will help speed up the process of requesting and receiving inter-library loans and making research easier on senior-thesis students.

The library has also been integrated into national databases, such as the BRS After Dark system and OCLC (a bibliographical database), which are remotely located resource-finders. These other resources allow students to call up a great deal of information sources quickly.

GOODBYE MAGIC HANDS. When the MC Library is fully automated, the process of checking out books will be less human but more efficient. photo by Ginny Whitehouse

All these changes make research far easier than it has been under the old system, but they are really not new. Nichols explains that libraries have been updating for more than 20 years, making a profitable business with specialists in the field. "There are companies that can do this far more cheaply than we would by ourselves.

Most of the work will be done by the vendor, including the transition of the catalog to machine-readable records."

Although most of the student body here today won't be able to use the new automated system, finishing your term papers, essays and research is getting easier all the time at the library.

Mountain Challenge increases opportunities for developing physical skills/community service

by Michelle Hall
Echo staff

This year Mountain Challenge will not be just a Sunday afternoon affair. The events are now scheduled for Sunday mornings, Saturday afternoons and some weekday afternoons.

Bruce Guillaume, life enrichment center director, divides Mountain Challenge, a program in its sixth year, into two distinct programs: the traditional ongoing program of trips open to all Maryville College students, and the program that serves freshman Inquiry classes. Each Inquiry class must do five trips during the fall semester. Add this to the non-Inquiry trips, and the schedule is tight, according to Guillaume.

"We have ended up trying to crowd everything into Sunday afternoons, a time frame that didn't work well," Guillaume said. "This fall we experimented with moving times around to try and use other days, just to try to make the program better," he added.

J. P. Johnson, senior Mountain Challenge staff member, said that any schedule can work if students and staff are willing to make it work.

"There is no ideal day or time for it; people just need to make time for it," Johnson said.

Once students get used to the new schedule, Guillaume predicts the program will move along smoothly. He expects to see growth in areas such as white-water kayaking and rock climbing as people become more interested in these sports. With the addition of the climbing wall in the Alumni Gym last year and the regular kayak roll sessions being held in the Physical Education building this year, students have plenty of opportunity to learn the skills necessary to face a mountainside or white water.

Another change Guillaume hopes to see is a growth in student interest in Mountain Challenge. He stressed that as long as it is not for Inquiry, a credit hour can be earned in Mountain Challenge simply by completing five trips in one year. A student does not have to pre-register, he said. After five trips, one credit hour is awarded.

"It is important," Guillaume said, "for students to realize that Inquiry is the exception in that, usually, you don't have to do all five trips in one semester."

Guillaume said he would also like to see more students interested in becoming Mountain Challenge student staff members. Students can apply for positions when openings are posted in the Spring.

Johnson noted that there has been a considerable growth in staff members this year. Comparing to his freshman year, when there was only one student staff member, this year there are seven, he said.

"You don't have to be an outdoorsman when you get here," Johnson said. "You get qualified for Mountain Challenge staff by going on Mountain Challenge trips."

With growth in student interest and additional student staff members, Guillaume foresees the program expanding to provide more service to the community. Already, he said, Inquiry groups do a service project as a part of the Mountain Challenge program. Usually these projects take an environmental approach to community service in the form of trail or camp-site clean-ups. One group cleaned up the ropes course. Another is working with the Aluminum Company of America (ALCOA) to make a tape about environmental initiatives in Blount County.

Guillaume would like to take service one step further. Mountain Challenge trips, he said, can be used to help abused children, chemically dependent people and people from dysfunctional families.

"I would like to see us to the point where we have skilled students who have been through the program consistently give something back to the community," he said.

Both Guillaume and Johnson remarked on the uniqueness of the Mountain Challenge program. It is unusual, they said, for a college the size of MC to have an outdoor program as strong as Mountain Challenge. The proximity of the college to the Great Smoky Mountains and area lakes makes this possible.

"Not just anywhere can you go hiking, kayaking and rock climbing and get credit for it," Johnson said. He also pointed out that such a unique program is attractive to prospective students.

Guillaume added, "The outdoors are interesting to a lot of people, and there are a lot of outdoor athletes out there."

Freshman English can be fun: some advice on how to survive it

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

The key to surviving freshman English is attitude, according to the teachers of that course. For many freshman students, English is a course to be gotten through and forgotten.

According to the guidelines set up by the English Department for English 115, 40 percent of the final grade is based on grammar and punctuation, areas that students were supposed to have mastered in high school.

"We all feel we know how to use our language," said David Powell, instructor of English. "But we all learn bad habits."

"Language is a matter of habits, and bad habits are hard to break," added Dr. Sam Overstreet, assistant professor of English. The difficulty that students have in dealing with freshman English, according to Overstreet and Powell, results from these bad habits and the effort required in breaking them.

Powell gave three other reasons why students sometimes do not enjoy freshman English: It is not their major—they don't like it—they feel they don't need it; they have difficulty manipulating their language; they have not paid enough attention to what they have already been taught.

Dr. Leonard Butts, a composition instructor and the coordinator of the upper division writing program in English, adds that it is completely illogical for a student to shirk responsibility for less-than-adequate language skills by saying "I'm just not very good at English." "How in the world do you expect to function in life if you cannot communicate effectively in your native language," Butts said. "It's all a matter of taking responsibility. If you're willing to give someone else the responsibility of communicating what you think and feel—whether it's a secretary or a lawyer or a politician, then you've surrendered one of the basic freedoms that our country is founded upon, not to mention what separates us from the beasts in the field."

Teachers of freshman composition gave the following advice on getting through freshman English.

—Take the material seriously. What you do today can have long term effects on your tomorrow. Some students have returned to tell of faster advancement in their chosen fields because of what they learned about writing in freshman English.

—Become familiar with your language. Learn new words and what they mean.

—Learn to process the language, how to use new words, how to make use of old words in new ways.

—Study, Study, Study. Study in constant small doses daily rather than in large lumps.

—Find out what your teacher wants and learn to get along with him or her.

—Persuade yourself to get interested in writing. You cannot write good essays if you are not interested in what you write.

—Set aside a time when you do nothing but write. Write letters, write in a journal, write your assignments. You can use this time to

College ends 15 years with Appalachian Ballet, Van Metre Dance

by Lance Kloserman
Echo Staff

For 15 years the Van Metre School of Dance and the Appalachian Ballet Company have been located on the Maryville College campus. The third floor of Fayerweather Hall has been the home of the Appalachian Ballet Company through its 20th season.

"It's been wonderful. I've loved every moment of it," said Cheryl Van Metre, owner of the Van Metre School of Dance and artistic director of the ballet company. "The college has been very special to me."

Van Metre uses the past tense to refer to her association with the college because the dance studio and the company have been asked to leave their offices and studio in Fayerweather due to a violation of fire codes.

"The building is old and it doesn't meet the standards of safety set by the local fire marshal," said Andy McCall, plant director. "We're talking about little children up there. The fire marshal received complaints from some of the parents of the children and was more or less forced to come over and do an inspection."

Because the building has only one exit stairwell from the second and third floors, it does not meet the safety requirements for use by a large group. In contrast, the offices of the college's evening program and career planning and placement on the second floor of Fayerweather are up to code because so few people occupy the offices.

"The college wants us to stay on campus, but we need ground-level facilities and I don't know what they might have here."

McCall was quoted in an earlier story in the Maryville-Alcoa Daily Times as saying that because of the planned renovation of Fayerweather, the studio and ballet company would have had to move off of campus any way but not as soon as the recent fire inspection has required.

Dancers, such as these, will no longer be a part of MC campus life after Oct. 31.

The dance school has graduated many students who have been successful in their dance careers. Robert March now performs with the International Ballet Company, and Steven Yhasz is a regular on Broadway.

The Appalachian Ballet Company, a separate enterprise from the school of dance, was begun as the Maryville-Alcoa Civic Ballet in 1972. It has since become a regional ballet company. Its members perform all over the nation.

Two years ago the company joined the South Eastern Regional Ballet Association. After being judged by 18 different company directors, the company was admitted at the highest rank for two years in a row. The company has won the Choreographic Award both years.

The most recent guest teacher on our campus is ballerina Rosin Bena from the Peninsula Ballet Theater in California. She is choreographing "Swan Lake," which will be performed by the Appalachian Ballet Company on March 21 and 22.

The group has a motto from John 3:17-18: "If a rich person sees his brother in need, yet he closes his heart against his brother, how can he claim that he loves God? My children, our love should not be just words and talks; it must be true love, which shows itself in action."

In the summer, between June 7-21, fifteen members of Habitat went on a trip to Nicaragua. The company was divided into two groups. One group went to the north and the other went to a small town near Managua, the capital, to begin building houses. In all, seven latrines, and seven concrete floors were built. In addition, the floors of seven houses were leveled.

The way Habitat works is by fundraising to buy materials. For this particular trip, fundraising was done by selling T-shirts, candies, having a Faculty Talent Show, and a variety of other things.

Once the volunteers travel to a particular place to work on housing, the people for whom the houses are being built have to help make the houses. There is a mortgage which has to be paid before the people can live in it. The only difference between a bank loan and Habitat is that the latter does not charge interest. For example, in Knoxville the number of hours that has to be put in by people who are going to live in the house is 500.

Among the fifteen volunteers who went to Nicaragua, ten were from M.C. and five from Knoxville. Out of the ten, Keriann Tervdov and Vivian North have graduated; and Masafumi Nishi has gone back to Japan. The following members of the company were asked to comment on their experiences:

Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly: "In two weeks, there is a limited amount (of time) to learn about a place."

Rita Moore: "Flushing the toilet was interesting because a bucket was used for throwing away toilet paper." Kevin Sumner: "I thought it was a neat experience. I plan to go again next summer." Dave Perez: "The society is nothing like our own!" Gayle Bieber: "Next time I will take more shoes and clothes for the people because they have so little." Beth Stevenson: "Next time I will brush up on Spanish." For further information contact Sumner, box 2571.

It was a cold and bleak day, yet there was one place that a person could go where it was warm and interesting. That place was the Proffit Dining Room at noon on Tuesday, Sept. 24, where Reports from the Field was held.

The speakers were seniors Kerri L. Poore and Heather J. Newell. The topic was France. Poore and Newell were foreign exchange students in France last semester.

Both speakers were enthusiastic about sharing their experiences.

They were on an exchange program through the University of New York at Rockport. There were 13 girls in the program. Poore and Newell stated that because of the Persian Gulf war, many of the students that had planned to go cancelled their trips.

Although the war was going on, Newell and Poore were not exposed to it that much. "It was almost like we were living in another world" Poore stated. They did not have a t.v. and seldom had money to buy newspapers, so it was not a major issue for them.

Newell told the audience that while they were visiting London, bomb threats on the public transportation system became quite a nuisance. Newell explained that the threats were irritating because most of them were not serious, but all threats had to be dealt with using the same precautions.

Poore and Newell were taking a political science class which enabled them to travel to London and visit the House of Lords and the House of Commons. They also had an opportunity to travel to Berlin to take an extra class during Spring Break. Other places they visited were Geneva, Normandy, Amsterdam and Northern Germany. Poore said that her best experience was the class she took in Germany. She explained the shock and empathy she felt when she was exposed to the aftermath of the Berlin Wall coming down.

Although both students were scheduled to return to America after their finals, only Poore came home this summer. Newell stayed in France and worked as a nanny for two families. Newell returned on the Sept. 1 to finish her degree.

The speakers then proceeded to show a slide presentation of their trip and answer questions for the audience. When someone in the audience asked if they would change any of the circumstances, Poore answered that she would have taken her classes in French and travelled more. Newell answered by saying that she would have stayed with a French family instead of an American roommate during the semester to gain a better experience of the culture. Both Poore and Newell recommend such trips for anyone who has the opportunity to go.

MC Player Profile: Kelly Moore

by Sam Waycaster
Echo Staff

With their record at 2 and 1, quarterback Kelly Moore is very confident about the progress of this year's Maryville College Scots football team.

Moore, a senior with a major in business, has always been very athletic. He likes visiting the beach, which is no surprise since his hometown is Tampa, Fla. He also enjoys volleyball, swimming, weight lifting and, of course, football.

Upon graduation, Moore plans to use his degree in business in order to pursue a position in the marketing department with a major corporation. After having established himself in the business community, he plans to open a business of his own.

Moore's outlook on the remainder of this football season is very positive. "Right now, I feel real good about the rest of the season," Moore said. He added that "Everybody has a positive attitude: the coaches are working us real hard and everybody is staying focused." He also admitted that the team

Newcomers contribute to strength of MC Soccer

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

The Maryville College soccer team is heading into the second half of its season. At the time of this writing, the men's team is 6-2-1, and the women's team is 5-1. According to coach Pepe Fernandez, "Both teams are ahead of where they were last year." Playoffs are in sight, but both teams must do well the rest of the season, Fernandez said.

Two contributing factors to the Scots' success are both new faces to MC: Freshman student Jennifer Wells and junior Todd Tomkins, a transfer from Western Kentucky.

Wells comes to MC via Harrison, Ohio. "She's done real well and can play anywhere on the field," Fernandez said.

"When we need scoring we put her in for scoring, when we need defense she is a great defensive player. She's been a really nice surprise."

When asked how she liked MC, Wells replied, "I love it here, everybody is so friendly."

Wells also has her sights on the playoffs and said that the Lady Scots may have a chance because they have a "very quick team and everyone really works well together."

Wells is planning a double major in business and political science. She is involved in Young Life and student programming, and she loves to shop.

The Scots' leading scorer is forward Todd Tomkins. So far this year he has had seven goals and two assists.

"Todd fits into our team real well," Fernandez said. "His unselfishness has helped him and the team."

Tomkins is a business major. He does play some tennis, but said soccer and studies take up the majority of his time. When asked what he thought the rest of the season holds for the Scots, he said, "We have a good chance to go to the playoffs if we play up to our potential."

Lady Scots are confident that teamwork will pay off

by Lee Fersner
Echo Staff

The Lady Scots volleyball team has a positive outlook for the remainder of the season even though their present record is 7-6. The team, coached by Kandis Schram and assisted by Leslie Henry, consists of 13 players:

The team is young and has only three returning players. "But we are a very quick team," Hensley said. "We hustle a lot. When there is a ball with no chance of hitting it, we do!"

Hensley commented on teammates Boop, Dewitt and Godsy. "Nikki 'Superman' Boop can get a ball when no one else can, with any body part she has to use."

Dewitt is "the leader, she always gets everyone to stay together. Tonya has been hitting tremendously well." "Last but definitely not loudest," Hensley joked, is Godsy. "She's the quiet player. She can hit and block very well."

"With each game we are working more together as a team," Hensley said. "By the end of the season we should be at our peak, ready for tournament time."

Schram said, "I am not surprised at our record, but I am really pleased with the team."

Hensley said that the goal is "to get together and work as a team, then we should be unbeatable."

Ferrin added that this program was designed to create an opportunity for students to get outside of their own backgrounds.

NEWI's curriculum is similar to MC's and it has programming for foreign students. NEWI is located in the county of Clwyd and was established in 1975 in a merger of three schools.

is staying focused." He also admitted that the team was not letting its sudden success go to their heads, which he said he thinks is very important.

In Moore's opinion, the biggest difference between last year and this year is the positive attitudes of each of the team members. "Everybody believes we can have a winning season," he said. Moore also said that the team appreciates all of the support they have been receiving lately and he would like to see that support grow. He said he feels this support to be a contributing factor in the past two wins. The ultimate goal of this season is to end with a 9-1 record. "We're taking it week by week...personally, I would like to make this the best season Maryville has had in a while...I would like to contribute to this programs getting back to where it needs to be and I think this year we've got a chance." He added with confidence. "I don't want to miss the opportunity while Maryville College still has a chance [to have a winning season]."

After being recruited by Coach Shannon O'Brien during his senior year in high school, Moore has spent the past 4 years playing for the Scots. Three of those years he has been quarterback of the team. Moore stated that over the past 4 years on the team there had been many disappointments and times he felt like giving up. "It would have been real easy to quit when times were bad...just give up altogether and become a full time student...but I stuck it out and it kind of makes me see that [when] you stick something out and keep on believing, it really can happen. I'm glad I finally got some results this year," he said.

When asked what advice he would like to offer to his fellow classmates, Moore replied, "catch the spirit." Whether he was speaking of football or life in general, Kelly Moore seems to have caught everything he needs to make this one of the most successful seasons in Maryville College football history.

imitate the different styles you have been learning or reading about in class.

—Practice on problem points until you have conquered them. Practice on the assignments not given for class work. Practice does improve your abilities.

—Take the time to do the readings. The essays for reading are intended to be thought provokers for your own essays.

—Use the rules of grammar as a means, not an end, to free up your imagination.

—Revise. Careful revision makes a better paper.

—Make corrections in the Harbrace folders. Grammar is to serve essays, and good grammar makes your paper easier to read.

—Learn outlining. It is a good way to organize.

—Work on developing the insight to see the relationships that exist between all of your courses. Often these connections are not emphasized by your instructors, but they do exist.

The teachers of freshman English all agree that English can be fun if you learn to do it well.

Piano recital offered at Maryville College

The piano duo of Koreker and Fast will present a guest faculty duo piano recital at Maryville College on Monday, Oct. 7, at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center on the college campus. There is no charge for admission and the general public is invited.

The program will include Bach's "Prelude in D minor," followed by "Variations on a Theme by Beethoven," Opus 35, by Saint-Saens; and "Variations on a Theme of Paganini" by Lutoslawski. After intermission the duo will play selections from the "Suite Champetre"; "Suite No. 2," Opus 17, by Rachmaninoff; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; and "Malaguena."

Fast and Kroecker have been on a concert tour of Japan this summer, where they gave a concert at Phillips University-Japan in Uji, Kyoto Prefecture, the cultural center of Japan.

Dr. Charlotte Kroecker has chaired the fine arts division at Phillips since 1985 and recently was promoted to full professor of music. She is a frequent adjudicator, performer and clinician for piano festivals and workshops.

Barbara Fast is a piano faculty member at the Detroit Center for Creative Studies. She was formerly on the piano faculty at Hesston College in Kansas and now is in a doctoral program at the University of Michigan.

The piano duo has performed together since the early 1980's when both were in central Kansas.

Dormitory/commuter competitions head list of Homecoming festivities

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Homecoming is here and the dorms are gearing up for the dorm competitions that are part of the Maryville College Homecoming tradition.

The competition consists of the Sandwich Building competition, the Anything Goes competition, the Banner competition and the Dorm Decoration contest. Copeland, Davis, Gamble, Lloyd and Pearsons Halls will all be competing. Cathy Pounders, Pearsons Hall Resident Director (RD) and coordinator of student activities at Maryville College, said that the commuters are invited to participate in the competition also. The competition is on Oct. 24.

The Sandwich Building competition consists of one team representing each dorm and one team representing the commuters. According to Pounders, one half of the team is blindfolded and the other half of the team coaches them while they make the sandwich. The team that makes the best sandwich wins.

The Anything Goes competition is like crazy Olympics. Pounders explained that there will be a team which represents each dorm and one team to represent the commuters. Each team will have six people and there will be four games.

The Banner competition consists of each of the teams designing a banner for the Homecoming football game. These banners will be judged along with the Homecoming decorations.

In the Dorm Decoration contest, residents in each dorm will decorate the front lobby of their building with decorations that correspond with the theme of Homecoming, which is "It's a dog-eat-dog world and we're on top." Commuters will decorate the front lobby in Fayerweather Hall. The decorated lobbies will then be judged by a panel of judges from 2-3 p.m. Students are asked not to follow the judges when they are visiting the buildings. Students should wait until 3 p.m. to see the decorated lobbies. Points will be deducted from individual dorms or competing commuters who fail to comply with these rules. The criteria for judging is based on originality, creativity, school spirit, neatness and obvious time spent on the project.

Each competition is worth a certain number of points. The dorm or commuter team that earns the most points wins the dorm competition. The Sandwich Building contest is worth 15 points for first place, 10 points for second place and 5 points for third place. The Anything Goes is worth 3 points for first place, 2 points for second place, and 1 point for third place. The Banner and

Drama ministry to add to campus worship

Mission Players begin small, aim high

by Matt Osborne
Echo Staff

There is a new dramatic force on campus, bringing a message to our campus worship services. The Mission Players, a small group of theatre students will present their first scene "The Potluck Supper" on Oct. 22.

Jill Bergeron, the new instructor in theatre and the organizer of the Mission Players, will help Heather Conoway and Julie Walker to perform a comic piece about sharing. Afterwards Chaplain Stephen Nickle will direct the meditations of the audience towards the message in the scene.

Dramatic ministry is nothing new to Jill Bergeron; she originated and directed a group called The Trinity Players while living in Georgia. "We did children's theatre, dinner theatre, worship services and reader's theatre," Bergeron said. "We toured to other churches, arts festivals, community theatres, and nursing homes," she added. The group lasted three years under Bergeron, beginning with 15 people and eventually growing to more than 100 before she moved to Maryville.

The Mission Players begin with even fewer participants than The Trinity Players. "Although many expressed an interest to me, we had a small number actually come to the [organizational] meeting," she said. Presently there are four students involved in production. Besides Conoway and Walker, the group includes junior Charlotte Borderieux and freshman Darrien Thomson, who will present "The Innkeeper and His Wife," a short scene about the innkeeper whose manger is the site of the birth of Christ, on Dec. 10.

Bergeron sees the small beginnings as hopeful. "I will use anyone who is interested - students, faculty, and staff, as well as folks from the community," and everyone who shows up will get a part. Although now there are only two short scenes to be presented, she is already planning the Spring calendar. The group will present a wide variety of pieces, including comic and dramatic plays, monologues and short scenes.

"We will focus on providing drama for our campus service," Bergeron said. "But if interest and membership grows, we will tour area churches."

Although the focus of the group is on Christian values, they will not be doing strictly Christian drama; they will also do secular scenes with a spiritual message.

Bergeron's own role in the group is as an organizer, coordinator, and helper, but Bergeron said that "the scenes are pretty much up to the participants. I will lend advice and guidance, but at this time I don't plan to direct in the conventional sense." She said that she welcomes

Homecoming 1991:

A Time for Honoring One of Our Own

Homecoming. For most of us who inhabit the campus each day, it is but another event in the swirl of the calendar that moves us rapidly through the academic year. Yes, there are parties, contests and an air of excitement surrounding a winning football team, but Homecoming for most of us does not contain the sweeping mix of emotions that it must for those alumni who truly are "coming home." And because this year's Homecoming has been combined with Parents' Day and because many of our parents are alums, there undoubtedly will be more of that melancholy nostalgic air that pervades all such returns to the places where dreams were dreamed and futures planned.

We are lucky at Maryville College because many of our alums come home each day and we have the opportunity to share our experiences at the college with them. One such alum is Boydson H. Baird, class of '37, who can often be spotted at college athletic events.

Following this year's Homecoming football game, Maryville College will honor Coach Baird, who was athletics director and at one time or another coach of most of the major sports at the college from 1959-1976. In addition to the gathering in Baird's honor after the game, Baird is also to be given a more lasting tribute. At the instigation of former players, including our current athletics director Randy Lambert, and as part of the college's Vision 1994 Capital Campaign, the three gymnasiums in the Physical Education building are to be renovated and named for Coach Baird.

When he came to MC in 1959 to direct the college's athletic programs and to teach physical education, Coach Baird had the dubious distinction of following in the footsteps of the legendary Lombe Honaker. Yet follow he did. In four years, he took a football team that finished 1-7 to an 8-1 record and a victory over Millsaps College in the Huntsville, Ala., Rocket Bowl. Under Baird's tutelage, basketball players Tom Morris and Bill Padgett set individual game and career scoring records. And Baird's 1974 Scots baseball team was invited to the NCAA National Tournament and finished third.

Yet according to those who knew him when he served the college in these many capacities, Coach Baird remained a man of integrity, more interested in what his players were doing in the classroom than in their performances on the field, and more concerned that they be prepared to enter the job market and become responsible citizens than that they score more points than their opponents in what are, after all, only athletic games.

Coach Baird's game was always education—athletic, academic, and moral. And if you speak to him one of those times when you see him on campus supporting the college in its various endeavors, athletic and otherwise, you will find out for yourself why each Maryville College Homecoming is so important to us all.

How to spell "Presbyterian," Part II

by Dr. Scott Brunger

During the past three years I as an economist had the opportunity to participate along with sixty other scholars in a project studying the Presbyterian Church in the twentieth century. The results appear in a seven-volume series edited by Mulder, Coalter, and Weeks, published by Westminster/John Knox Press, and available in the MC library. The following is a brief summary of what I learned from other's research and my own.

As was stated in Part I, Presbyterian beliefs began with John Calvin in the sixteenth century, before the rise of constitutional government or the Industrial Revolution. In The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism Max Weber, the famous German sociologist, found that Calvin's belief that each Christian has a vocation or Call from God to serve through daily work resulted in building up modern businesses as a way of glorifying God. Weber's ideas were criticized by historians who point out that the "Protestant Work Ethic" has been imitated by work ethics in other rapidly industrializing countries, most recently as Japanese or Korean work ethics. Theologians point out that Calvin's idea of work is always under God's control and does not mean that a free market would lead to divine justice. Instead, all of human life stands under God's judgement and humans must pay close attention to God's Will. In business that means producing efficiently, pricing fairly and using profits not for personal pleasure but to expand the business and to help those in need. Similarity in other professions the same attention to God's Will might bring success as a by-product, though glorifying God is the purpose of the activity.

These fundamental Presbyterian beliefs have been expressed in different ways in the history of the church. This study includes a volume on "The Confessional Mosaic" which covers changes in preaching from authoritarian sermons to counseling, changes in theological training that include insights from many parts of the world, changes in hymns from reliance on psalms alone to diversified hymn books including many singing traditions, changes in devotional materials, and changes in social action from Sabbath see Presbyterian, p. 8

Campus computer network will form electronic community

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

In the beginning...the computerization of Maryville College started with a small, five-station network in the admissions office. Presently, most of the administrative offices have been computerized and MC has computer labs in Sutton Science Center and Anderson Hall.

"Ultimately, we are looking toward computerizing the library, including the card catalog and making that available to faculty, students and administration. Sometime beyond that we are looking to opening up the network to students in other areas than the labs. For instance, access from home or dorm," said Leon Binder, MC's director of data systems.

This computerization process is on a six-year schedule. According to Binder, MC is ahead of schedule and has moved at a surprising rate considering that progress is based on the availability of funds.

Costs have been approximately $360,000, so far. The remaining cost is estimated roughly at another $180,000 for the computerization of the library, including the card catalog.

Funding has come from several sources. ALCOA, The Teagle Foundation and many private donors and companies. An additional $25,000 was earned by MC for a research project for the Navy.

What does this mean for MC? It means better communication between faculty, students and the administration.

For students, it means that ultimately you will be able to sit in your dorm room and pull up the card catalog for research papers or any other information you might need, although you will still have to do library leg work to pull those materials from the shelves and read them.

It also means that you will have the use of electronic mail (E-mail). Need to get a message to a professor or another student? Type it into E-mail. Not only can you leave the message, but you can look on your computer and see if the message has been received.

With a computer on the network in each dorm room, you will be able to write an English paper or finish your calculus homework and send it via E-mail to your professor. You will also be able to keep a complete set of notes for each class in your computer and when you need to refer to them simply call up that file. This is a plus for anyone facing senior comps.

For senior thesis students this system will simplify the research process. Bibliographies can be collected and pulled up when needed.

The computer can also provide relief.

"Many students enjoy the games. I quite often will take a break from work at 2 a.m. I can't get my wife

MC's non-credit program offers variety of courses

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff

For those of you who have wondered about the relationship between the continuing education program and the non-credit program at MC, wonder no longer.

"The non-credit part of MC's curriculum has been separate from the credit part of the evening program for about a year now," said Lew Rudisill, director of conferences and special programs.

But the non-credit classes are meant to be for the campus community as well as for the outside community, she added.

The courses offered are divided among three areas: Leisure Learning, Workshops, Recreation and Exercise.

Among the leisure courses being offered this semester are cooking classes for adults and children. The time of the class varies and so does the menu. These two courses are taught by Chef Joseph Lowery.

A new course offered is Music in the Church. The course, which is now underway, is being taught by Dr. James Bloy, professor of music at MC, and includes visits to churches, with attention given to the study of music in the church and its surroundings.

Other courses offered under Leisure Learning are: horsemanship/riding, business writing skills and beginning bridge.

Recreation and Exercise offers a variety of courses, such as karate, adult aqua aerobics, swimming for beginners and swimming at an intermediate level. Swimming courses for toddlers six months to four years and children five years and older are also available, and there is an adult scuba diving course.

Workshop courses include "Dreams: A Way to Wholeness," taught by Dr. Eileen Riordan, adjunct instructor of biology at MC.

Coming up in January are courses in beginning Japanese, poetry of the Highlands and the foods of Scotland. The last two courses will culminate in a festive evening in celebration of the life and works of Robert Burns.

Rudisill explains. "The big thing going on in January will be a celebration on Jan. 25 called 'Robert Burns Night.' Bagpipes and a festive dinner will add to the atmosphere. Dave Powell, instructor of English at MC, is

A revised Appalachian Studies to be offered in spring term at MC

by Christen Anderson
Echo Staff

The MC Sociology Department announces a revamped version of Sociology 222: Sociology of Appalachian Culture.

Taught by Dr. Susan Ambler, assistant professor of sociology, Soc. 222, focuses on the culture, character and development of Southern Appalachia, including the area's arts and crafts, music and dance, language, education and social institutions.

In preparation for teaching the course, Ambler recently completed a James Still Fellowship at the University of Kentucky. The fellowship included extensive research of the Mountain Women's Exchange, an organization that aids rural women.

Ambler worked with the exchange for a year and a half, developing a college program for women who lack the necessary funds for education. As a result of Ambler's work, at least 40 rural women have enrolled in college courses, and about 10 have graduated.

While working with the exchange, Ambler interviewed many Appalachian women. From these interviews and her personal experience with the Mountain Women's Exchange, she compiled the necessary background for Soc. 222.

The purpose of the class is to help students develop a conception of Appalachia, debunk Appalachian stereotypes and realize the social changes that have occurred in Appalachia. Students who are Appalachian natives will be able to gain more of an idea of how they fit into the area, while students from out of state will learn how Appalachia developed to its present point.

This class will include guest speakers from the area, an oral history project where students will interview Southern natives, field trips to various museums and preservations and a volunteer project.

The volunteer project involves student observation and work with the social problems in Appalachia.

Sociology 222 will be taught as an elective in the spring.

Backstage with Alan Reihl:

"What I can't find, beg, borrow or buy, I have to build."

by SamWaycaster

Time, skill, and an unlimited amount of determination are all contributing factors to the job of Alan Reihl, technical director of the Maryville College theatre department.

Reihl began working with Maryville College in 1989. "It all started with an ad I saw," Reihl said of his position. "Dean Boldon convinced the college board of directors to fund a full-time staffed technical director." He added, "I approach my position as a professional theatre technician."

As technical director, Reihl directs the technical elements of the play. He not only designs and builds the set, but is also responsible for creating costumes and props. "My training in theatrical production is in three dimensional scenery," he said. "What I can't find, beg, borrow or buy, I have to build. I do everything that the playscript calls for since it all must come from the author's intent."

Reihl said that his focus is to introduce students to the theatrical arts. "We're trying to get the students more involved," he said. "When the students come in here, of course I have to direct them in what to do."

Reihl also stated that he wanted his training of the students to be a learning experience. "Here at the college my job extends way beyond just directing. It includes a lot of doing. I must work along with the students in order to show, as well as teach the proper elements of stagecraft," he said. As well as sets, props and costumes, Reihl also must direct the electronic aspects of the theatre, including lighting and sound.

Reihl is currently working on the set for the fall production. It consists of four rooms, two of which are visible to the audience. The set also consists of seven working doors. Reihl stated that, in his technical career here at the college, this is his most intricate design.

Reihl's credits in technical direction and design for Maryville College include: "Bus Stop," "The Rimers of Eldrich," "Scapino!," "Stop the World, I Want to get Off" and the upcoming "Lend Me a Tenor."

The Maryville College theatre department's fall production "Lend Me a Tenor," a comedy by Ken Ludwig, will be presented Nov. 1-2, at 8 p.m.

Cheerleaders put time and effort into boosting school spirit

by Lee Fersner

The members are working very hard as a squad to have a great season. Practice is three nights a week for an average of two hours each night. Practices consist of jump lines, planning for future ballgames, practicing cheers and dance routines and working on gymnastic skills. Time is also set aside for making signs for upcoming sporting events. "We have come a long way and there is a lot more we want to improve on, but we have a good squad to work with," Richardson said.

The cheerleaders say that they are really excited about a new addition to the squad, Jason Reed, who has volunteered his time to be the Scots' mascot. "Jason is very school spirited and supportive of the squad. He will be a great spirit booster for the crowd, but he is still looking for a Scottish kilt to wear at the ball games," Boring said. One fundraiser for the cheerleaders is the sale of spirit shakers for $1.50 each to the crowd at ballgames. When all of the shakers are sold, the money will go toward further training or practice uniforms. Other fundraisers are being planned for a later time in the season.

The cheerleaders' Homecoming plans include a spirit bonfire before the Homecoming ballgame and a special Homecoming pep rally to recognize all the senior athletes. At the pep rally the graduating senior athletes will be presented with gifts from the cheerleaders.

For basketball season, the cheerleaders are planning on performing dance routines during half-times. Boring said, "We are really excited about the dance aspect of cheerleading."

When Boring was asked to summarize her opinion of the squad, she said, "We have been devoting a lot of time toward polishing our routines and working on gymnastic and jump skills. The most important thing is that we are having fun. We are focusing on boosting the school spirit and getting the crowd involved."

Yes, Virginia, there really was a Marching Band once upon a time at dear old MC, as these 1979 Chilhowean photo reproductions attest.

"There are no plans for a marching band. We do not have the resources to do it the right way; we would rather not do it at all than do it halfway."

MC Band marches only in memory

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

Picture this: a Saturday afternoon, orange and garnet shimmering in the sun, a stadium full of students, faculty and administration together in one great lump of fans. The Scots are winning, the crowd is cheering, the cheerleaders are bouncing and the band, in traditional Scottish plaid, is marching to the tune of bagpipes. Somehow the picture is complete - the sunlight, the winning team, the tradition - all the elements are there, or are they?

Now go back and picture the same scene again, but this time visualize it with no band. Perhaps you had not been able to put your finger on exactly what has been missing at the football games at MC. Now you know.

Why did the music stop? Dr. James Bloy, who was chair of the department of fine arts when the college fielded a marching band, would not comment on the history of the band or why it ceased to exist in the early 1980s.

But Dr. Daniel Taddie, current chair of the department, has some practical explanations for why it cannot be reformed.

"A marching band requires a lot of people playing the right distribution of instruments and we simply do not have enough people," Taddie said. Although Taddie indicated that a marching band would require approximately 65 players, yearbook photos of the band in the late 1970s show but 20-30 players decked out in the traditional Scots colors.

In addition to significant numbers of players, a marching band would require that these players invest a significant amount of time practicing, both playing and marching, Taddie said. He also pointed out that a band program would cost a tremendous amount of money.

The traditional bagpipe player cannot be provided, Taddie said, because there is not a single student attending MC now who plays the bagpipes.

"There are no plans for a marching band," Taddie said. "We do not have the resources to do it the right way; we would rather not do it at all than do it halfway."

Despite limited resources and time, the music department does offer several options for students: an orchestra, a jazz band, a pep band, and chamber wind ensembles (small woodwind group instrumentals), Taddie said.

Last year, the MC jazz band, organized by former adjunct instructor of music Paul Theissen and with students Larry Ervin, Greg Marmon and Dave Yokom, regularly entertained

Homecoming:

by Mary Rose Slaughter

The Homecoming activities planned for Oct. 20-27 are varied and many. They include something for everyone: the students, faculty, staff, alumni, parents and the community at large. A schedule of events can be picked up in the Student Development Office in Fayerweather and in the Alumni Office in Willard House.

Dancing, soccer, football and contests are just a few events that will begin on Sunday, Oct. 20. "We are trying to emphasize school spirit through friendly competition," said Cathy Pounders, director of student activities, "Homecoming is an opportune time to bring this out."

There are many opportunities to participate. A talent revue, Parents Association meeting, volleyball, soccer and football games, a barbecue and a chance to participate in a Mountain Challenge course are among the activities available.

"We are just hoping for a day when a lot of people are here with a festive atmosphere," said Jane Overbey,

Dancing, soccer, football, contests, parents' meeting, barbecue, Mt. Challenge, book sale, worship, Old Harp Sing director of alumni and parent programs.

Dorms will be decorated on Sunday for homecoming. Prizes will be awarded for the best decor. The cheerleaders will sponsor a pep rally and bonfire Friday. Another contest students might be interested in is sandwich building on Thursday.

A street dance on Monday, a luau with mocktails on Wednesday and the homecoming dance after at Ruby Anne's after the game on Saturday will give students a chance to party.

For the athletic, there will be

Frisbee throwing and volleyball at the luau, soccer to watch and to play, "Crazy Olympic" games with the six-member teams chosen by each resident director and a commuter representative and a powder puff football game with the teams chosen by each class president.

Parents, students and faculty will all be able to participate in the Coffee House/Talent Revue on Friday night in Lloyd lobby. It will be an open-microphone event and all are invited to bring their talent and enthusiasm.

The community will be present on Saturday at the Harvest Crafts Fair co-sponsored by the Maryville College Women's Club and the Blount County Alumni Association Chapter, the library book sale and the tribute to Boydson Baird among other events.

"These activities will bring in the community at large that ordinarily would not come to Homecoming," Overbey said.

MC Player Profile:

Thomas Stephens

by Stephen Williams
Echo Staff

The Maryville College Fighting Scots are off to their best start in 10 years with a record of 5-1. With the emergence of such players as Kelly Moore and Scoval Blevins, the Scots have embarked on a "train ride" of success.

But along with Blevins and Moore there is a player who is not so formidable in size or stature, but who is equally effective. That player is Thomas Stephens, and his skills are speed and agility. This season Stephens has electrified Scots fans with his deadly running ability and his cat-quick agility at the positions of tailback and as a punt returner.

Stephens is a native of Lawrenceburg, Tenn., and a junior at MC. As a youth, Stephens acquired his interest in football by watching Joe Namath play for the New York Jets. By the time he was a senior in high school, he was playing quarterback.

"Because Joe (Namath) to me was such a competitor, I like to take on that competitive attitude," Stephens said.

Football is not Stephens' only love. He is inclined toward baseball, basketball, wrestling, track, and other sports such as volleyball and softball.

Thomas Stephens outraces the Centre secondary and scores in an MC victory earlier this season.

After college Stephens plans to pursue a job in his major, physical education.

"I'd like to get a job in coaching," he said.

In comparison to the teams of previous seasons, this year's Scots are a closer-knit, more unified group.

"I think we finally have seniors that want to win," Stephens declared. "Their leadership qualities are better than what we have had in the past.

"We're a pretty close team, we stick together. I believe that is a key to our success this season," he added.

Stephens tries not to let the accolades of his fans or the pressures of school affect his play, and he plans to show Scots fans more of his abilities.

As of this writing, the MC Volleyballers had defeated St. Andrews 15-12, 15-13, but lost to King College 15-13, 5-15, 10-15 at home on Oct. 15.

any aspiring actors, designers and even directors. While she will probably select and cast most of the scenes they do, she said she will consider all suggestions.

The spark that created the Mission Players came when Bergeron met Nickle at the faculty retreat before the start of the semester. Bergeron volunteered to serve on the Worship Committee and suggested the Mission Players as her contribution.

Nickle was very supportive. "I told her to go ahead and create the group, and I found two open slots for her group to perform," he said. "I will have nothing to do with the production, but I will use the themes as the basis for the service meditations."

Both Bergeron and Nickle hope they will succeed in increasing the spiritual awareness of the student body and community.

Interested participants may contact Bergeron or attend another organizational meeting, which will be held on Dec. 4 in Isaac's.

Presbyterian

observance to support for refugees.

The emphasis on education in Presbyterian teaching produces expected results. Three-quarters of adult Presbyterians have attended college. The majority work in "white collar" jobs, while in the U.S. population only one-quarter do. Family incomes are well above average—18% in excess of $75,000, while only 5% the general population obtains that amount. Less than 10% of Presbyterians earn under $15,000 (Those poor graduate students!), when over one-quarter of the U.S. population survives on that amount.

The study also analyzes the mainstream Protestant "decline." It shows that loss of members in the Presbyterian church comes as middle class Christians fail to reproduce enough children, who also leave for college and delay marriage, thus drifting away from church while still claiming to be Christians. The period between leaving one's family of origin and establishing one's own family becomes the crucial time to maintain identification with the church. Campus ministry, young adult ministry and mass media are ways to sustain young people during their transition period.

My own study is a financial history of the northern and southern Presbyterian churches from 1923 to 1983. I find that growth of personal income raises church contributions by two cents out of each dollar earned, a rise of one-percent in the inflation rate subtracts about one-third of a million dollars from total church contributions, and a loss of a member diminished contributions by $160 in the southern Presbyterian and $80 in the northern Presbyterian church. I also find a drop in contributions from congregations to the national church whenever it does a bureaucratic reorganization. Since the Presbyterian church underwent frequent reorganizations on the model of American business firms, the result was frequent loss of contact between congregations and the national staff.

Presbyterians are well educated because their church supports higher education as a religious priority. Maryville college was founded very early to train ministers, teachers, and educated congregations to work to glorify God.

HC

this year consists of freshman Amy Lee, sophomore Jenni McCafferty, juniors (a tie) Molly Hewa and Janna McCall, and seniors Jen Carter, Janet Gehlbach, Jannette Judy, Amanda Kenning and Heather Smith.

The Parents Association will hold a meeting Saturday to introduce Overbey as the new director of alumni and parent programs and to discuss what they as parents can do to make MC better for their sons and daughters. The activities will end on Sunday, Oct. 27, with worship in the chapel, brunch in front of Pearsons and an Old Harp Sing at 2 p.m.

The Echo regrets the following errors in previous issues:

--Dena Godsey's name was misspelled.

--Beth Steverson's name was misspelled (it is not Stevenson, a common mistake that not only the Echo has made).

--Larry Ervin's name is not spelled Irving or Irvin or Erwin or Ewing but ERVIN. The Echo appreciates his indulgence in letting us misspell his name as a lesson for our apprentice journalists. His reaction was what we expected.

Dorms

Dorm Decorations competitions are each worth 25 points for first place, 20 points for second place, and 15 points for third place.

The dorm or commuter team with the most earned points will be announced at the Coffee House in Lloyd Hall on Oct 25. There will be a prize for the dorm or team with the most points.

Mark Cate, Copeland Hall R.D. explained that the dorm competition "is good because it builds a sense of community and unification between residents and that is what Homecoming is all about." Cate also said that Copeland hall plans to participate in all events and plans to win all events.

Jack Scott, a junior, is a Copeland Hall staff assistant and a football player. He said that students in the dorms should get involved with the competitions because "Homecoming is about more than athletic events - it's a chance for all students to get involved in the competitive atmosphere." Michael 'Gooch' Goodrich, a senior, and Copeland Hall resident assistant said that Copeland plans to "destroy Davis no matter what the cost." Davis Hall was the winner of the dorm competition last year.

Pounders said that the competition is a "good chance to bring everyone together. Most residents in Pearsons are seniors and it is an opportunity for them to support their school one last time."

Although all the competitors are concerned with winning the competition, all share the attitude that competition is a positive aspect of Homecoming. Leigh Anne Cofer, Lloyd Hall R.D., said that "we have great ideas and great people working very hard and our goal is to create the best Homecoming atmosphere and to make it possible to build the community not only in Lloyd but campus wide."

Non-credit

coordinating the poetry class and Chef Lowery will coordinate the food."

Rudisill further explains how the courses work: "An average class costs from $30 - $50, depending on the class, which is much less than regular tuition.

"Another important thing to express is that we are open to ideas and if several people come to me with ideas for classes like flower arrangement or basket weaving, then I would be happy to find an instructor and arrange for a class time," Rudisill said.

How does she find instructors?

Rudisill said that they are "generally from the community. I have a lot of resourceful people on campus, such as in Dean Boldon's Office."

Computer

up to play chess, but my computer will play with me," Binder jokes.

For faculty and administration, computerization will provide better communication.

"Electronic mail beats playing phone tag," Binder said.

"We are also in the process of bringing 20 professors onto the administrative network primarily to give them access to student records for advising," he added.

The computer provides financial applications and packaging for the business and financial aid offices.

The registrar's office uses the system for student records and transcripts.

If this sounds like a lot, it is. The network will connect Willard House, Sutton Science, Fine Arts, Anderson, Fayerweather, Bartlett, Thaw and eventually the P.E. building and dorms.

There will be three main divisions of the network: faculty, administration and students. Each of these will have a free exchange of E-mail, but there will be restricted access to college records on a need-to-know basis. For example, students will be able to communicate with professors and obtain information through the card catalog, but will not be able to access student records. Faculty will not be able to access pay scales and employee records, and the administrative offices will not be able to access the faculty files concerning student records.

What keeps all this information straight?

"The bridge or 'Electronic Police,'" Binder said.

"The bridge is hardware that allows free communication between students, faculty and administration, but also acts a physical barrier to prevent access to certain records," Binder explained.

Students who are enrolled in the college will begin to see the benefits perhaps as early as next Spring, when many of the faculty may begin doing preregistration on the network.

Band

to great fan response at the football games.

In the future, Taddie said he would like to see the pep band playing at athletic events. Ultimately the pep band would be student-run and -directed, with a faculty member acting only as an advisor, he added.

Other plans for the future include a concert band made up of college and community players. The band will be organized by Dr. Larry Smithee, assistant professor of music, Taddie said. Smithee was unavailable for comment due to an illness in his family.

Taddie made the point that "we do our best to provide some music for some events, but it's just not possible to do so for all." He added that the goal of the music department is to provide a wide variety of options for music students. He said he feels that the music department is fulfilling that goal in that it offers a "diverse musical program."

Change in campus drug policy catches students unaware

Drug-free Schools and Communities Act cited as mandate for severity*

by Michelle Hall
& Robin Morris
Echo Staff

The recent suspension of two Maryville College students for violation of the campus drug policy has caused students to take a second look at their Student Handbook.

Last year, any student who violated the drug policy was subject to the following minimum punishment:

Immediate relinquishment of the drug and paraphernalia to a College Staff member who will turn it over to the Director of Campus Life. The student may be offered an Administrative Option by the Residence Director depending upon the severity of the violation. The student will attend two drug education sessions designated to give students insight into drug abuse and addiction.

This year a student is subject to the following minimum punishment:

Immediate relinquishment of the drug and paraphernalia to a College Staff member who will turn it over to the Director of Campus Life. The student will be subject to suspension from the College and prosecution under the law.

Repeated violations will result in: Irrevocable dismissal from the College and prosecution under the law.

According to Marcia Gibson, director of campus life at MC, the changes in the handbook are due to the Drug-free Schools and Communities Act, a policy adopted by the U.S. Department of Education.

"According to this act, the possession, use, distribution, manufacture or sale of drugs or paraphernalia associated with the use of drugs is prohibited," Gibson said.

"The department of education requires our college to comply to all of its terms and if we fail to comply, all of our federal assistance including Financial Aid such as PELL Grants, work study and federally-backed student loans will face termination," Gibson explained.

Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, stated that the minimum punishment in the former policy fell far below the federally-recommended minimum punishment for the first drug offense, which is expulsion from the college without the possibility of reinstatement, and legal prosecution.

Gibson also explained that the college does not have the authority to dispute or question laws having to do with the use and possession of alcohol or drugs and must abide by these laws.

Wyatt echoed Gibson's concern. "A drug-free campus is an absolute; it is not a mandate to provide a campus that is reasonably free of see Drug, p. 8

1990-91 DRUG ABUSE POLICY VIOLATIONS PROCEDURES AND SANCTIONS

Any violation of College's drug policy will subject the student to the following minimum disciplinary procedures and sanctions:

The student will be required to immediately relinquish the drug and paraphernalia to a College Staff member who will turn it over to the Director of Campus Life.

The student may be offered an Administrative Option by the Residence Director depending upon the severity of the violation. The student will attend two drug education sessions designated to give students insight into drug abuse and addiction.

Repeat violations of the drug abuse policy will result in immediate suspension from the College and referral to a local agency for assessment and treatment.

1991-92

Procedures And Sanctions

All cases involving violations of the drug policy are heard by the Vice President for Student Development or his/her designee. Any violation of the drug policy will subject the student to the following minimum disciplinary procedures and sanctions:

1. The student will be required to immediately relinquish the drug and paraphernalia to a College staff member who will turn it over to the Director of Campus Life.

2. The first offense will subject the student to suspension from the College and prosecution under the law.

3. Repeated violations of the drug abuse policy will result in irrevocable dismissal from the College and prosecution under the law.

A comparison of the 1990-91 and 1991-92 Student Handbooks reveals a tougher handling of drug offenses.

Mellon faculty/student research approved

by Sam Waycaster
Echo Staff

Beginning this year, faculty research with student involvement will no longer be a plan but a reality, due to the Mellon Faculty/Student Research Grants.

The Mellon Grant program originated through the Appalachian College Association which is made up of 11 colleges. Of these 11 colleges, each was to submit proposals pertaining to their specifications of the program. Dr. Dean Boldon, academic vice president and dean of the faculty, took the proposals and wrote the basis of the grant to involve the participation of the humanities and social sciences.

Boldon suggested that the purpose of the program is to encourage the students and faculty to become more involved in the process of research.

"The program must show how the students and faculty will be more involved in the research process," he said. He also added that the program was designed to provide students and faculty with advanced application to fields of research.

"The activities involved might be the writing of a senior thesis as a basis for extracurricular research or any other activities by which students may receive credit from the college," he said.

He also said that the program was designed to make students more aware of the depth of research involved within the senior thesis.

"They should become more involved with the senior thesis and this program will give them the opportunity to do so," he said.

Boldon stressed the fact that many more Maryville College students are moving beyond simply an undergraduate degree and focusing on graduate studies as well. "This will give them the opportunity to become more involved in the research process so that they will be more successful at reaching their goals," he added. "I believe that this will be a really good and exciting opportunity for faculty and students."

Dr. Susan Schneibel, associate professor of English and Mellon Selection Committee member, stated that "of the colleges involved, there are two representatives which form the selection committee."

She added that each of the teams see Mellon, p. 6

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial...

A broken rhythm leads to a search for blame

There is an ebb and flow to college life. All of us become caught up in it when we join this community.

Usually this wave-like movement takes the form of a gentle pulling and pushing: daily classes begin and end, students move into and out of buildings, assignments are given and turned in, games are played and won or lost. The ebb and flow becomes cyclical. A rhythm develops. We are comfortable.

And when this motion is broken, tension results. Rumors fly, explanations are sought, factions develop. We are ill-at-ease.

A few weeks ago, two students were dismissed from the college for a violation of the campus drug policy, and the rhythm of the fall semester for many of us was broken.

The natural reaction to such a break is a struggle to try and reestablish the lost, comforting motion. One faction wants to forgive and forget, another to pretend the break never happened, still another to make it a lesson of responsibility. All are asking the same question: how do we bring back the comforting ebb and flow, the sense that we are a community and not myriad factions?

Just as there are physical laws that govern the movement of the tides and the circadian rhythms in each of us, so the community to which we belong operates according to established processes. We come to expect these processes (laws seems too harsh a word and too martial for our campus) to aid in the creation of this rhythm into which we fall each year.

For these processes to work and for the rhythm to be created, however, all of us must fulfill certain obligations. When we give responsibility for governance to elected student representatives, we should expect them to act promptly and in our best interests. When a rule must be changed, we should expect the college to notify us promptly and with clear explanation. When we act carelessly and without concern for ourselves and for others, we should expect to suffer the consequences. When mistakes are made, we should expect to be able to talk openly and truthfully to one another about what has happened.

Two of us are missing today. And if there is error in the process by which we live together as a community, then all of us - together - are to blame.

Congratulations to the Scots

All of the Maryville College fall athletic teams are to be congratulated on such fine seasons. The football, volleyball and soccer teams all have .500 or better records, and the women's soccer team appears headed for the playoffs. The entire college appreciates the efforts of these student-athletes and their coaching staffs.

Of monsters, aliens and life as we know it

Prodigal Son

by Mark Farmer

Most of us will not have to worry about children just yet, but when we are parents what advice will we give? On Halloween and during the year when our children are afraid of those things that go bump in the night, how will we explain about monsters and the unknown? We can look into our children's eyes and tell them that there are no such things as monsters and Martians, but in our hearts we will know the truth! Unfortunately, the questions that our children will ask us are the ones we will still be trying to figure out for ourselves.

"Daddy, are there such things as monsters?"

You can tell your kid "NO!", but when you watch the news at night, a couple tosses their newborn baby into a dumpster, a dictator spills countless gallons of oil into the environment and a man in Texas shoots over 20 people in the name of gun control.

"Mommy, are there really such things as U.F.O.'s?"

Will you tell your daughter that they exist only in the movies or will you tell her of the experiences you've had staring into the night? Will you point out that countless books, television specials and people suggest that there is in fact life of some kind that visits us time and time again. Will you be bold enough to tell your child that the government we put so much trust in will not trust us enough to tell us about U.F.O.'s that they know of because they don't think we can handle it? How will you explain Hanger 18, Project Bluebook, and Whitley Streiber's claims that he has been abducted by visitors and that his story supports tales of the same occurrence from people all over the world who have never met?

For some reason we are used to hiding emotion and hushing up things that people just don't like to talk about. It is too many circumstances like this that leave more questions for our youth to unravel. I think the scariest thing that we will have to explain to our children is that we don't have all the answers, but we keep trying.

If we try to explain about the creatures in the woods, about the spacemen, and about the strange events of the world, then maybe we can teach our children how to use their imaginations to help the world and not just ourselves. Maybe our children will move beyond us and try and help the universe that is not as small as we might wish. How long can we be conceited enough to think we are the only ones in the universe?

I just don't believe life is about money and power, and if life is about things like love and God, then what does all this other stuff mean? In the movie "Joe vs. the Volcano," an actress says, "Almost everyone is asleep, but a few people who are awake walk around in amazement at all that they see." Maybe we are all asleep and can't open ourselves up to all the things that are out there because we are so caught up in our daily pursuit of money, sex and power.

When we do tell our kids to say their prayers at night, maybe we should ask them to pray for answers about this other stuff that most people don't want to talk about. I figure if there is life on other planets and if they are going to visit, as a very wise professor of mine once told me, "We better get our act together!" This theory applies to those who believe in God and to those who believe in this other stuff too....

The following documents are the letter of petition concerning the recent dismissal of two students for violation of campus drug policy and Dr. Sue Wyatt's reply (story on p. 1).

To Sue Wyatt, Richard Ferrin, and Dean Boldon:

We are writing in response to the recent dismissal of two Maryville College students _____ and _____. We have noted and are concerned with certain discrepancies in the judgements made by the administration and in the policy changes of the Student Handbook.

The handbook of last semester states that students found in violation of drug policies would be subject to probation and counseling through Crawford House. This is dramatically different from what we are witnessing now. Why were these policies changed? Who initiated these changes? Why was the Student Senate not consulted for this policy change the way they were when the administration desired changes in the alcohol policy? If this is not a case for the Student Senate, then what is?

Where was the Judicial Board during these proceedings? Why was the case taken directly before Dr. Wyatt instead of through normal judiciary channels? What is the normal judiciary process? Where is it written down? Why was Dr. Wyatt asked to make a snap character judgement for two students whom she does not know?

In this case, both students are first offenders. In particular, _____ has had no prior disciplinary encounters with the college and is a junior in good standing, as well as a consistently good student. It would seem that when an academically sound student suddenly is found to be in a serious disciplinary situation, the college would be interested in helping that student. Isn't that what Crawford House and student counseling are there for? Suspension of the students does not seem likely to benefit either the students or the college. Both students have expressed a desire to participate in counseling. If allowed to stay, they would likely continue to be worthy members of our college community.

Students choose Maryville College so they can study in a caring environment where they will be treated and respected as individuals. This incident makes it clear that student welfare is not the college's priority. College is a confusing time for many young people. If our institution suspends students at the first sign of a problem it neglects the welfare of its students and ultimately itself.

With these points in mind we are requesting that the administration reconsider the dismissal of these students. Also we ask that the policies of the judicial process be immediately presented to the student body so that in the future, the rights of the students and the proper procedure will be clear!

Your response and support will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

Signed by 39 students.

To all persons concerned:

I have received the petition signed by you and others on behalf of _____ and _____. Your concern is appreciated and the issues you have raised merit a response. While I cannot divulge confidential details of these two cases, I can respond to your general concerns regarding who hears judicial cases and how policies are made.

Maryville College does not ask students to adjudicate cases that may result in prosecution under the law or separation from the College. Not only does such action strain student relations, it also subjects student board members to litigation. Given the potential liability, I am charged with hearing all such cases. The campus judicial process allows at least one appeal in all cases to provide an additional opportunity for students to be heard. You will find information on judicial processes and student rights on pages 29-35 of the Maryville College Student Handbook. Please feel free to call on me if you have questions or suggestions regarding these policies.

The Student Handbook underwent annual revision during the summer months. The Drug Abuse Policy was revised to accurately reflect the realities of our past experience and to respond to federal regulations mandating a drug-free campus. Failure to respond would result in the loss of all federal financial aid to the College and our students. As in all previous years, I extended to your Student Senate leadership the opportunity to involve the Senate in the revision process but no response was received. This fall I invited Student Senate to participate in the development of a campus covenant that could involve a major revision of the Handbook by students. Senate has indicated an interest in this proposal and I am hopeful that progress will be made on this during the coming year.

Thank you for raising these issues and expressing your concern. I am available to talk with you further about these as well as other concerns you may have. Please come by my office or call me at 981-8214 and we can set aside the necessary time. In addition, Dr. Ferrin and I will be conducting a series of listening sessions in residence halls throughout the fall semester. This will provide additional opportunities for discussing these issues. Please watch for notices and plan to participate as your schedule permits.

Sincerely,

Sue K. Wyatt

Letters to the Editor...

Reader cites delays in financial aid approval

To the Editor,

I am writing in regards to a problem that I feel needs to be addressed, and that problem is the delay of time it takes the Financial Aid Department of this college to process a Student Loan application. I personally applied for my loan back in April 1991 for my 1991-92 fall, spring loan. The reason I applied 4 and a half months early was to eliminate having to stand in that cumbersome Financial Aid line during registration. To much of my surprise, the day of registration I found out that my promptness in applying early was not rewarded because there was no check waiting for me. The next thing I knew was that I had to wait 45 minutes in that Financial Aid line to determine what was the problem with my loan. Once I reached the person behind the table, I questioned that person and asked what was the reason for the delay on my loan. Her response was "You must have applied late." Later on I had found out that my loan application had not been processed until Sept. 2nd. So it is evident that my application stood still for 4 and a half months in the Financial Aid Office.

I am not writing this letter to blame any single person in the Financial Aid Office, but to make the "leader" of this college aware of this situation, and realize the lack of manpower, and the lack of communication between the Financial Aid Office and the Business Office that is occurring. There is a need for a central computerized system. I know of other students who had the same problem the day of registration. Some of us are just now recovering our checks, but what about 7 weeks ago when many of us needed that money to pay for books, rent, or even utility bills?

Financing a college education is the hardest problem in achieving that degree, and if more hassles and problems are created by the college in the financing process, that would mean we, the college students pay the college to create unnecessary hassles and problems, and one knows that the academic stress of obtaining a college degree is hard enough to bear. I thank you the editor for taking the time to read this and hope that you will print this to make Maryville College a better place for the future.

Sincerely,

Richard A. Marczi, junior

Work study/financial aid problems created by job turnovers, changes in procedures

by Matt Osborne
& Stephen Williams
Echo Staff

At the beginning of the 1991-92 school year, students who had applied for Maryville College work-study came back to school expecting to work, only to discover that no job was available for them.

They were advised either to wait until something turned up or to speak to various faculty and staff in charge of supervising work-study budgets in order to find out if a job was available.

Contrary to rumor, this problem occurred not because of a lack of money but because of a change in policy which caused confusion that carried over into the beginning of this semester.

"Last spring five or six people met to talk about work study and how we could get it better organized," said Jane Richardson, the new head of the work-study program. "And, they came up with a new way of identifying students with jobs. And it was all on paper and had never been tried before."

According to Richardson, the new policy said that students were not to be hired unless they had been authorized. The confusion came about because the change occurred at the very end of the spring semester and because work study supervisors were used to hiring students first and then finding out if they were qualified for work-study.

"Many of the jobs that came in were for students who were not packaged for work-study; they were institutional work-study," Richardson said. "So I began to realize what was happening and put the word out to stop hiring people that weren't coming through me."

Richardson added that most students were confused about the difference between packaged work-study and institutional work study. "I've had students, faculty and staff come to me and say 'well, you don't have any more positions for work-study, so just put me on institutional.' Work study is institutional and federal money. It's one big package. Most of the money, now,

Richardson guaranteed that this problem would not happen again. In addition, she told of her present plans to expand the work-study program off campus.

"We would try to place students in jobs that are in line with what they explore," she said. The program will try to find jobs within walking distance of campus.

Richardson's office will be moving to Fayerweather Hall on Nov. 1st.

There were also many rumors at the start of the semester that the financial aid office was in disarray due to the resignation of the director of financial aid Dan Perkins this summer.

According to the campus grapevine, checks were being lost, records were being kept by memory and some loans were signed for by students who did not want them. But Cheryl Frow, acting director of financial aid, vigorously denies such rumors.

"We've never lost a check," Frow said. But she did explain that some of them had been processed later than usual. "After the loan applications are turned in to the bank, it takes 10 - 15 days to process the loan; this year took a little longer because East Tennessee Bank had a new computer system and new personnel."

She then explained the system her office uses to process the checks when they arrive, pointing out that they are immediately opened, photocopied and labeled before being rushed down to the business office.

Frow also dispelled rumors about bad bookkeeping, indicating that late approval of some student loans this year was due to the lateness of students turning in complete aid forms. In addition, the process of approving aid for athletes is always difficult, she said.

"The coaches have to gather all this information from the student-athletes, and they come in with it right before registration, leaving a pile of documents to be sorted through," Frow said.

"Of course, it has also been a little harder this year because Dan Perkins left us right after registration. Maryville College didn't have a one to replace him right away."

This left Frow and a part-time employee doing the financial packages late at night, with Perkins often being called in consultation.

She added that the best way students to avoid such delays is to turn their financial aid forms in early and completely.

"We have so many people who always have one page missing, we're waiting for a copy of the parents' income tax form or something," Frow said. She added that getting all the paperwork done as soon as possible means early approval.

Frow said she would be glad to help any students with problems with their aid packages.

"We're here to help the students," she said.

The financial aid office will also be helped by the arrival of Ver Jones, the new director of financial aid, on Nov. 1st.

AIDS: do you know as much about it as you think?

by Sandy Akins
Echo Contributor

You probably think you know all about AIDS, right?

After all, the only way you can get AIDS is through unprotected sexual contact, blood and body fluids or through sharing contaminated needles. And you certainly do not have to worry about any of these, right? Wrong.

Did you know that not all condoms are made of latex rubber?

Did you know that condoms made of lamb skin are porous and therefore useless in protecting you from any sexually-transmitted disease?

Did you know that certain lubricants break down the fibers of condoms and render them worthless as a means of protection?

Hmmm. Guess you didn't know everything.

The Life Enrichment Council Task Force invites you to attend a very special program on Nov. 6 at 7 p.m. in the Fine Arts Auditorium. The program is entitled "AIDS....It can't happen to me, but it did."

A group of dynamic guest speakers from AIDS Response Knoxville, who themselves are HIV positive, will discuss real issues and facts concerning AIDS.

and be available at the end of the program for any questions that you might have.

This program promises to be nothing like any other program offered by the LEC Task Force this year.

We hope you can join us to learn more about this tragic and deadly disease.

Mellon

on the committee is comprised of one representative from the humanities and one representative from the social sciences. Schneibel is Maryville College's humanities representative and Boldon is representative for the social sciences.

Schneibel said that the committee had met once to discuss and draw up guidelines for the proposal. They will meet again in February to review the applications and decide on those who will receive funding.

Schneibel suggested that she believes the program to be a wonderful opportunity for faculty research with student involvement, due primarily to the fact that there are not that many opportunities for research in the fields of humanities and social sciences.

"The purpose of the money is to encourage faculty and student cooperative research," she said. She also said that the faculty will hope to see increased interest in students toward graduate studies and toward the teaching profession. "This is a wonderful way to encourage research and interest in an academic career," she added.

The guidelines of the program set forth by the selection committee are as follows:

1. Only faculty in the areas of humanities and social sciences are eligible to apply.

2. Research projects must involve significant participation of one or more students as preference will be given to projects involving students who will be returning to the college for one or more additional years of study.

3. Grants might include the cost of a student's time on the project, travel, equipment, computer use or other costs.

4. Research grants would be for one year only but would be eligible for resubmission.

5. Grants would normally be up to $6,000 with additional funding if the project involved more than two students, extensive travel or other unusual costs.

6. Grants would be available for research projects which take place in the summer of 1992 or the 1992-93 academic year.

7. Topics for consideration should show evidence of unusual faculty/student research opportunities.

8. Grant proposals must be in the office of the Appalachian College Association at Warren Wilson College by January 17, 1992.

Applications and guidelines were sent to the chief academic officers of the Appalachian College Association by Oct. 15, 1991. Completed proposals should include the application form, a resume of the faculty member conducting the research, some information concerning student involvement, a budget for the project, and the endorsements of the chief academic officer and the president of the institution.

The research grants committee will receive copies of the application by Jan. 24, 1992. The selection committee will meet on Tuesday, Feb. 4, 1992 at Emory & Henry College to review applications and select recipients of the grants.

Applicants will be notified of the decision on their projects by Feb. 10, 1992. Faculty and students receiving grants should notify the Appalachian College Association no later than Feb. 17, 1992, if they wish to accept.

Drug

drugs," Wyatt stated.

One of the students who was suspended, though he said he now understands the reasoning and the legislation behind the changes, still sees room for improvement of the judicial process within federal guidelines. He said he felt that "every case should go before a judicial board. The defendants ought to have the right to a judicial hearing, even if it's a board of only faculty and administrators." He added that students should also have the right to present character witnesses.

According to Wyatt, who alone decides such cases, students do have the option of at least one appeal "to provide an additional opportunity for students to be heard."

As far as cases going before a student judicial board, Wyatt said that the college "does not ask students to adjudicate cases that may result in prosecution under the law or separation from the college."

Wyatt also added that she had never suspended a student from the college unless he or she had a record of a previous violation of college rules or laws either on or off campus.

Both students said that they did not receive a copy of the new handbook prior to the incident.

Students have the opportunity to receive the handbook through check-ins, residence hall meetings and registration, and they are always available for pick up in the student development office.

Gibson said that it is "my responsibility to make the handbook available" but that "it is the responsibility of the students to get their own copies."

The suspension of the two students not only brought attention to the policy changes but it also raised the issue of Student Senate participation in handbook revision.

A letter signed by 39 students who were concerned about this issue was sent to Dr. Richard Ferrin, president of MC; Dr. Dean Boldon, academic vice president and dean of faculty; and Wyatt.

Wyatt responded that she extends the opportunity to the senate annually to help with the revision during the summer months.

Roger Howdyshehl, student senate president, said that it is difficult for the senate to help when most of the senators go home during the summer.

The clarity of the handbook and its policies was another concern expressed in the letter that the students wrote.

In response to the alleged ambiguity of the handbook, Ferrin said that such ambiguity allows more flexibility and a less punitive system.

"We have a natural tendency to want to make things black and white," Ferrin said. "The more mature approach is to realize that we can never make enough rules to cover every situation. One of the things a liberal arts education ought to do is to take the student from 'black and white,' 'either or' thinking to recognizing human relationships. The policies around student life ought to reflect that. Some people think that's vague, but I think the alternative reads like a dinner menu—this costs you this.

"Before we made this change in the handbook, we entertained some very specific systems, and they were very strait-jacketed and punitive," he added.

One solution that the senate is entertaining is a revision of the handbook based on a covenant or code of honor that governs every aspect of student life.

Howdyshehl said that "they [college administrators] are giving the chance to make changes in the handbook; we need to do it."

MC international student killed, six others injured in auto accident

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Merce Villarroya-Ralolf, 22, an international student from Barcelona, Spain, was fatally injured in a car accident last Monday. The wreck occurred at approximately 11 p.m. on Foothills Parkway.

Villarroya-Ralolf went to the parkway with seven of her international friends to view the stars. She had just completed a five-week course at the Maryville College Center for English Language Learning (CELL). She had already packed her belongings for her return to Barcelona Tuesday.

According to a story in the Maryville/Alcoa Daily Times last Wednesday, the students were coming back from Look Rock when the driver of a Ford Bronco, Satoshiro Fujii, 23, lost control of the vehicle while swerving to miss a small animal, believed to be a skunk.

The Bronco went onto the shoulder of the road and Fujii got it back onto the road at a 90-degree angle. He then lost control and the vehicle rolled onto its side tearing off the fiberglass top.

Six of the eight passengers, including Villarroya-Ralolf, were thrown from the vehicle. She had been sitting behind the driver.

Other students in the accident were Hikoyuki Hirobe, 22, Mika Sensui, 22, Rosa Martin, 23, Masako Ueno, 18, Carlos Useche, 24 and Toshinori Itoi, 29.

Villarroya-Ralolf's brother, an airplane pilot in Florida, flew to Maryville after receiving the news. A memorial service for Villarroya-Ralolf was held on Nov. 13 at 2 p.m. Villarroya-Ralolf's brother spoke at the ceremony.

Thanksgiving: What do we have to be thankful for?

by Sam Waycaster
Echo Staff

What do we, as Maryville College students, have to be thankful for this Thanksgiving?

That was the question I asked a random sampling of 50 students on campus in order to determine the attitudes of a highly localized group of America's finest on this most thankful holiday.

Of the students polled, 68 percent said that Thanksgiving is about food.

I received a variety of unusual responses. The general consensus was that turkey was the No. 1 Thanksgiving entree, but other preferences were for ham, chicken, lamb and rabbit.

Another thankful topic was the desserts.

Once again the king of Thanksgiving pastries - the pumpkin pie - reigned supreme. The all-American apple pie, sweet potato pie and homemade vanilla ice cream were other interesting thankful choices.

Twenty-one percent of the students stated that their idea of Thanksgiving was being able to spend time with their families.

One student commented that "this is one of the very few times during the [school] year that I actually get to sit down and have a home cooked meal with my family because they live so far away. It's really a good time to catch up on happenings I miss by not being at home." Another student said, "Thanksgiving is a fun and relaxing time for my family and I to spend together." She added that "Thanksgiving is special because the whole family is together. My family is so special to me that I literally give thanks for the chance for us all to be together."

The remainder of the students polled said that Thanksgiving is a time for giving thanks - what the name simply implies.

Based on this unscientific poll, I think that student attitudes are basically in line with attitudes nationwide. That is, I believe that we live in a society today that

AIDS forum urges caution

by Missy Flaherty
Echo Staff

Safe sex and the correct use of condoms was the main topic of discussion at a Nov. 6 forum on AIDS.

HIV virus victim Ed Nicholson and DRI Outreach representative Vince Bryson spoke candidly on the virus and its effects on their lives, on the effects on everyone's life in the future and on ways to guard against AIDS. The meeting was informal and allowed everyone a chance for questions.

The meeting began with an exercise on how quickly the virus can spread from just one infected person. It became obvious how AIDS has grown to epidemic proportions.

The audience was then bombarded with facts about the virus:

+ by the year 2000, 40 million people will be infected with AIDS.

+ Zaire has the highest birth rate yet has a negative population growth because of AIDS.

+ in Tennessee, there are 1,676 cases reported of full-blown AIDS.

[First Thanksgiving]

They began now to gather in the small harvest they had, and to fit up their houses and dwellings against winter, being all well recovered in health and strength and had all things in good plenty. For as some were thus employed in affairs abroad, others were exercised in fishing, about cod and bass and other fish, of which they took good store, of which every family had their portion. All the summer there was no want, and now began to come in store of fowl, as winter approached, of which this place did abound when they came first (but afterward decreased by degrees). And besides waterfowl there was a great store of wild turkeys, of which they took many, besides venison, etc. Besides they had about a peck a meal a week to a person, or now since harvest, Indian corn to that proportion. Which made many afterwards write so largely of their plenty here to their friends in England, which were not feigned but true reports.

We are not immortal

The death of Maryville College student Merce Villarroya-Ralolf in an automobile accident last week reminds us again of how vulnerable we are when we step into an automobile.

Automobile accidents, as everyone has heard so many times that the impact has lost its effect, are the leading cause of death in the United States. Yet we are a mobile society and our independence and individualism as Americans unfortunately have been defined by ownership and heavy use of one or more automobiles.

It is quite obvious to us as we sit, removed from our cars, that a Ford Bronco, such as the one that the students were riding in last week when the accident occurred, is not designed to transport eight people or even six safely, since there are not enough seat belts for everyone. Yet who can fault a group of young people for riding out into the country to see the stars on a marvelous, cold, crisp and clear night in the mountains of East Tennessee?

This commentary is not intended to assess blame for our habits and our dependencies and our desires. But only to say, please be careful when you drive, especially now that the holiday season is upon us. We want to see you again tomorrow, and next week and in the years to come.

Thanksgiving Lambada

Towards the end of November we will all be sitting with family and friends to celebrate an interesting holiday in which we celebrate the mercies of the year past. We will be rendering thanks to God for all that we have, but just what do we thank the Lord for?

I am kind of thankful that our national symbol is the bald eagle and not the turkey, I mean which one symbolizes most of America and which one would we like to symbolize most of America. I'm not saying we're not in as good a shape as our fathers, but how many kids get Nintendo for Christmas instead of a football or a bike. This brings us to the prayers of Thanksgiving which can sometimes be "Dear Lord, Please help me to have enough money to pay for Christmas" instead of "Dear, Lord help me to understand the true meaning of Christmas!"

Everybody likes to eat and before Thanksgiving there will be plenty of low-cholesterol, low fat, low sugar high fiber commercials on T.V. promoting new products that may or may not help your health. I'm not saying that all these health ads are a crock, but if we have to watch what we eat, how come our grandparents ate everything and lived so long (or are still alive)? How come George Burns still has a cigar popping out of his mouth? The truth about all food items is that you always come back to the basics, and if man made it, there's a chance it could kill you. One good thing about Thanksgiving is that there are chemicals in the turkey that make you sleepy. Yeah! Just lay down after that big old meal and see if you don't catch the best nap you've had all year.

It would be pretty hard to let something get to me that would make me lose my appetite on Thanksgiving. I mean, yeah, I hear even celebrities are catching A.I.D.S now, but the potatoes look pretty good. I hear every winter gets colder and every summer hotter, but those veggies look mighty good. There's talk that even our own Congress is incompetent and guilty of most crimes, but I just gotta have another roll. Hey, I'm against drinking and driving too, but, uh, are those Buds cold? Someone said that our national debt is so big that we couldn't even print enough money to

Letters to the Editor....

Echo article on drug policy a joke

Dear Editor,

This letter is written in response to the article concerning the suspension of two Maryville college students for violation of the drug policy.

This school makes me sick. This paper makes me sick. The Echo is supposed to be a student newspaper, that is, it is supposed to reflect the views of the students and contain information that students will be interested in. What a joke.

I'll tell you the students' view: the students think that the administration was completely unfair and thick headed to suspend the students. But the article that appeared in the Echo, after being butchered by the editor and the rest of the administration, made the entire affair appear to be just a small break in the "ebb and flow" of college life. Apparently, the editor thinks that we are all looking for a way to return a sense of community to the campus rather than remain in separate factions. Well, news flash. We are in factions, and we were before the incident ever happened. This article just confirms it. The paper has its nose so far up the administration's butt that it is blind to the feelings of the students who are this college.

Just for a moment, I ask you all to forget the smoke that the administration has been blowing up our rears. Forget the article you read and just think about this: two students were caught with paraphenalia. Not drugs, but paraphenalia. If Sue Wyatt was so convinced that they had a drug problem, why didn't she try to help them? I wish, just for one second, she would quit trying to cover her ass and just answer that question. Why not counseling? Why not a second chance? The college completely turned its back on two of its students. "You don't play by the rules, you're out." And then Dick Ferrin has the unmitigated gall to talk about a "less punitive system." He says the "more mature approach" is to "recognize human relationships."

Well, guess what, Dick. Two students screwed up once and got kicked out. If that is the mature approach, then you can take your maturity and shove it.

Oh, and let me say a word about this federal funding business. If the college is willing to do something that the entire student body thinks is cruel and unjust in order to get money, what kind of message is that supposed to relay to the students? What kind of excuse is that? I guess God Money rules the liberal arts too.

The article referred to the students as _____ and _____. Well, to me, unlike the administration, they weren't blanks. They were people, and they had names and lives. I make no apology for the violence of this letter. The fact is, two of my best friends are gone, and the administration has made an enemy.

p.s. I have no doubt that this letter will be rearranged, softened, and otherwise censored. For a copy of the original contact me at box 2650. If you want, I'll also give you names and details of the case. It shouldn't be a secret.

Son

to pay it off, but why don't you flip through the T.V. guide and see who's playing today. Can you hear those kids playing - geez louise - why do their games have to include guns? So how many deer did you get this year? I know some people just won't be as fortunate as us this day, but could you stoke up the fire a little?

So you've got some bills? So you can't get along with the one you love? So your favorite team lost again? Today the world is still in need of attention and no matter how we kid ourselves into thinking we are not involved, we are! On this Thanksgiving I hope everyone realizes just how fortunate he or she really is. Thanksgiving is the beginning of our holiday traditions, and by the time that New Year's comes around, I hope we all make at least one change about ourselves, because if we don't, the idea of Thanksgiving may be just a fairy tale.

If you can't deal with the rest of the world just yet, then let's deal with this campus and the things that we should be thankful for here...hang on...not a bad year for the Scots football team. I could go on about the president's support at the games and in the dorms, but I won't. I know the amount of pressure is enormous in college and believe me it doesn't get much easier as you go through your four or five years. You have to keep walking by open windows and remember that you do have quite a bit to be thankful for even if your term paper is due sometime soon. Live these days in college to their fullest, for soon they will be gone, and while sitting among those relatives and friends remember how you got as far as you did in life, where you're going, and don't ever try to get a strange sensation from the whip cream bottles, cuz you know how silly it is to think that works. Sure it doesn't! One more thing: If someone tries to give you something that tastes LIKE chicken, skip it!!!

TG

is too materialistic. We focus on the secondary issues rather than on the primary ones.

I am not condemning the thankful choices of the students polled because I, myself, am guilty of the same choices. If I had been one of the students in the survey rather than the interviewer asking these questions, my response would have been exactly the same as theirs.

Yet Thanksgiving to me is also a time for celebration. It is a time to get together with family and friends and have a nice meal. To sit and visit and reminisce about past experiences.

Yes, I am also thankful for my family, and the food that we are so privileged to share with one another, but somehow that is just not enough. I often feel that I take for granted many of the things I should be thankful for. Why can't every day be a "thanks giving" day? It's not the food, or the companionship, or even the security of being home. Thanksgiving is a time for being thankful for all the days of our lives.

So the question remains:

Drawing by Brinton Turkle

What do we, as Maryville College students, have to be thankful for?

Perhaps it is the ability to learn and grow through others. To meet new and interesting people on our journey through what one student termed "the best years of our lives." Whether students live across town or across the country, the idea of Thanksgiving tends to remain constant through the eyes of the students of Maryville College.

Have a safe and Happy Thanksgiving!

Fire in Copeland focuses attention on safety

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

It was a cold Monday morning at about 7:15, and most of the residents in Copeland Hall were sleeping in their warm beds. Yet one bed was much warmer than the others—it was on fire.

Maryville Fire Marshall Ed Mitchell said that a small plastic fan clipped to a headboard had overheated and fallen onto the bed in the room.

Senior Michael "Gooch" Goodrich, Copeland resident assistant (RA), attempted to put out the fire by using a fire extinguisher but was unsuccessful.

According to Mark Cate, Copeland resident director, the fire alarm then sounded and residents were forced to evacuate the building.

Although the Copeland staff worked to make sure everyone was evacuating the building, senior Maria Mena, also an RA, said that it was difficult because not many people believed the alarm at first.

The fan which started the fire was not running, according to Marcia Gibson, director of student life at Maryville College. The occupant of the room was not in the room at the time of the fire and was not held liable for the fire. "It was a defect in the appliance and the manufacturer is responsible," Gibson stated.

The mattress and its covers were burned and a phone near the bed was partially melted. The carpet in the room and hall was damaged.

Sophomore Julie Nemec, a Copeland resident, had just stepped out of the shower when the alarm went off.

"I couldn't believe the alarm was going off so early in the morning but when I saw the smoke coming from the third floor, I believed it," Nemec commented.

Senior Keriann Terwedow said that when she opened her door, she could not see the wall on the other side of the hallway because of the smoke. Terwedow lives in the same quadrant that the fire was in.

According to Cate, no one was injured in the fire. "I think our staff did exactly what they were trained to do and because of that, we had no injuries and were very fortunate in the outcome" he stated.

Gibson stressed the importance of fire awareness. With the help of the new MC fire marshal, Howard Myrick, she hopes to educate the residents at MC about the dangers of fire in residence halls.

Gibson stated that the health and safety checks that took place in the dorms after the fire were not a reaction to the fire. The checks have been planned for a long time and have been part of campus policy for

The safety checks keyed on: overloaded electrical outlets, inadequate extension chords used for large appliances, appliances used inappropriately (such as a small lamp intended for a 25 watt bulb which has a 75 watt bulb in it), ungrounded outlets and basic items that are against campus policy, such as candles, incense, oil lamps any kind of small heater or anything else capable of having an open flame. Cigarette lighters are excluded.

Gibson stressed the importance of using surge protectors when using multiple outlets and the importance of not leaving an appliance, such as a curling iron, unattended.

She said the fire that occurred could have been much worse if the fire extinguisher had not worked or if Goodrich had not known how to use it.

The fire alarm systems, which were broken at the beginning of the year, have been inspected and repaired, so "when you hear an alarm you should know that it is possibly the real thing," Gibson declared.

People will be seeing more information in the future about fire safety. "Students need to inform themselves and make themselves aware of items in rooms that are dangerous," Gibson said.

A bonfire at the beginning of this academic year echoes the potential hazards of fire in the dorms and other buildings on campus.

Director of Career Planning & Placement Jean Jones retires after 16 years at Maryville College

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

After 16 years at MC, Jean Jones has retired. She was director of career planning and placement (CPP).

Jones started at MC in the newly organized CPP, using government funds under a U.S. Department of Education Title III grant.

"The most difficult thing about retiring will be leaving the friends I have made on campus. I am in the process of writing thank you notes to them," Jones said.

As a graduate student, Jones tried several practica to find the career that she most wanted to make a part of her daily life. She found that helping college students in career choices, interview preparation, resume writing and finding the right job was the rewarding experience that she wanted.

"One of the things about this job is that I have learned a lot about things I would not normally have learned, like what linguistics is and where one might go to get a master's in linguistics," Jones said.

During her first year, the CPP program at MC was cited as a model CPP for other colleges using Title III funds. The government sent representatives from other colleges to MC to learn what was being done and what they could do to make their own CPP a better office for students, Jones said.

CPP can help a student in many ways. When freshman students arrive on campus, the office can help with jobs off- or on-campus, can guide them in the choice of careers or can just help them polish job-hunting skills, such as how to prepare for an interview, how to write a resume and where job opportunities might be found.

When asked for a definition of the office, Jones said that CPP was designed to help individuals assess their various skills, interests, values and career goals. The CPP also works with the faculty, alumni and the community to ensure better opportunities for the student.

"One of the most useful tools for someone to have in searching for a job is a personal network of contacts in the field. A student should start as soon as possible to collect names of persons in the desired field of career choice so that when graduation comes a job can have already been set up," Jones said. "One way to start a network is to learn the names of graduates of MC who have gone on into the field of the student's choice, talk with them. It is also helpful to join professional organizations while a student. The cost of membership is usually discounted."

Jones said another way to make contacts is to take a practicum or internship. MC also helps by requiring a senior thesis. The interviews sometimes needed can also give a student contacts that can be called for help in finding a job.

"You are not asking someone to get you a job, you must do that on your own merit, but you are asking for help in locating job openings because 85 percent of the jobs out there are not advertised," Jones said.

Jane Richardson, as the new director of CPP, plans to consolidate the work-study program with the CPP office. Mark Cate, part-time resident director of Copeland, will work part-time with Richardson to coordinate the work-study program. Richardson started her new job Nov. 1. The CPP office hours are 8-5 daily.

Jones will use her retirement to spend time with her family, to travel, to play golf and maybe to explore other career opportunities.

"You don't have just one career your whole life. Some people have three to five careers in their lifetime. This (retirement) is just a transition into a different stage of my life," Jones said.

New director of financial aid assumes duties

by Lee Fersner
Echo Staff

Venita Jones is Maryville College's new financial aid director.

Jones was the financial aid director at Tennessee Wesleyan when she decided to make a career change. Director of Admissions Annabelle Libby called Jones and asked her to send her resume to Maryville College. Jones then came for an interview and spent a couple of days on campus and found Maryville College impressive, and then decided to come to work.

Jones attended the University of Oregon, but did not finish her degree. She then attended Portland State in Portland, Ore. Jones hopes to work on her bachelor's degree at Maryville in her spare time.

Jones resides on a farm near Athens and has five children and five grandchildren. She and her husband plan to relocate here when they find a place.

The duties Jones has as financial aid director are to administer federal, state and institutional programs, including grants, loans and work programs, which bring in 2-3 million dollars annually.

Jones said that she wants students to be aware that "no matter what problem or concern they may have that we open door policy so if students have a concern they are free to make an appointment or just stop by."

As financial aid director Jones wants to get the office better organized, so she can serve students in a more timely manner. Jones also plans on training financial aid office employees so that they can be more efficient instead of performing just one job.

Jones said that the best thing students can do to help the office out is to turn in applications on time and to follow up on turning in the information that is requested.

After being at Maryville College for only a week, Jones said, "I think

I will like it real well here."

She said that she enjoys working with students and hopes to achieve her goal of getting the office organized, so that the students will view the office with respect instead of just ignoring it.

She said, "I want the students to feel like they will be listened to, not just about financial aid business, but about any concern they have. I also hope they will feel free to come in and seek assistance."

English Conversational Club wants you!

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff

Do you ever wonder what to do between 7-8 p.m. on Tuesdays. Well, why not come to the International House and have fun meeting people of a different background, culture, and society.

Charles Bedomian, a junior majoring in literature, wanted to learn about and meet people from different countries and at the same time help to teach English.

The director of CELL (Center for English Language Learning), Kelly Franklin, and other students indicated that they would like to have a club where international students and native English speakers could "gather informally."

This was the beginning of the English Conversational Club (ECC).

We meet at 7 p.m. on Tuesdays in the International House and usually begin with introductions of new people. There are usually a lot of laughs and the events give everyone an opportunity to ask questions. We also had "Map Nights" where individuals get up and tell a little bit about their country and background. We have described Spain, Venezuela, Bangladesh, China, Japan and even the U.S.

The biggest challenge that Bedomian faces is "speaking English slowly." He adds that the program is open to all students, the community, faculty and anyone interested in meeting people from different places. Information is available through Bedomian at 983-9376.

Feeling dreamy

A weekend workshop on dreams, part of the community education non-credit program, will be held at Maryville College Friday and Saturday, Nov. 22 and 23. The workshop will be conducted by Dr. Eileen Riordan, adjunct associate professor of biology.

The workshop will cover an examination of dream symbols in the light of Carl Jung's theory on dreams. The course will deal with basic Jungian concepts of ego, persona, shadow, anima & animus and how these concepts can be applied to dream interpretation. There will be opportunity to share dreams and discuss them from a Jungian viewpoint.

The workshop will be held at the House in the Woods on the college campus. There is a $45 fee, which includes lunch on Saturday. For registration and information call 981-8116.

Reports from the field.... Roitman on Israel and no chocolate

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff

Ever wondered what to do on Tuesday afternoons at noon? Well, on Tuesday October 15th, I was in the Profit Dining Room listening to Jessica Roitman talking about her summer in Israel.

She started with a short history of Israel and went on to explain why she went to Israel. Actually she wanted to work on an archaeological dig but ended up working at a farm 50 kilometers from Tel Aviv.

Roitman was "a little upset" when she learned that she could have actually worked at a dig in Israel after all. Nevertheless, she "had a great time" and as a volunteer she "received free toothpaste, toilet paper and other toiletries, as well as $50."

The day started at 5:30 a.m. and ended in the afternoon. After that there was always the pool and a party to attend. Roitman said that "after a six-day work week, I appreciated what a difference that extra day makes."

Roitman was always called a "youth" and says that the volunteers were not very well accepted. To let off steam, in what she called "retaliation," Roitman threw a Fourth of July party.

On an individual level, Roitman received hope about the land by witnessing "children of Palestine and Israel families playing together". Roitman went to Egypt for two and half weeks and commented that "Egyptians wanted to portray a good image of Egypt and overall the trip was fun and a neat and rewarding experience."

One of the things Roitman most missed in her travels was "chocolate."

Dastgir on Dastgir in Saudi Arabia

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff

On Oct. 22, I couldn't believe I was finally going to speak about Saudi Arabia. The P.D.R. was filling up slowly as another report from the field was getting under way.

Saudi Arabia, I guess to anyone not having lived there, would be a place of interest and controversy. I can safely say that it is after living there for the past three years. Visiting a foreign country is an experience in itself. Having been to 9 countries in 13 years as a diplomat's daughter, few countries have been so exciting and thought provoking as Saudi Arabia.

It has been interesting because I never have come across a place so full of changes occurring at the same time where people are trying to uphold age-old traditions. It has been a thrill to have been a part of this changing process and to look on without being too involved.

The simple things that we take for granted can be a challenging task to people of this country. No amount of book reading, I would think, could prepare someone for the education one gets by visiting Saudi Arabia. The place is thought provoking because questions like who you are and what your rights are pass through your head everyday. Seriously speaking, those questions are usually unresolved with no answers. All this is a tiny part of what it is like to visit Saudi Arabia.

Men's Basketball Preview 1991-92

by Stephen Williams
Echo Staff

After the success of last season, the Maryville College men's basketball team is hoping for even bigger and brighter things going into the 1991-92 season.

Last season the men's team finished with a record of 22-5 and made Maryville College history by making an appearance in the NCAA tournament. Going into the new season, the Scots have retained most of their starters, only losing Jesse Robinette.

Hoping to find a player who can replace Robinette, Coach Randy Lambert is looking to his returning players to rise to the occasion.

Specifically, Lambert is looking for four of his starters to take charge for the Scots. Tim Lawrence, Kelvin Richardson, Babatou Willingham and Glen Cullop are all expected to make things happen this season, according to Lambert.

Last season Lawrence averaged 10.1 points a game and was fifth in the nation with 8.3 assists a game.

Richardson led the Scots in scoring with a 17-point average and had 5.6 rebounds a game. Willingham averaged 12.3 points and 7.8 rebounds. Cullop averaged 9.1 points and 5.6 rebounds.

At this stage in the season, the Scots have begun to practice and scrimmage.

MC Sports Profile: The offensive line

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

Everybody knows that the Maryville College football team has been having a great season. What some people do not realize is the importance of the efforts of a certain group of individuals that often go unrecognized.

The offensive linemen hold what Brian Wajert, assistant football coach and offensive line coordinator, calls a "non-glory" position. Although they are not usually in the spotlight, the offensive line is an important part of the team's success, Wajert said.

Thomas Stephens, senior tailback, attributes much of the team's success to the offensive line. "The offensive line has been opening up some big holes. If they hadn't been, we wouldn't be getting any yards."

According to Wajert, the offensive line is responsible for over 1,900 yards rushing, which is more than the total for the season last year. "They should surpass last year's totals by a good margin," he said.

Wajert, who has been working with the offensive line for three years, said one reason they have been doing so well is that they are all returning upperclassmen. "This is the first year since I have been here that we have not started any freshman," he said.

He added that although none of the line are freshmen, none of them are seniors either; they will all be returning next year. "The great thing is that they are all underclassmen," he said.

Wajert also pointed out that the players are quick to pick up on assignment changes and blocking schemes from week to week.

Another contributing factor in the success of the offensive line, Wajert said, is the fact that the coaches have not changed the plays since last year.

Hamby agreed. "This is the second year that we have been running this offense. It is second nature to us. The other team can throw anything at us and we are ready."

Hamby said this method is much easier than that used in his first year on the team. "My freshman year we ran complicated schemes," he said.

The offensive line is responsible for opening holes that have allowed over 1,900 yards rushing this year, according to offensive line coordinator Coach Brian Wajert.

For now, Hamby said, the offensive line will try to keep doing what they have been doing and practice the basics. "We are concentrating on things like our steps. A half a step can make a difference," he said.

Hamby added that he hopes the team will finish 8-2 and that he is excited about next year.

"We have got a good group of freshmen, and Ted [Belflower] and I will be the only seniors," he said.

Wajert also complimented the offensive line on their hard work in the weight room and their positive attitude.

"They are all very high-quality kids," Wajert said. "Practice is fun, because I enjoy working with them. We have a good working rapport. That is the key to success; it helps out a lot."

Basketball

"I feel real good with the level of our game right now," Lambert said. "I think the system is in. Our offensive and defensive systems are set and the players seem to have a fairly good grasp of them. Our goal for the next two weeks of practice is to improve our overall quality of play."

In a scrimmage last week against Belmont University, both teams displayed their defensive prowess. Both teams were committing turnovers and were missing key shots. Both offenses struggled to put points on the board.

"I think the reason for both teams struggling somewhat on offense was a result of the defensive pressure that both teams were applying," Lambert said. "I was very pleased with our defensive intensity, and I thought we did a respectable job in handling Belmont's pressure. But handling tough defenses is one aspect that we have to continue to work on."

If you want to take a look at the Scots, there will be three intersquad events on Saturday, Nov. 16. No admission.

At 7 p.m. the junior varsity team will play a group of MC basketball alumni. After that game, there will be a dunk contest that is open to anyone in Blount County. And the final event will be the annual maroon and white game.

AIDS

"You need to let Mr. C work for you. He can save your life," Bryson added.

Nicholson stressed using a latex condom because condoms made of lambskin are too porous and won't protect against AIDS. Nicholson also pointed out that condoms are 88 percent effective, so that still leaves a 12 percent chance of contracting AIDS even with the practice of safe sex.

Abstinence was also addressed. Bryson was understanding of the feelings that some students have of not being able to live without sex, but he said, "You're not going to die if you don't have sex. You could die if you do have sex."

The remaining part of the meeting was a question and answer session. Nicholson answered the majority of the questions since they were directed to him. He was asked questions concerning everything from how he had contracted the HIV virus to his beliefs about harassment, mandatory testing and the

When asked how he felt about mandatory reporting by medical professionals of all persons testing positive for the HIV virus, Nicholson answered, "Mandatory reporting is not necessary. All paramedics and medical professionals should be treating every patient as if they are HIV positive. Universal precautions should be used...such as latex gloves. If you go to your dentist and he doesn't wear a protective mask and latex gloves you should ask him to put them on...for your protection as well as his."

This led to the question of contracting the virus through saliva.

"Minimal amounts won't affect another, unless both partners have bleeding ulcers," Nicholson said. "The virus can't live in the stomach because of its acidity and it can't live outside the body for more than a minute or two."

The audience was curious and Nicholson answered their questions candidly. He stated that his role was to inform and educate the public about AIDS. "Soon everyone in this room will know someone who is dying of AIDS," Nicholson said.

Nicholson is a member of arc: AIDS response knoxville. arc is an organization that gives support for people who are HIV positive and helps people who have AIDS. Nicholson said that arc needs volunteers and can be contacted at 523-AIDS.

Many questions were left unanswered because of time limitations, but that is the story of thousands of AIDS victims.

Did the meeting raise the awareness of its audience?

While waiting to speak with Nicholson, this reporter observed one young man ask him, "Do you have any extra condoms?"

Notice: SACS wants you!

Student surveys will be distributed to certain classes this week for the purpose of satisfying certain Southern Association of Colleges & Schools (SACS) requirements for the college's assessment process this year.

Should you not receive a survey or not complete it in the allotted class time, please stop by the office of Associate Dean Mardi Craig in Anderson Hall to pick up or drop off a survey.

Ferrin says "Stephen is full of it" at installation of MC chaplain

The Rev. Stephen Nickle was installed as chaplain at Maryville College by a commission of the Presbytery of East Tennessee of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) in a ceremony Nov. 5. The installation was part of the regular College worship service held each Tuesday morning in the Center for Campus Ministry.

Members of the Presbytery commission taking part were Elders Mrs. Katy Banker, Bethel Presbyterian Church, Kingston; Dr. Arthur S. Bushing, Highland Presbyterian Church, Maryville; Dr. Richard Ferrin, New Providence Presbyterian Church, Maryville; and Dr. Young-Bae Kim, Korean Church of Knoxville.

Ministers were the Rev. Ann Owens Brunger of Highland Presbyterian Church, Maryville; Dr. G. Kenneth Gates of New Providence Presbyterian Church, Maryville; and the Rev. Frank Jump, Second Presbyterian Church, Chattanooga.

Dr. Ferrin spoke on "Stephen Is Full of It," based on the Biblical passage in Acts referring to the Apostle Stephen. Dr. Gates offered the prayer of installation and performed the laying on of hands. Nickle is director of volunteer services at Maryville College, as well as being chaplain. For the past four years he has been chaplain and assistant professor of religion at Piedmont College in Demorest, GA. He is a graduate of Princeton University and holds the Master of Divinity degree from Columbia Theological Seminary.

He is an active member of the Presbyterian College Chaplains' Association and the National Association of College and University Chaplains. He has worked with Habitat for Humanity, done tutorial service in New York City and aided with math instruction at the People's College in Kingston, Jamaica.

MC receives $1.1 million gift for P.E. building

Maryville College has received a $1,144,500 commitment to fund the renovation of the college's physical education building. Margaret Anne Cooper of Fullerton, Calif., and her brother Robert Cooper, of Port Hadlock, Wash., have made the commitment to the college's Vision 1994 campaign in order to name the building in honor of their parents, the late Dr. Finis G. and Ethel Burchfield Cooper. The building will be named the Cooper Center for Physical Education, Recreation and Athletics.

Along with the previously announced Boydson Baird Gymnasium renovation, the $1,144,500 commitment will provide for the complete renovation of the P.E. building and provide an endowment for upkeep and maintenance in the future. Included in the renovation will be: refurbishing the outside wall structure and replacing the roof; replacing the center gym floor and bleachers, and refinishing the outer two gym floors; repairing and upgrading the heat/ventilation system; installing air conditioning in the offices, locker areas, weight and training rooms; repairing the pool area; and adding locker spaces. Replacing the roof will be completed as funds become available. The P.E. building was built in 1970, and has not received any major renovation since it was built. Over the years the Coopers were strong annual supporters of their alma mater. They established the Ethel and Finis Cooper Trust Fund, the Robert and Nancy Ailey

Burchfield Scholarship Fund in honor of her parents, the Margaret Gaston Cooper Scholarship Fund in honor of his mother, donated $100,000 to the renovation of Thaw Hall, and provided funds for the Finis Gaston Cooper Room in the Willard House alumni headquarters on campus. Dr. Cooper, a 1918 graduate of Maryville College, and his wife Ethel, a 1919 graduate, met at Maryville and were long-time supporters of the College. Dr. Cooper, a native of Gastonburg, Alabama, graduated with a degree in mathematics. After serving two years in the Navy Medical Corps Rush Medical School, he interned at Los Angeles General Hospital, and after 18 months in general practice, he earned a master of science degree in surgery from the University of Minnesota in affiliation with the prestigious Mayo Clinic. Returning to Huntington Park, Calif., Dr. Cooper was influential

Santa's remedies for pre-exam stress

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

Christmas lights are twinkling, your stocking is hung, expectation is in the air and you have to study for exams. What's wrong with this picture? I'll tell you what's wrong. Your holiday cheer is drowning in an ocean of anxiety. Holidays and stress should be mutually exclusive. But since they are not, we sometimes forget that this is the season to be merry. Don't despair. Help is coming to you in a giant sleigh and eight flying reindeer; Santa is on his way! He brings helpful tidings: Santa's Remedies for Pre-exam Stress. Here are just a few:

- Put on big, fuzzy slippers (preferably with a Christmas motif), make some hot chocolate and settle down to watch Rudolph the Rednose Reindeer on TV. Be sure to watch the classic animation version; there is no substitute.
- If you are really stressed out over an exam, try stringing popcorn for a traditional Christmas decoration. After trying to thread that stuff for a couple of hours, physics will be a welcome relief. Hint: Popped popcorn works better.
- Wear a Santa hat to class. This will be a stress reliever for everyone,

- and you will look tres stylish.
- Get some mistletoe and carry it around for a few days. You'll feel better, and you might get lucky!
- Buy a can of peas and donate them to the Empty Pantry Fund. This will make you feel all warm and glowy inside, and it will help someone else have a happy Christmas.
- Play Christmas music. My personal favorite is Elvis's "Blue Christmas." Those backup singers are choice! You might also try "Kenny and Dolly's Country Christmas"—there's nothing like Christmas jukebox style. Others are "Christmas With the Chipmunks" and "Burl Ives Sings Christmas" (picture him as a snowman singing "Silver and Gold").
- Go carolling—even if you have to go by yourself!
- Buy some red and green holiday M&M's and share them.
- Decorate your dorm door. Lights are cool, but probably unsafe. It's hard to find extension cords that do not exceed two feet and are UL approved.
- Decorate your car.
- Go ice skating. It gives you an excuse to wear those mittens - and scarves that are totally unnecessary in this 70-degree weather.

- Purchase a small Christmas tree to put in your window, nothing fancy, Charlie Brown size. It's best to wait until the last weeks before Christmas in order to get the most lonesome, homely, and forlorn tree. You need a tree; it needs a home.
- Do not go to the mall! It will only depress you. They've had the same decorations up since Halloween, and that Christmas shopping mania might be contagious. You don't need any more stress.
- Make Christmas cookies. This can be a great creative outlet, and you can munch on them while you study.
- Ride around and look at Christmas lights. Some people around here decorate Donald Trump style. This is free entertainment, and it can be romantic if you are looking for a real study break.
- Have some friends over to your room for Kroger's non-alcoholic eggnog. It's cheap!
- Go sit on Santa's lap. I suggest the one at K-mart. It's a quality establishment, and their Santa is never a Shriner or a wino who see Santa, p. 8

Santa says he wants YOU to sit on his lap at K-Mart.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial...

Let's gather as one for the new year

Recent events on campus suggest that the student body needs reassurance from the college concerning various policies affecting life in the dorms and on campus in general.

Despite the excellent work of two reporters on our staff and our willingness to publish any and all letters to the editor concerning the matter, the dismissal of two students who violated the current campus drug policy continues to be a subject of concern on campus, most of which circulates on the campus grapevine and occasionally rises to the surface in private conversations with students in the offices of faculty and staff.

Another issue of concern and debate is the change in fire regulations in the dorms, involving what one can and cannot have in the way of appliances, electrical cords, flammable materials, etc. Two-foot extension cords and posters on doors keep coming up in conversations overheard on campus.

Although President Ferrin has been visiting the dorms, we don't hear much about what goes on at these meetings or if the kinds of questions that are being raised privately by students are asked publicly of Dr. Ferrin at these goodwill gatherings.

A little over a year ago, administration, faculty, staff and students set aside time during one day of the week to meet as a group in Wilson Chapel in order to discuss various matters of concern to all of us, including our relationships with one another. It was noted at the time that there would be follow-ups to this gathering, but none have so far occurred.

Perhaps some of the suspicion and ill-feeling that have circulated lately could be dissipated with another such gathering during this academic year, where, as one student suggests, we can all "have a little party and clear the air." It would be a good way to begin a new year.

Publications staffs lauded

The staff of the Echo this semester has made a significant contribution to the campus community and we owe each of them a word of thanks for the hard work that they have done. We will miss those who choose to leave our staff or who graduate to the world beyond MC. But those of us who remain and those who join us for the first time next semester will continue to report campus events objectively and without bias. Do not hesitate to let us hear from you if you believe we have erred, but also do not withhold a compliment. All publications' staffers, including the Chilhowean and Impressions staffs, need to know you care about the content of the publications that your activity fees support.

Prodigal Son

Farewell to Farms

by Mark Farmer
Echo Staff

My final days at Maryville have been a reflection of years past and a reminder that college is merely a place you pass through and don't remain at for long.

In my time I have seen much at this school: I have seen the football team come from a complete losing season to the best season since I've been attending the college. I've seen the basketball team under the interesting leadership of the athletic director. I have seen a certain coach leave the college for taking "liberties" that were unacceptable. I am convinced that the merit of the college is credited to the professors at the college and certainly not the administration. Our professors are one of a kind and deserve to be treated as such. I have seen students of legal drinking age being treated like criminals for drinking in the wrong dorm? The pressure of Comprehensive Exams and my Senior Thesis are over, but I feel like I've been shot and set on fire. I suppose you do have to go through hell to get to paradise, but in looking back I wouldn't have changed a thing.

I had numerous relationships—some short, some expensive—but all in all they were a learning experience. I remember the days of sneaking into Carnegie and trying to find the steam tunnels. I also remember playing lazer tag and bon fires out in the woods. One of the most important lessons I've learned is that maturity does not mean conforming to the wishes of the administration, for individual freedom is what college is all about as long as you remember who you are and you don't sacrifice who you are because it looks good.

I enjoyed all the parental support I received through these long years and I will not enjoy the paying back of loans that seemed impossible to get. I will never forget thoughts that raced through my head during the Gulf War and I will never forget how even a small town like this can have its news. See Farms p. 3

Letters to the Editor....

School must follow state laws in drug cases

Dear Editor,
I'm writing in response to David Robert's letter in the November 18 issue of the Echo. I think by now most people here at this school are aware of the suspension of the two students on possession of paraphernalia charges. And yes, most people, including myself, are pretty upset about the whole incident, especially the punishment. But, the fact still remains that this school must follow state laws. That's the whole purpose behind the drug and alcohol policies. If the state tightens up, so must we. And yes, the federal funding issue DOES play a big part in the tightening of the drug and alcohol rules. Without money how can we operate? Of course money is important to a school - be realistic!

Maybe Student Development should have sent the two students for counseling or help, but Sue Wyatt was just doing her job. No, she was not "covering her ass," she was just abiding by the handbook rules and state laws. She could have turned them over to the police!!! Hey, if you're going to break the rules, be prepared to face the consequences if you get caught! And as for Dick Ferrin, I think Mr. Roberts can take his "mature" comment about him and shove that! That was outright rude, disrespectful, and unnecessary.

I personally think the two students should have gotten a second chance, but they didn't because of the LAW - I am mature enough to understand that, even though I don't like it. Also, no one else on this campus has gotten a second chance when it comes to drug or paraphernalia charges; they've all been suspended as well.

Dave, if you don't like this school, then leave. It's that easy. We've been listening to your negativism ever since you got here. Instead of always putting the school down, why not get involved and try to change the things you don't like. DON'T COMPLAIN IF YOU DON'T WORK!

No offense intended, just being honest,

P.S. - Dave, speak for yourself when writing letters; don't use "us" or "we".

Drug suspension needs reasonable solution

Dear Editor,

Dave Roberts accomplished his goal. In one letter he has managed to piss off 30% of the campus and make the other 70% question this problem. Dave knows me, he should also know my position, one that I feel a lot of other people have as well.

I feel bad that _____ and _____ were kicked out of school. I really don't agree with how the administration handled this problem, and the way that they "covered" every little detail and tap danced until people like Dave began to ask questions.

I don't agree with the senate and judiciary board's position on this issue. It's easy to see that they don't care about their fellow students when they say things like ("we want to change/discuss the handbook, but we can't get together during summer to do it....") What a load of crap!

However, it is a fact that our (Dave's and mine) two friends broke the rules and for this they have to pay the consequences. I hate to say that, but that's the way it is. Plain and simple.

Dave is right, they are good people and they are still good friends to me as well. I miss them just as much as he does. I'm no angel and I don't have much room to talk, but Dave needs to quit complaining. It only makes things worse for everyone. Let him call Dr. Ferrin and Dr. Wyatt all the names he wants, it will only reaffirm their position of authority and his position of campus brat.

What needs to happen is very simple. Everyone, including Dave and myself, needs to quit complaining and telling Dick where to put his maturity and come up with a reasonable solution. Let's ask Dick, Sue, Marsha, Roger and his gang, and anyone else involved to have a little party and clear the air of all this rank gossip and bickering. I'm pretty sure that they will be willing to cooperate. Besides, everyone is sick of hearing about this. Let's bury this dead topic, Roberts. Quit whining and grow up.

Sincerely,
David N. Parisi, sophomore
Box 2573

P.S. Students, feel free to comment!
P.S.S. Oh, Dave, by the way, you could've been a little more tactful in your letter, I hope they don't kick you out as well.

Student Development has hands tied

Dear Editor:

In response to the letter in the Nov. 18 issue by Mr. David Roberts, and as a student staff member at Maryville College, I would just like to remind the campus and those who feel frustrated by the "system" that Dr. Sue Wyatt and the Student Development Staff have their hands tied. They keep things confidential for our protection and then get blamed for not giving second chances.

I feel for Mr. Roberts because his two friends are no longer on campus. However, I also feel for the administration who have been attacked for trying to protect the rights of others. I have complete faith in the fact that the two dismissed students were given a fair chance, as we all are, to live within the standards of the community.

Sincerely,
Julie Brown

Farms

worthy material: the biggest one is my slight brush with one of the Lequire family.

I will never forget the initiations of life I experienced and the wins and losses I had while trying to get through my college days. I suppose my favorite songs were one by Bruce Springsteen and the song "Check it Out" by John Mellencamp. Through all the booze and the B.S. I saw a great group of people and I saw them make mistakes and I saw them move mountains: Well, their own little mountains.

My time here has passed and I know this because I see people asking the same questions I asked my freshman year, and when I go to parties people think I am a freshman. I would like to see a respect for upper classmen. I only hope that the students and friends I leave behind will be treated as people and not bank accounts. I hope that the students are so fired up that nothing will stop them from going after what they crave.

As far as some actions I've witnessed go, I will recite a line from Mellencamp who sings "calling it your job old Hoss, sure don't make it right and if you want me to I'll say a prayer for your soul tonight" and to those who think laws are absolutes and college students are little kids, in the words of Metallica "I dub thee unforgiven!"

My experiences at this college were unforgettable and way beyond my wildest dreams, and if God was to come down and talk to me one day and ask me if I would like one more day in the Maryville sun, I would reply,

"Thankyou sir, may I have another."

A Holiday without Matthew

The Thanksgiving article written by [Echo staffer] Sam Waycaster really made me think about my own feelings toward the holiday season. The article referred to students first thinking about turkey and desserts, and secondly about their families and deeper concerns. I, like the author, realized that I also had the same set of priorities once.

Unfortunately, most of us know too well that "you don't miss something until it's gone." This statement has a particular significance to me. Last May, my seventeen-year old brother shot himself in our basement. This tragedy has made the approaching holiday season very difficult for my family. It is hard to imagine what the holiday season will be like without Matthew. He was always in charge of saying the prayer at our Thanksgiving dinner. The prayers were quite long (a little irritating sometimes) but so generous and meaningful. This year I will sorely miss those long irritating prayers. Even more I will miss Matthew--the excited little boy who woke me, my sister, and my other brother at 5:00 Christmas morning to open presents.

This year every time someone asks me what the holiday season has in store for me all I can do is feel sick to my stomach. Somehow my family and I will make it through the holidays without Matthew, but it will never be the same again. I wish there was a way that my family could be normal again, the way we were before Matthew left. I hope wherever he is, he knows how much we love and miss him.

I am writing this not to weigh your hearts, but rather your minds. Please go home with the realization of the gifts which have been bestowed on you, for when they are gone --it will be too late.

Robert Burns' night: A wee bit 'a fun at MC

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Robert Burns will be here on Jan 25. At least he will be here in spirit when "Robert Burns Night" is held at the House in the Woods.

According to Lew Rudisill, director of conferences and special programs at Maryville College, people all over the world celebrate the poetry of Robert Burns on this day but this is the "first time we've ever tried this here," she added.

Robert Burns was a Scottish poet who lived from 1759-1796. His poetry is celebrated and praised by people with Scottish heritage. Maryville College has a Scottish background because of its ties to the Presbyterian Church.

Rudisill said that she would like to see this celebration become an annual affair because the background of this school and area it is located in. "We don't have any opportunities to celebrate our heritage at Maryville College. We're the fighting Scots and the Highlanders and we don't have a festival or celebration of any kind of why we are called that," Rudisill explained.

There will also be classes that will be offered before the actual "Robert Burns Night." One will be a Scottish Cooking class, taught by Chef Joseph Lowery, a non-credit cooking teacher at MC and at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville. The other class will be a study of Robert Burns' poetry, led by David Powell, instructor of English at MC.

The cooking class will be offered three nights: Jan 7, 14 and 21. According to Lowery, each class will concentrate on specific courses that will be served at dinner at the Robert Burns' Night. The first class will learn to cook the appetizers. Green Pea and Salmon Terene, Scotch Eggs and Aberdeen Angus Pie are the dishes that students will learn to prepare.

The second class will learn to prepare Cock a Leekie soup and the main dish, Haggis with Tatties and Meeps. The third class will learn to prepare the desserts - shortbread and trifle - and will experiment with Scottish breads. The food that will be prepared are traditional Scottish foods, Lowery added.

Lowery said that anyone, from beginning to advanced students, is invited to take this course. He said that he is "excited about doing something in conjunction with Scotland's favorite poet."

Lowery also said that this will be the first time he will teach a class like this one. He said that he has had experience cooking Scottish foods and breads because of his experience as a desert and pastry chef and because of the Scottish ties in his family.

The poetry class will be offered three nights: Jan 9, 16 and 23. It will be bringing in "some outside resource people who are particularly good at Scottish dialect," Rudisill said.

The fee for each of the classes is $60. This includes the dinner and entertainment at Robert Burns Night.

A Red, Red Rose

*O, My luve is like a red, red rose,
That's newly sprung in June;
O, my luve is like the melody
That's sweetly play'd in tune.*

*As fair art thou, my bonnie lass,
So deep in luve am I;
And I will luve thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gang dry.*

*Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And rocks melt wi' the sun:
And I will love the still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.*

*And fare thee well, my only luve,
And fare thee well a while!
And I will come again, my luve,
Tho' it were ten thousand mile!*

The fee for the Robert Burns Night alone is $25, according to Rudisill. The celebration itself is "really going to be a big deal," Rudisill added.

The entertainment on Robert Burns Night will consist of music from a Scottish bagpiper and a Scottish fiddler, poetry readings and fine Scottish foods. Rudisill said that "Robert Burns apparently was a very social person who enjoyed good company and food."

Rudisill stressed that this occasion is open to anyone who is interested. She said to get in touch with her, Sandra Brennan, conference assistant at MC, if interested.

'Lend Me a Tenor' hits high note for MC theatre

by Matt Osborne
Echo Staff

The 1991-92 Maryville College theatre got off to a fantastic start this year with its fall production of the uproarious comedy "Lend Me A Tenor."

The play was performed at 8 p.m. on Nov. 1-2, before two of the largest audiences Maryville has seen in years. The theatre was nearly full for both performances and ticket sales totaled over four hundred for both nights.

The play opens in a hotel suite in the 1950's. Henry Saunders, played by sophomore Sam Waycaster, and his assistant, Max, played by freshman Darrien Thomson, are waiting for Tito Merelli, a world-famous Italian tenor played by Robbie Patton. When he arrives, he is not only late for the rehearsal of "Otello," the opera he has come to play the lead in, but he is also having stomach pains and trouble with his wife Maria, played by freshman Laura Scott. Tito takes too many sleeping pills during an argument with her, and Max unwittingly slips more pills into Tito's wine.

Maria leaves Tito, who falls into a comatose sleep. When the performance of "Otello" is about to start, Max discovers what he thinks to be Tito's dead body. Then Saunders sends Max to the opera — to sing in Tito's place! Of course, when Tito wakes up, he has no idea what is going on, and rushes off to the opera.

At this point the play becomes a slapstick comedy filled with mistaken identities and much door-banging, along with lots of romantic humor from the love affair between Max and Saunders' daughter Maggie, played by Charlotte Borderieux, who thinks Max is Tito. Diana, played by sophomore Julie Williams, is the sultry temptress who seduces Tito. And to add to the confusion, there is an annoying bell

Fire prompts safety checks; dorm regulations to be enforced

by Matt Osborne
Echo Staff

The Nov. 4 fire in Copeland Hall has brought about some safety changes in three dorms to reinforce safety rules as the college tries to prevent another fire.

Marcia Gibson, director of student life, has had a busy semester. She has suspended three students and been awakened at 3 a.m. by the news of Merce Villaroya-Raloff's death in an automobile accident; but she said that one of her greatest fears was realized in the Copeland Hall fire.

Even before the incident, Gibson said that she had already prepared for safety checks to find fire-dangers in student rooms, but when smoke forced half-showered and sleepy Copeland residents into sub-freezing temperatures, Maryville Fire Marshall Ed Mitchell told Gibson that several additional changes needed to be made to Davis, Gamble and Copeland halls.

The most pressing one is the installation of fire walls in the laundry rooms between the machines and the stairwell. This will prevent flame and smoke from going up the stairs and thereby blocking off half of the students' escape route should a dryer catch fire. Gibson points out that it was an oversight of the architect, rather than the school, which left out the fire wall.

But the one that may prove the most controversial is the removal of the kitchens. According to a letter from the fire marshal to President Ferrin, "The lobby area in the dormitories is considered as part of the exit passageway and as such cannot have a kitchen area that occupants must pass through to exit the building." Students may lose the right to cook at all in the dorms.

Gibson clarifies: "I don't want to see students cooking in their dorms at all, unless it's with a small microwave."

In addition, smoke detectors have to be installed in the garbage rooms in the basements of the dorms and all combustible materials must be removed from the walls and doors. This means that paper and cardboard cannot be placed on the outside of students' doors anymore.

All powerstrips need surge protectors and must be UL approved; only the most sturdy extension cords may be used; and overloading outlets is definitely a no-no. In addition, items like space heaters and hot-plates are not supposed to be in the dorms.

"You would be amazed and appalled at some of the things we uncovered in our safety checks," Gibson said. "I found students with 12 plugs on old, rusty junked-out powerstrips attached to old, fraying extension cords. People like that just don't realize how incredibly dangerous they are by

Handel's Messiah tonight at 8

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

Handel's Messiah will be performed by the Maryville College Community Choir and the Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra (MACCO) tonight at 8 p.m. in Wilson Chapel.

The choir will be directed by Dr. Daniel Taddie, chair of the fine arts department.

The orchestra will be conducted by Bill Robinson, the new director-conductor of MACCO. This will be the first performance of the season for the choir.

The orchestra will be performing the first half of the program with a variety of Christmas favorites.

Part I (the Christmas Portion) of Handel's Messiah will be presented after a brief intermission. The following people will be soloists (in order of appearance): Bob Chambers, tenor; George A. Hall, bass; Nancy E. McCormick, soprano; George A. Hall, bass; Carolyn Glardon, soprano; Janis Cunningham, soprano; Sarah K. Sawyer, alto; Connie S. Douglas, soprano.

Lady Scots nail down tournament, off to winning start for 1991-92

by Lee Fersner
Echo Staff

The Lady Scots basketball season opened impressively, with the capturing of the championship at the Tipoff Classic in Arlington, Va.

Leah Onks was awarded MVP of the tournament for a performance that got the Lady Scots off to a 3-0 start.

Despite the injury of sophomore guard Honey Brown, who twisted her knee in the second-round game with Marymount, coach Wes Moore has a positive outlook on the Lady Scots upcoming season.

Moore said, "I am working with an experienced team this year. Last year the team made the final 16 in the country. The juniors and seniors have been to NCAA tournaments the years before, so they know what to expect."

Moore hopes to get to the final tournaments this season and advance further than last year.

"More than anything else this season I want to see improvement as the year progresses," he said. "In the past we have started out strong and become stale as the season progressed. This year I want the team to be playing their best basketball in March."

Tough games this season, according to Moore, are with Tusculum, Milligan College and Roanoke College.

The Lady Scots take on Tusculum away on Dec. 7. Tusculum has all players returning from the team that played in the district finals last year.

On Dec. 14, Maryville will host Milligan College, and on Jan. 9, the Lady Scots will play Roanoke College. Roanoke placed in the final eight last year.

Moore wants the team to concentrate on relying completely on a "team game" and on the details that other teams overlook.

"To be a good basketball player one needs to take the time to do the little things that make a difference in a game," Moore said.

MC soccer teams have impressive seasons

by Martin Lin
Echo Staff

The Maryville College soccer Scots failed in their attempt to qualify for the NCAA Division III play-offs, but were still successful in having an impressive season overall.

The men's soccer team, led by seniors Dale Allen, Patrick Hagerty, Patrick Mumpower and captain Ben Sohrabi, finished with a 12-5-3 record for the season. Sophomore transfer Todd Tompkins, junior Ali Sohrabi and senior Ben Sohrabi were very valuable players to the Scots. Tompkins had 15 goals and 5 assists, Ben Sohrabi had 8 goals and 4 assists, and Ali Sohrabi had 6 goals and 4 assists near the end of the season.

The team, playing most of their games on the road, showed poise, strength and concentration tying the South's Division III leader Methodist College in North Carolina. Probably the most impressive performance, however, was the 4-4 tie with the NCAA Division III Championship runner-up Trenton State from New Jersey. The team also suffered an 11-0 loss to Division I powerhouse Clemson University in "Death Valley," SC.

Coach Pepe Fernandez said that he was satisfied with the season. "I thought the team played great after losing Brian Moore, Enrique Rueda, Scott Snyder and Blake Hornbuckle. The freshmen adjusted to the situation and came through. I would have liked, however, to have seen the team go a little further," Fernandez said.

The Lady Scots finished with a very impressive 10-2-1 record and were ranked as the fifth best team in the south near the end of the season. Captains Kelly Smelser and Nicole Schmucker, both from Kingsport, Tenn., led the team to its best record in the history of Maryville College's women's soccer program. Freshman player Jennifer Wells and sophomore Pam Russell had excellent seasons as well.

The main reason the team failed to reach the national tournament was probably, according to coach Pepe Fernandez, the comparatively small number of games played. However, the Maryville College Scots will most definitely enter next season as top contenders in the south in both programs.

Volleyballers spike way to fine finish

Missy and Kipp Martines warm up their lips in preparation for playing at the Homecoming football game. "The family that plays together, stays together," the Martines duo explained. The two also work together on the college yearbook, the Chilhowean. "He's my slave," Martines said of her relationship with her husband. Oh, by the way, the football team had a great season, too.

in the establishment of Lynwood's St. Francis Hospital, which became one of the largest private medical facilities in California. He served as the first chief of staff at the hospital, chief of staff of the Mission Hospital, president of the South East Medical Association and as a member of the board of the Los Angeles Medical Council. Dr. Cooper also taught at the University of Southern California and was an honorary member of its Medical Alumni Association. He gave up his surgical practice in 1958 and spent the next four years as student health physician at Los Angeles State College.

Dr. Cooper was honored by Maryville College with an Alumni Citation in 1982. He died in 1990.

Ethel Burchfield Cooper was a native of Dandridge, Tenn. She was graduated from Maryville College in 1919, and obtained her master's degree at Columbia University. She taught science and coached the girl's basketball teams for two years at Martha Washington College in Virginia. She then accepted a position in the home economics department of the Huntington Park High School in California.

Mrs. Cooper was active in church and civic activities over the years and served as president of the Medical Auxiliary, a national organization of doctors' wives. She died in 1984.

The Coopers were both student athletes while at Maryville College. He lettered in baseball and football, and she received four letters in basketball. She was also manager of the Maryville girl's basketball team.

How about 10 weeks, expenses paid, in France or Switzerland?

Students interested in participating in one of two summer internships in France and Switzerland are invited to send letters of application to Dr. Martha Craig.

MC students will have the opportunity to work as interns at Ralston Energy Systems Europe (RESE), a company which manufactures miniature and standard alkaline batteries under the brand name of UCAR (known in the U.S. as Eveready). The internships were established last year by Dr. Dan Greaser, a Maryville College alumnus and current member of the Board of Directors, and are being offered again this year to Maryville College students.

Current students Belinda Davis and J.P. Johnson participated last summer and reported positive experiences. One plant is in LaChaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, located approximately 90 miles from Geneva. The other is in Caudebec, France.

During internships, students will assist with statistical studies in the quality control division. Other activities might involve teaching some English or serving as an engineering assistant. The company provides appropriate training for these responsibilities. Dates for the internships are flexible, but students must work a minimum of 10 weeks.

The company provides a work permit, lodging and local transportation. Breakfast is included in the lodging and a subsidized hot lunch is available at the plant on work days. All other meals are the students' responsibility.

In addition to lodging, the positions provide for a monthly salary of 2,000 Swiss francs (approximately $1,500). Travel to and from France and Switzerland is the students' responsibility. Weekends will be free for travel in Europe.

Requirements are: students must be in good academic standing, have the ability to speak French, have completed Math 120 or comparable work in statistics. Students from any major may apply. Preference will be given to rising juniors and seniors. Students may elect to register for course credit for the experience.

Letters of application should be typed and sent to Dr. Craig by the end of the semester and should include the names of two faculty members who can act as references. Applicants will be interviewed, and a selection will be made in January.

And in addition to being a fire hazard, overloading the plugs can prove to be a great annoyance. "If things are not surge-protected, the surge will go through the wall into your neighbor's t.v. or refrigerator," Gibson said. "Everything is connected, so when someone is a serious electrical risk for himself he's also a risk for everyone around him who could have their appliances destroyed."

Gibson also has safety advice: "Remember the basic safety tips you learned as a child? They work."

She pointed out that when you crawl through smoke, there is a layer of breathable air above the floor.

"That's why I'd like to paint large day-glow exit arrows near the floor in every quad," she said. "It's easy to lose your way in these quads, especially if you're new to the campus."

✧ If a man wearing chains and a dress came to your bedroom in the middle of the night and said he was the ghost of Christmas past, would you,

A. Stroll down memory lane with him,

B. Call the police, or

C. Invite him to stay for a nightcap?

hop played by Brian Prather, and a brainless opera guild chairman played by Laura Connelly.

The script is filled with explosive humor, and the actors were up to par as they made the audience guffaw time after time. The bellhop proved to be a funny source of great irritation for Saunders, and Laura Scott, who was acting in only her second play, stole every scene she entered with her impassioned Italian character, even though she was hampered by a sore throat. "I had to work up a lot of nervous energy to get past that," she said, "but it was still great fun doing this part.

Theatre students spent six weeks preparing the set, and countless hours painting and preparing. Stage manager Heather Conaway, a junior from Gainesville, Fla., was in charge of a backstage crew that included her assistant, David Kirby; lighting engineer Rob Riehl; properties crew Missy Martinez and Jennifer Atkin, and costume assistants Julie Walker and Nancy Allen.

In the audience were many of the school faculty, including Dan Taddie, the dean of fine arts, who coached Max and Tito on the songs they sang in act I. He called the show "good, and very well done." Many of the professors and students agreed, calling it "fantastic" and "a scream." One student even called it "the funniest thing I have ever seen. Ever."

"Lend Me A Tenor" is over, but plans are already in full swing to produce the Spring production of "Picnic." If the fall show is any indication, Maryville College theatre is on a great upswing, and the college community will have even more opportunities to enjoy successful shows like this one.

Kennedy's Children will be followed by an open discussion led by Dr. Terry Bunde about the "Legacies of the 1960's".

In Memory of Marce Villarroya

On November 11, 1991, Marce Villarroya was killed in a car accident (Echo, Nov. 18).

Marce's insurance policy ended just before the accident, so her family must pay around eight thousand dollars for returning her body to her family.

Marce's family desperately needs financial support. Please send donations to P.O. Box 2647 by Wednesday, December 11, 1991.

If you have any questions, please contact the International House at 8183.

There are also donation boxes located in the Bookstore, Business Office, the International House, Isaac's, the Library, Pearson's, the Post Office, and the Switchboard. Please help!

Impressions receives First Place award

The Maryville College literary and fine arts magazine Impressions has been awarded a First Place rating by the Columbia Scholastic Press Association in its annual, national critiquing and rating service.

Last year's magazine was edited by junior Jason Ezell, and the staff consisted of Michelle Hall, Jeff Huffman, Kathy Jarrard, Christopher Ryland, Stephanie Thrasher and Katie Watts. Cover art is by Kipp Martines.

"I thought this was the best issue that we've had since I've been advisor," said Dr. Leonard Butts, student publications advisor. "Both the art work and the literary material made for a very polished edition. I'm glad to see that the students have received recognition for their superior efforts."

Last year's Impressions was cited for its content, design and concept. The variety of subject matter of the poetry and the success of the literary techniques used by the writers were considered the "strong suit" of the publication.

The CSPS is affiliated with Columbia University in New York, but its critiquing service uses 250 judges from across the United States, each one working independently on certain publications.

The rankings are Medalist, First Place, Second Place, Third Place and Fourth Place.

Student, faculty exchange established with Puerto Rican university

A student and faculty exchange agreement aimed at developing academic and cultural interchanges has been signed by the presidents of Maryville College and Inter American University of Puerto Rico. Under the agreement the schools will assist each other in teaching, research, exchange of students and faculty and staff development.

It is now one of seven such agreements between Maryville and foreign institutions.

The Puerto Rico agreement provides for short term academic programs and study abroad for groups and individuals. International studies are already a major emphasis in the Maryville College curriculum.

Dr. Elizabeth Perez Reilly, associate professor of Spanish at Maryville College, is on-campus coordinator for the program and Dolly Claudio, director of the international studies program at Universidad Interamericana de Puerto Rico is the coordinator in Puerto Rico.

The agreement was signed by Dr. Richard I. Ferrin, president of Maryville College, and Dr. Jose R. Gonzalez, president of Inter American University of Puerto Rico in San German, Puerto Rico.

In signing the agreement, Ferrin wrote to Gonzalez:

"We look forward to establishing a strong relationship with you and to having our faculty and students know one another."

Ferrin has also invited Gonzalez to Maryville to meet students, faculty and staff. The agreement, which extends for three years and is renewable, provides that

A DAY IN THE LIFE OF THE CAFETERIA

On the cool but sunny day of Jan. 13, Maryville and Alcoa residents as well as students, faculty and staff from Maryville College celebrated the birthday of civil rights leader the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King with a march from the college to Alcoa Middle School (left).

At the school, they were entertained by the combined talents of the Martin Luther King Day Celebration Choir, made up of representatives from several area churches and Maryville College and directed by MC student development's Larry Ervin (above).

One participant (below) found the day's events overwhelming.

Every day a surprise

by Lee Fersner

Phones ringing, doors opening and closing, typewriters typing and papers shuffling are familiar sounds heard during a typical day in the registrar's office.

The registrar's office is open for business from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. The office has a three-member staff composed of Registrar Martha Hess, Sharon Carey and Becky Headrick.

Duties that Hess is solely responsible for include statistical studies, preparation of degree requirements, graduation lists, promotions and dismissals, advanced standing estimates for transfer students and, most importantly, the general supervision of the office. Hess also serves on several different college committees.

Carey is responsible for deferments and evening school registration.

Headrick is primarily in charge of transcripts and entering data into the computers.

Hess explains that "the majority of the duties are considered a joint effort because whoever is available does the job." Spring and fall registration are typical times when all three staff members work as a unit.

Types of problems that the office staff deal with are adding and and numerous questions.

Items come as a surprise an example of a surprise question is when a student called about information needed for a genealogical researcher's family. She needed information on her grandparents who attended Maryville College in the 1920s. This question alone problem is when campus people come in with questions that are easily answered by looking at the

He added that the registrar's

Cafeteria workers get the job done.

by Steve Williams

Echo Staff

Have you ever wondered what goes on in the cafeteria before and after breakfast lunch and dinner are served? Do you ever wonder what the cafeteria crew's day is like? Here is an overview you might find interesting.

On a normal day, the breakfast and lunch crew comes in at 6 a.m.

"I only have an hour and a half to prepare breakfast," said breakfast and lunch cook Sally Hines. "I have about two hours to cook lunch, though."

Along with Hines, Loy Branch and Louise Shields assist the two crews.

"When I come in at six, I prepare all the juices," Branch said. "I also mix the Belgian waffle batter."

Shields' job is to prepare the breakfast and salad bars. She makes sure that the breakfast bars are stocked with fruit and like items. She is also responsible for the salad bar at lunch.

During and after lunch, the dirty work is being done. What dirty work? Washing the dishes, of course. And with the help of a new automatic dishwasher, you think the task is easy? Not So.

"Washing the breakfast dishes takes about three and a half hours," said Frank Roddy, the breakfast and lunch dishwasher.

"Lunch dishes take about four hours."

On any given day you can see these employees working together as one. As with any job requiring the coordination of workers, the employees of Marriott Food Services work with the precision of a machine.

When one worker is needed in another area of the cafeteria, no position is left unmanned. A replacement is always at hand. Even when understaffed, the employees of the lunch and breakfast crews work with accuracy.

After lunch, the dinner crew takes the helm. The first people you usually see are the student dinner managers. This post alternates, but two of the student dinner managers are familiar to us. They are Maria Mena and Erica Richardson.

"We usually come in a half an hour before dinner," they said. "We listen to complaints, check student ID's and help out when we are needed."

For the last two years, the cafeteria has had a deli bar. Operating it for the last year and a half is Catherine Cobb. But her job sometimes transcends the confines of the deli bar.

"I'll work the deli bar," Cobb said. "But I also help where I am needed. And on top of that I prepare bag lunches for the athletic teams, when they want them."

The other positions that help make up the dinner crew are lineserver and cook. But the brain of the operation is the food service director.

"I oversee the entire operation," said Ken Payne, temporary food service director. "I make sure that the food is out and on time, and when we are low on supplies I order them."

"I also train new employees, make sure that Marriott standards are being followed and, after dinner, I help with clean-up. This involves sanitation and setting up for the next day."

As with any job of this nature, there is always someone behind the scenes that keeps the wheels turning, even when it is not in motion. That person for Marriott food services is Donna Holder, the secretary.

"Mostly I'm responsible for all of the paper work," Holder said. "I also make the bank deposits, manage the employees' time cards and handle new employees."

The dinner crew displays the same coordination and accuracy that the breakfast and lunch crew displays. All in all, the people of Marriott Food Services are the unsung heroes of Maryville College who go above and beyond the call of duty to get the job done.

Security is Chief Hurst

Mary Rose Slaughter Echo Staff

The duties he carries out are many. From delivering keys to faculty, to finding lost dogs, to returning cats to the neighbors, he never finds each day the same. Working with the community is part of the job. He unlocks cars, helps start stalled cars, checks buildings, locks or unlocks doors according to the time of day, listens to the problems of students and gives advice. This man is the MC's Chief of Security Eldria Hurst.

For almost 30 years Hurst has patrolled these grounds. He has seen many changes in several policies on campus.

"There use to be a demerit system here. Students were not allowed to have cars or to smoke and they were required to sign in and out. Students caught with a car were given 9 demerits. They were only allowed 10 demerits before suspension," Hurst said. "And there didn't use to be resident directors. They used to be called housemothers and they were aged and really cracked the whip."

Chief Hurst and his two assistants help to make life on campus more secure. His day begins at 7:30 a.m. He reads shift reports and makes follow-up reports if they are required. Then he begins rounds of the parking lots and what he calls the bad part of the job—writing tickets.

"I don't like to write tickets but it is sometimes necessary. Students park in faculty parking spots," Hurst said.

After rounds, meetings must be attended and plans made for security for events on campus. Homecoming is an especially hectic time for the three members of the MC security team, Hurst said.

Hurst's assistants Don Henson and Carol Prats, on the night and weekend shift, must check the woods, check and lock buildings and even occasionally help kill a bat in a dorm room.

When ask if alcohol or drugs were a problem on campus, Hurst said that they were on campus and when there was a party there was usually alcohol present. When problems arise that involve legal situations, Hurst, student development staff and the local authorities work together to resolve the them.

Hurst was born and raised in Walland. And because his father was a deputy sheriff, Hurst decided that he, too, would enter law enforcement.

Hurst graduated from Everett

High School. In 1962, he applied for and got his first job here on campus. To become chief of security, Hurst took several police courses and attended many seminars on law enforcement. Henson and Prats will be attending similar classes and seminars as the opportunities arise.

When asked if there was anything that he wanted the students to know about campus security, Hurst said, "I enjoy working here, enjoy the students. I want them to feel free to call on us for help. We are just as close as a phone call. I don't them to feel that we are here to spy on them."

DON'T BECOME A DODO

The earth is our mother; she gives us life in the elemental sense of the word. We are more than body and soul, heart and mind, more than appetite and desire—we are earth, air, water, and, yes, even fire (for we burn at a constant 98.6 degrees). The oxygen in our lungs is as much a part of us as our lungs themselves. We could live without a leg or an arm longer than we could live without oxygen or water.

Why then do we treat our Mother Earth with such disdain? We pollute, devour, and abuse her as if she were an infinite source of riches that could be squandered without thought or respect. We would not treat our bodies so arrogantly. Perhaps it is because we rarely stop to think that the earth is our body; the concept is abstract and out of mind for most.

Educated people must help spread the news about the environmental predicament we have gotten ourselves into if society is going change its prodigal habits before it is too late. The best way to educate is by example. With this in mind, Maryville College announces two major programs related to protecting and saving the environment.

"Love Your Mother" is the name of the Community Forum programs for spring semester. The forum programs will focus on environmental issues and will include presentations by students who participated in a January Term course called "Save The Earth," and specialists from the US Forest Service, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Foundation for Global Sustainability. The series will conclude with reflections by Dr. Randolph Shields, retired Maryville College professor, on the experiences of a lifetime of love and dedication to the earth.

This semester also marks the beginning of an extensive recycling program organized by a committee of students, staff, and faculty. The recycling effort, called "Don't Become A Dodo" will begin with collection centers in each dormitory and in most other campus buildings. Aluminum cans, white paper, and newspaper will be collected at first. As soon as volunteers can be organized, the program will expand to include plastics, other forms of paper, and, if possible, glass.

If you would like to become involved in this recycling program please contact one of the following: Betsy Hunt (8280), David Powell (8244), Choi Park (8258), Bruce Guillaume (8125), Lyn Cherry (8082), Dr. Bob Greeney (8274), Andy McCall (8113), Diane Brandsborg (8256), Chief Hurst, or the resident director of your dorm.

Robinson award competition open to Maryville College students

With minimal effort you may receive $1,000 from the Samuel Robinson Award Competition. Applicants must successfully recite the answers to the Westminster Shorter Catechism and write a 2,000-word original essay on an assigned topic related to the Shorter Catechism. All work must be received by the Church Vocations Office in Louisville, Ky., by April 1, 1992. Last year Maryville College had three recipients of the $1,000 award and one of the $200. If you are interested, please come by the Center for Campus Ministry for more information and helpful materials.

College's open house to take place Feb. 1

Prospective students, their parents, and all those interested in admission to Maryville College have been invited to a day-long campus-wide open house at the College on Saturday, Feb. 1. The College Admissions Office will provide tours of the campus and an opportunity to meet with faculty in all major college fields. Workshops will be held for prospective students to meet with current students about campus college life, and for parents to meet with staff on financial and admissions procedures. Registration for those attending will be at the Fine Arts Center starting at 8:30 a.m. The open house is for all high school students and their parents. Special invitations to prospective students and their parents have been sent throughout Tennessee and to Georgia, Alabama, Ohio, Kentucky, and Florida, although attendance is not limited to students from these states. About 150 students and their parents attended an open house on the campus in November. The open house includes lunch in the College dining hall. There is no charge, and reservations may be made by calling the College Admissions Office at 800-456-8150. Local students and their families may call the office at 981-8092.

Celebrate black history month in February

by Stacey Williamson
BSA Business Manager

Black history is only recognized during the loving month of February. But because of the ignorance and lack of knowledge, black history month should occur every month.

We as a society need to recognize that America is America because of what the different ethnic groups have contributed.

During this month, the Black Student Association is sponsoring several activities. The members of BSA would like to invite everyone to come and share in the festivities. Important dates to remember are:

- Feb. 1-29 Gloria Colquitt, an art major, will present her paintings in the Fine Arts Center.
- Feb. 6-8 7 p.m. The Second Annual Gospel Jamboree entitled "TO-GET-THER; WE NEED TO GET IT TOGETHER."
- Feb. TBA Voices of Praise, Maryville College's own gospel choir will be in concert at the end of the month.

And always remember: Love is the key to happiness, peace, and joy.

neither institution will charge the other's students for tuition, fees or room and board. Student exchange is to be arranged on a one-to-one basis and will involve up to four students from each institution each year. The students will be selected for their academic performance, maturity and potential for adjustment to a foreign setting.

Other international study programs available to students and faculty at Maryville College include:

An exchange with Chuo University in Tokyo, Japan, for economics and literature.

An academic and cultural exchange with Han Nam University in Taejon, Korea.

An academic and cultural exchange with Hanyang University in Seoul, Korea.

A student exchange program with Ransai University of Foreign Studies of Osaka, Japan.

MC professor emeritus Elizabeth Jackson dies

Dr. Elizabeth Hope Jackson, teacher of English for 40 years at Maryville College, died Jan 10 at her home in Maryville.

Dr. Jackson joined the English Department at the College in 1935 and retired at Commencement in June 1975. She had made her home at Maryville since her retirement.

Before she came to Maryville, she had been a member of the editorial staff of Webster's New International Dictionary. She had also been a writer for the New York Herald Tribune and the recipient of a scholarship in journalism, which she declined. She was a native of Belfast, Maine.

A graduate of Smith College, she continued her own education coming to Maryville. She held the MA degree from the University of Michigan and the doctorate from the University of Colorado. She had done post doctoral work at the University of Leeds in England. In her scholarly career she made a number of contributions to linguistic studies, especially through her work on the Linguistic Atlas.

She was a member of Highland Presbyterian Church in Maryville, where she had served as Clerk of the Session.

An article about her by Dr. Carolyn Blair, also a retired member of the English faculty at Maryville College, recounts some of Dr. Jackson's methods and the reason she is remembered as a tough but interesting and thorough teacher and scholar.

"Her students were invariably impressed with her command of the subject," Dr. Blair writes. "And amused at her method of bringing order out of the seeming chaos of her notes. It was her custom to come into class and begin laying slips of paper over the desk and lecture notes jotted down on cards, backs of envelopes, torn sheets of paper, and old blue books."

"As she talked she would fish around for the slip containing an observation made on a trip to England or a quotation from a journal article read the day before, occasionally inserting almost inaudibly a wry comment on the peculiarities of Milton or Wordsworth. The students would follow, however, that if they were paying close attention, their notes at the end of the hour were well organized."

"They recall entering her classes with trepidation and gradually relaxing upon finding her not only very human, but interested in them as people. Yet they knew they must come to class prepared and that 'voluntary' help sessions in linguistics were announced, only death - preferably their own - should prevent attendance."

"One student from the late Sixties laughed about falling into sloppy grooming habits while in college, but, he said, there were two places where he would not appear without socks: church and Dr. Jackson's classroom."

Tuition goes up

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

With the release of the infamous Green Letter, tuition is the buzzword on campus—how much is it, how much has it increased, and where does that money go? These are the questions that students are asking.

The combined increase in room, board and tuition will bring the total cost of a Maryville College education from $11,995 to $13,415 for the 1992-1993 school year. This is an increase of 13.9 percent for tuition, seven percent for room and eight percent for board. In addition, the student senate has increased the student activity fee from $120 to $150 for the coming year to support more student activities. (See related story p. 4)

According to Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, the increase in student tuition will be used for increases in financial aid, faculty and staff salaries and debt retirement which requires the college to begin making payments next year on loans that, up until now, it has only been paying on the interest.

Wyatt stated that "tuition and fees pay approximately 70 percent of the cost of actually running the college."

The rest of the cost is met by revenues from several sources: endowment income; federal financial aid; private gifts, grants, and contracts; and auxiliary enterprises.

"The endowment is money that comes to the college as gifts over the years," Wyatt said. "This money is invested and protected; the principle is never touched. The earnings from the interest are used to help defray the cost of tuition."

The annual fund is another source of income provided by the private gifts. Friends and alumni provide approximately one million dollars every year," Wyatt said. "This money goes to help with scholarships and student financial aid."

The capital campaign fund also comes from gifts and donations. The fund-raising campaign began on Jan. 21, 1991. The name capital refers to its focus on permanent items. It is used to meet needs such as new construction, technology or materials that cannot be met by the operating budget.

"It is a one-time gift for a specific project, and then it is gone," Wyatt said.

Auxiliary enterprises are freestanding services that support themselves, like the bookstore, post office and print shop. Room and board charges also fall under this category.

"[Our] kind of learning, especially senior thesis, costs a lot of money."

Dr. Sue Wyatt

Together, these sources of income pay for instruction; academic support, such as the library and the dean's office; scholarships and financial aid; auxiliary enterprises; administration; public service; long-term debt payment; operation and maintenance of the plant; and student services.

Student services refer to admissions, athletics, registrar, financial aid office, student development and student senate. Operation and maintenance covers buildings, grounds, and utilities. Public services include camps and conferences, MACCO and the Affiliate Artist program.

Debt service refers to payments the College must make on certain loans and mortgages.

Marcia Gibson, director of campus life, stated that "most students do not seem to realize that the college must make mortgage payments on the buildings on campus; this is an incredible burden." She added that "interest rates and costs go up each year, and about every five years the college must make a large 'balloon payment' on the mortgages."

Gibson also expressed concern that students seem unaware of how much it costs just to turn the lights on in the residence halls for one day and how much money and energy could be saved if students turned off all the lights when not in their rooms.

Wyatt cited similar examples of the cost of providing basic needs for students. Of the cost of the meal plan, she said one half goes to Marriott to provide staff, staff training, management and food. The other half helps pay the cost of the building, utilities, insurance and twice-monthly bug sprayings. These are "fixed" resources that MC provides, she said.

"It's about a fifty-fifty split," Wyatt said, referring to the food service cost breakdown.

In response to suggestions that MC provide its own food service, Wyatt gave an example of the kind of expense involved: "Just to buy a recipe file that shows how to provide two or three entrees and a nutritional balance at each meal would cost approximately $10,000."

Another area which concerns many students and a portion of MC's budget is athletics.

According to Kandis Schram, assistant director of athletics, every sport is allocated a certain amount of money and it is up to the coach's discretion as to how to use it. Some coaches, Schram said, will outfit the team with shoes, shirts, and shorts, and travel less. Others may only provide shoes and travel more.

"We do not have a set formula to tell our

Are we getting what we pay for?

Next fall it will cost us another $1500 a year to attend Maryville College. According to the recently released green letter, "the college's financial obligations will increase more than $800,000," yet the college plans to charge roughly 900 students an additional $1500 a year. That comes to about $1,350,000; so what happens to the other $550,000? This is a question that seems to be on a lot of students' minds.

When we are encouraged to "dig a little deeper," it's natural to hesitate and ask a few questions. We've been told that the decision to increase tuition is based on the assumption that enrollment will not increase, but what happens if enrollment does happen to increase next year? Will there be a decrease in tuition?

We are being urged to think of Maryville not as an over priced average school but as an affordable above average school, and when our prices are compared to those of Rhodes, Vanderbilt or the University of the South, our fees do appear to be quite reasonable. So, assuming that a Maryville College education is comparable to that of our hypothetical competitors, we are definitely getting a bargain.

The question is: Are we really competitive with these schools?

Maybe we used to be at some point in the past, and maybe with the college's "continued commitment to excellence" we will be again at some point in the future, but are we presently? It's a question worthy of investigation.

Another question worth investigating is why are the number of presidential and dean's scholarships to be awarded being decreased for the same year that tuition will be increased?

After some comparative shopping, whether students and their families will decide that a Maryville education is worth "digging a little deeper for" remains to be seen. What is certain, however, is that the students who do remain will continue to struggle with these questions.

Big picture, little picture

by David Roberts

Is it me, or does it seem like the world is sometimes overwhelming? I mean, think about it. Think about all the things that each and every one of us ought to be worrying about right now. Think of how many momentous, life-changing events are occurring all around us. It just seems hard to deal with. I've been thinking about this a lot lately, and the more I try to talk with my peers about it, the more I notice one fact: our generation no longer seems to care about the big picture.

Like you, reader, right now. What are you more worried about - the massive burden America carries as the sole super power in the post-Cold War world, or... whether or not that bogus check you just wrote E-Z Stop is going to get to the bank before the money your parents sent does? Really, how many of us (that is, the students of this illustrious institution) are aware of the issues that affect the world around us? And more importantly, how many of us know where we stand on those issues and why?

Well, you guys are lucky. Out of the goodness of my immense and infinitely generous heart, I have decided to undertake a task of almost Biblical proportions — that's right, you are about to experience...

Letters to the Editor...

A Woman of Courage

Dear Editor,

My Christmas break provided me with several occasions to sit in the stillness of my home and allow my thoughts to wander. Not surprisingly, my thoughts invariably drifted to a woman who I been learning a great deal about over the past nine months. Although I have no memory of meeting her personally, her role in my life cannot be underestimated. Her name is Jean and four days after her twenty-eighth birthday she gave me my birthday. She also gave me a name - Nina Clare.

I know Jean is of Irish descent and I know her last name, though I will withhold it out of respect to her. Records describe her as "a very attractive and insightful young woman with a pleasant personality." She is tall and very thin with dark hair and hazel eyes. She likes photography and writing in public relations. I know about her family background, too. I need look no farther than Jean's own mother who stood at 5 foot 3 inches with dark hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion to know that I am connected to this family.

But I am also connected to another family - the Burns' family. Seventeen days after my birthday they opened their home to me. A year later I became theirs legally. They gave me a new name and a new heritage. I could never say which family is more a part of me and who I am. As much as I have gained from my adopted family, it would not have been possible without Jean's courageous decision to bring me into this world and her faith in Releasing me into the care of strangers.

As the anniversary of the Roe vs. Wade decision is upon us my heart is heavy. I must face the fact that had abortion been legal in 1970 it would have been a much easier option for Jean. She had every reason, according to today's standards, to choose abortion - she was a young career woman, pregnant with a child whose father was a married man with six children of his own. I ache as I think of children today who, like myself, were conceived in less than ideal situations and are disposed of under the law of our country that permits abortion on demand. I hurt equally as I see women trapped by our society's lack of regard for the importance of human life. The women who choose abortion seem to suffer the most as they realize that, in Reality, abortion does not do them any favors. Their situation is certainly not a hopeless one, but it does indeed involve pain.

I urge you to Reflect on the value of a single human life - perhaps your best friend, your spouse, even your own life. What would you be willing to do to ensure that one person was brought into this world to live? Jean thought I was worth three months in a maternity home, a delay in her career, twenty-one hours of labor, and open hands to release my life into the care of loving strangers. I know that neither the situations concerning my conception and birth, nor the decisions and consequences surrounding these events were easy, but I know my life is worth whatever Jean faced - any life is worth it.

Thank you, Jean, for life and the legacy of courage you have given me.

World

he died for our sins so we could have eternal life. The purpose of life is to live by Jesus' teachings, i.e. to live in worship of God and in love with your fellow man. If you live your life right and have God's forgiveness, then your soul lives forever among streets of gold in heaven above. Amen, hallelujah, and gimme a piece of that unleavened stuff!

— The Beatles were right: Brahman is looking out for you. The purpose of life is to be at peace and oneness with the universe and to escape all concern for material things. You will be reincarnated again and again until you collect enough good karma (frequent flyer miles?) to achieve Nirvana. To achieve Nirvana does not mean that you will begin to smell like teen spirit, but that you will experience "blessed nothingness." Om, I say, Om!

— Various and sundry other religions of the world are right: that is, man's purpose is to serve a god, whatever name he is given. (If you live in the Middle East, your purpose is also to kill everyone from every other faith.)

— Karl Marx was right: there is no God. Man's purpose is to live his life for society; he takes from society according to his need and gives to it according to his ability. Power to the people, comrade!

— I'm right: man is not anybody's sacrificial animal, not God's, not society's, not the earth's, not anyone's. His purpose is not to sacrifice himself himself for the good of his religion or his society or of any whole. His purpose is to realize his own potential, to be a self-sustained, independent individual, and to expect the same from everyone else.

2. This question is somewhat dependent on the first, and whatever answer you have for the first one will (or should) affect your answer to this one: How should man/woman treat his fellow men/women? You know, like, all that, like, morality stuff, dude.

Possible answers:

— Hitler was right: certain groups of people are born superior to the rest of us, and the members of that group have the right to do as they please to everyone else. For example... white people should rule the world, because they invented the hamburger, or... black people should rule the world, because they can dance, or... males should rule the world, because their chests are hairier, or... females should rule the world, because it's their time of month and they damn well SAID SO, or... people born in the north should rule the world, because they won the war, or... people born in the south should rule the world, because they make better barbecue, etc. The point is, one group can treat the rest of the world however they like.

— The Muslims are right: certain groups of people are superior to everyone else by virtue of their beliefs, and they have the right to do as they please. Examples... Christians should rule the world, because God is on their side, or... Jews should rule the world, because God is on their side, or... Muslims should rule the world, because, no matter what the infidels say, God is on their side, and they have the guns to prove it, or... communists should rule the world, because they have the power of the people on their side, or... the champions of democracy should rule the world, because they have God and the people on their side, etc. Once again, the point is that one group can deprive others of their rights.

— Nietzsche was right: only the strong survive. Each man is an island, and each island better get what it can while it can. Screw the other guy.

— Sally Struthers is right: not only can no one deprive anyone else of their rights, but everyone must voluntarily give up his own rights. No one should ever think of himself; everyone should love and care for and be obsessed with those less fortunate than themselves. Compassion is God, and we must love everyone no matter what his/her actions or beliefs.

— I am right: no one has the right to deprive others of their rights, but no one must ever surrender his own. It is perfectly permissible, and even admirable, to condemn those who you believe to be evil, but that moral judgment must never translate into violence. For instance, I consider socialism morally inferior, but I would never consider myself justified in harming, imprisoning, or taking the property of a socialist.

Well, kids, it looks like we only had time for two today, but tune in next issue for the next installment. And, since we've gotten the most fundamental questions out of the way, we can go on to give similarly insightful treatment to such questions as "What kind of shoes are the coolest to wear?" and "Doesn't Dave have anything better to do with his time?"

Student senate approves 25 percent increase in activity fee for 1992-93; Dean instructs on mysteries of the ALC

By a nearly unanimous vote, the student senate on Feb. 6 approved a 25 percent increase in the student activity fee for 1992-93.

With only one senator dissenting, the student governing body decided to raise the fee from $120 this year to $150 next year.

The $30 per student increase was the maximum amount allowed by the college's board of directors.

Prior to the vote, senators expressed concern over this year's cuts in the budgets of the six campus activities — programming, the Echo, the Chilhowean, Impressions, the senate, intramurals — funded by the activity fees.

The cuts were necessary because of a slight decrease in enrollment and because of general budget-tightening campus-wide.

Because the total amount of money that the senate can allocate to student activities is determined each year by the number of students enrolled at MC, most senators agreed that any possible decline in enrollment next year, which would cause a further reduction of activity budgets, would put some of the activities in financial jeopardy.

Senate President Roger Howdyshe and Senator Doug Hof proposed either general or specific rolling account budgets as an alternative to the increase.

Under this plan, the money saved or left over by an activity — this newspaper, for instance — would remain in the budget of that activity for the following year.

Currently all money left in the six activity accounts at the end of the fiscal year is returned to the general account of the college, and the student senate allocates new monies for proposed activities' budgets in each new fiscal year.

For example, in the current process any money that is left in the Echo's account is returned to the general college fund at the end of the fiscal year (June 30), but with a specific rolling account for the Echo, any money saved or left over in the newspaper's budget would remain in that budget for the following year.

Thus, as Hof explained, an increase in student activity fees might not be necessary if specific rolling accounts were used as incentives for the six activities to save money, and adjustments in allocation could be made in the new fiscal year that would compensate even for a decrease in enrollment.

But faced with this week's deadline for raising the fee, the senate voted in the affirmative.

The $30 per student increase will boost the total amount of student activity fees from $38,190 this year to $47,735 next year, if enrollment remains the same.

The senate also had the option of increasing the fee by $20 per student, but this was thought to be an insubstantial increase that would not offset the possibility of a drop in enrollment next year.

In other business, Dr. Dean Boldon, academic vice president and dean of the faculty, appeared before the senate to explain the "mysteries" of the Academic Life Council.

Boldon referred the senate to the new college governance manual for a written explanation of the duties of the ALC, and indicated that ALC meetings are not closed to the general student population.

"But the meetings are so tedious, I don't think anyone would want to come on a regular basis," Boldon said.

Sen. Jennifer McCafferty stated that students were having problems with understanding the function of the ALC because the committee appeared to circumvent or ignore the desires of the students as expressed through the senate.

Using the change in interim requirements as an example, McCafferty said, "The students said 'we don't want to do away with off-campus interim subsidies,' but that view didn't matter.

"For us as senators, we feel stuck. It doesn't matter what we do. We feel like a group of puppets meeting about nothing every couple of weeks."

Sen. Amanda Krenning agreed. "On something like the plus and minus grading system, we all hated it, but it didn't make any difference."

Boldon explained that the faculty has the ultimate say on changes in the academic curriculum, just as the senate has the ultimate say in how student activity fees are to be allocated.

"Often the faculty thinks X and the senate thinks Y on an issue," Boldon said. "And it depends on the issue as to whether the faculty or the senate has the greater say. Personally I don't like the plus-minus system, but the faculty was nearly unanimous in support of it."

McCafferty said that "maybe we need some way of getting our suggestions before the faculty before they vote on these issues."

Boldon agreed and said that he would be willing to work with the senate on establishing a better means of communicating their suggestions to the faculty and vice-versa.

"If there's a better way of communicating, then let's do it," Boldon said, indicating that he would also be willing to take nominations from the senate for appointments of the three student members who regularly serve on the ALC.

In other business, the senate discussed parking problems at the various dorms on campus, seemingly unaware that the college has developed a campus master plan in which parking and traffic congestion problems have been addressed and dealt with by proposed changes in campus landscaping and parking facilities over the next few years.

Senate hears/questions explanation of need for next year's tuition increase

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

The tuition increase was the subject of a candid discussion between students and administrators at a student senate meeting on Feb. 13.

At the meeting, which was open to the student body, Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, stated that "a new day is dawning at Maryville College."

She emphasized the fact that the president and vice president of the student senate had been involved in the decision-making process concerning the tuition increase. The students, she said, had access to information that students had never had access to before.

Wyatt described the difficulty involved in making the decision and tried to reassure students.

"We would like our students to be getting a $30,000 education for half that. We do not want Maryville College to be the most expensive of the average schools, but the most affordable of the above-average schools," she stated.

At least one student seemed to feel that he was getting his money's worth. Sen. Vance Grant, sophomore, said, "we pay $13,000 to go here and get a $19,000 education; I love this school and will pay whatever it takes to go here."

Sen. Jennifer McCafferty, sophomore, offered a different perspective.

"Coming from a town in Ohio where most of the schools I wanted to attend cost around $20,000, Maryville College is a bargain," she said.

Wyatt said that there were several factors that the administration had to consider before deciding to increase tuition. Assuming that enrollment stayed the same, the budget would have to stay the same also in order to avoid "major back-ups," she said.

She added that last year the college spent more than the budgeted amount on financial aid, and the college absorbed an inflationary increase by Marriott rather than raising the price of board.

In addition to the scholarship overexpenditure carry-over and the increased cost of Marriott food services, Wyatt cited the debt-service increase and the need for increased faculty and staff salaries and benefits as reasons for the tuition increase.

The debt-service increase refers to the fact that, as of September of this year, the college will begin paying on the principle rather than just the interest of some loans. This will amount to an additional $180,000 of expenditures next year.

The increases in salaries and benefits, Wyatt said, would not be decided until October of this year. She added that "until then, those dollars are part of the 'buffer' fund for unforeseeable expenses."

After weighing the need to provide for expected and unexpected expenses and progress, especially in the area of bringing MC faculty salaries up to the national average, Wyatt said that three proposed plans were considered. The two plans that were rejected called for smaller increases in tuition but left major shortfalls in meeting expenses.

Wyatt said that even with the projected increase, the budget for 1992-1993 only contained a $4,000 surplus.

"Out of an $11 million increase that is a minute surplus," she said.

Sen. Mike Damron, senior, suggested that if the college can "let students know that this increase in the cost of education is nationwide and not directed at them personally, then it will be an easier pill for them to swallow."

Wyatt added that the college is pursuing a plan for "progress based on savings."

Governance policy manuals available

Understanding how the system works seen as the key to having a direct voice in campus affairs

by John Worth
Echo Staff

Maryville College has adopted a new governance policy. That is, the way in which faculty, students and staff challenge and change campus policy has been revised. Most students probably never noticed that there was anything different about the system, since it evolved over a four-year period. Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president for student development, began the process in 1988, and now students have a direct voice in campus affairs.

Most colleges and universities work through an administrative office. MC is unique in that "students, faculty, and staff have direct access to the President," Wyatt said. "Everyone [has] a channel for influence."

The idea is to have a consensus on major policies. Everyone on the campus can have input. For more information concerning this, the school has prepared a governance manual which outlines how the policy works.

The manuals can be obtained by special order through the office of student development. Copies are also available through faculty and staff members, and a copy is in the library.

MC residence directors take on new responsibilities

Cate, Cofer, Ervin, Henley, Pounders double up on duties

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff

Resident directors (RDs) have in the past been those individuals who are qualified to watch over their individual dorm and take care of dorm matters. Maryville College's RDs still do that, and more.

This year, each resident director is required to work on a program for the college. Most of these programs are either new or more specialized than they have been in the past.

Mark Cate, the RD of Copeland, is the coordinator of student work in the Career Planning and Placement Office. Cate has lived in Maryville for 24 years and graduated with a bachelor's degree from Carson-Newman. He is currently working on his master's degree in educational psychology at the University of Tennessee. Cate assists Jan Bible with work study, internships, summer work and part-time work for students.

According to Cate, "there has never really been a plan developed" to fully develop the opportunities within the Maryville/Knoxville area for part-time work for students. The experience and potential credit would be invaluable on a student's resume, Cate said. Cate is also working on creating a work study criteria that would apportion a student to a particular job that would help in his/her field.

"I'm excited about it," Cate remarked.

Cate noted that when he was at Carson-Newman as a freshman, such a specialized program for student work would have given him "plenty of time to change my mind," whereas by the time a student gets into work in his particular major, it is usually too late to change to another major.

Cate also serves as the staff advisor to the student senate.

Leigh-Anne Cofer, the RD of Lloyd, is the coordinator of student assistance in conjunction with the Life Enrichment Center. She serves as the chairperson of the "Students at Risk" program, which was designed to keep Maryville students at Maryville. She is from Cleveland, Tenn. and graduated with a bachelor's degree in marketing and is now currently working on her master's degree in college student personnel at the University of Tennessee.

Cofer noted that "it's a lot easier to keep a student than to lose a student."

After their freshman year, many students may decide they are unhappy with the curriculum offered and either transfer or drop-out, Cofer said.

Cofer's job is to work closely with a designated advisor of a student who is at risk academically or otherwise. The reason why a student is unhappy or discouraged will be searched for and remedied if possible. Cofer said that the student's support must "be able to understand why the student will dropout."

The program has never been as specialized as it is this year, she said. "I think we have improved," said Cofer. "It (the program) can be really great," noted Cofer.

Larry Ervin, the RD of Gamble, is the coordinator of minority student services.

Ervin grew up in Alcoa and is currently working on his major in music performance.

Minority student services is a new program assisting minority students with any concerns or needs, providing cross-cultural training for residence hall and programming staff, informing minority students of campus policies and procedures, advising the Black Student Association, coordinating international student programming and coordinating the Voices of Praise and Erskine Fellowship Program.

Currently Ervin does all of this, and says that the program "is just beginning to get busy!"

Ervin said his job was to be "the school's watchman to see that all students have the equal opportunity to achieve in Maryville College" and "to help whoever, not just minority students."

Annabel Henley, the RD of Davis, serves as the coordinator of housing in the Office for Student Development. She is from Nashville and graduated from the University of Tennessee with a master's degree in deaf education.

Henley's job is to coordinate meal plans, room charges, and to consolidate charges. In the past, the role of coordinator of housing was just one of the jobs of the director of campus life.

Henley said that now there is "more of a professional atmosphere" within the Office of Student Development due to the role of housing coordinator being allotted to one person.

Henley said that her job will help student development be more consistent with arranging ten-meal plans, room selection, resident assistant/student assistant selection and fines. Henley is currently working with student development to change the ideas about RA/SA selection and room selection.

Henley said she "would like to see more improvements on the dorms."

Henley is also a member of Intersarsity Bible Study, Voices of Praise and the Worship Committee.

Cathy Pounders, the RD of Pearsons, is the coordinator of student activities in the Office of Student Development. Pounders supervises the student programming board and acts as a liaison between the students and the administration and faculty. She is from Maryville and is currently working on her master's degree in college student personnel at the University of Tennessee.

The student programming board meets once a week to decide on events, dances and concerts. A representative from each class and each residence hall is on the board. The board is made up of students from different areas of the campus community, which allows for unofficial polls of the opinion of the student body.

Pounders said that the program was "going very well."

She also noted that the student activities is underbudgeted, and hopes that the recent $30 increase will improve the quality and quantity of activities for next year.

Celebrate:

In the midst of Black History

by Kristi Giles
Echo Staff

Events have been planned throughout the month of February on the MC campus in celebration of Black History Month.

Larry Ervin, advisor for the Black Student Association (BSA), has played an important part in organizing these events.

"I really just tried to cultivate whatever ideas they had to do a celebration," Ervin said. "We're working from a deficit because we're not a funded organization, so we're doing a lot of things using the charity of the community."

Unlike last year, which included only the gospel jamboree, this year the entire month was carefully planned.

The Martin Luther King Day celebration in January established "some nice ties with choirs and people in the community who are really proud of the heritage we all share," Ervin explained.

The Second Annual Gospel Jamboree was held Feb. 6 and 7 in Wilson Chapel. Several community churches participated, including Bethel Baptist Church, St. Paul A.M.E. Church, St. John Baptist Church, Mother Love Baptist Church, and Saints Memorial Church of God in Christ. Also featured were Knoxville College's Anointed Voices and "Artistic Expressions of God's Creation" by Gloria Colquitt will be in the Fine Arts Center Art Gallery through Feb. 29. It can be seen from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily.

The annual February Meetings, scheduled for Feb. 18-20, will feature George Verwer, the Executive Director of Operation Mobilization. Verwer will speak at the 11:00 am worship services each day in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall. Music will be provided by MC's Voices of Praise Gospel Choir.

On Feb. 25, Hugu Group, which consists of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, Baptist Student Union, Intersarsity and Presbyterian Youth, will meet at 9 p.m. in the Lloyd lobby. Chris Martin and James Davis of Urban Community Vision in Knoxville will speak about their personal experiences with racism and discuss scriptural references for racial reconciliation.

The Voices of Praise Gospel Choir will wrap up the month's events on Feb. 29, with their First Annual Concert. The concert will begin at 7 p.m., and keynote speaker will be Dr. Charles Brooks, a 1980 MC graduate.

Black History Month holds various meanings for different people. But as Ervin noted, "You really can't understand what black is, what it should be today, if you don't know what it was in the past. It should make us stronger, more proud of what we've been able to accomplish."

Practice begins in earnest for the MC baseball team, in preparation for the first game of the season on Feb. 28.

The Maryville College baseball team will be looking to improve upon its 19-17 mark of a year ago as it begins the 1992 season at home against Adrian of Michigan on Feb. 28 at 3 p.m.

The Scots will again host Adrian in a doubleheader the following day beginning at 11 a.m..

According to head coach Brian Wajert, "pre-season has gone really well so far." Wajert did not hesitate to add, however, that the team has suffered one disappointing mishap.

John Roszell, a freshman out of Fort Meyers, Fla., and potential starter for the Scots, broke a bone in his wrist during practice earlier this year. Nevertheless, assistant coach Eric Etchison insisted that "when John get's back, he'll be a star."

When asked what the key to this year's season would be, Wajert emphasized the team's "ability to score runs.

Our starting pitching is good," Wajert said. "But we're going to be facing see Baseball, p. 8

February Meetings are now

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Ever since Dr. Isaac Anderson founded Maryville College, February Meetings have been a part of its heritage.

According to official college records, the meetings began as a series of special services at New Providence Presbyterian Church. After the war, the college continued to support these services. These services are now known as February Meetings. February Meetings are on the 18, 19 and 20 this year, so we are in the midst of them as you read this.

In the past these meetings have provided spiritual revival and have served as a spiritual foundation for campus life, according to college records. The 1992 meetings are designed to help with the development of the mind, body and spirit. "Mental, Emotional, Spiritual and Sexual Survival in the 21st Century" is the theme of this year's February Meetings. The speaker will be Dr. George Verwer.

Verwer currently resides in England with his wife Drena and his three children. Verwer attended Maryville College and transferred to Moody Bible Institute.

In 1961, Verwer and his wife went to Spain and founded Operation Mobilization. O.M. is a program designed to train young people to be missionaries.

Stephen Nickle, M.C. chaplain, urges students to attend the meetings.

"I invite people to come if only to participate in the history, secondly to hear a world renowned speaker relate his understanding of the Christian message and how it impacts his life and thirdly folks might learn something from it about their own faith."

According to Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, all offices will be closed from 11-12 a.m. on the three days of February Meetings. Classes will not meet on Wednesday at 11 a.m.

For more information about these meetings, contact Nickle at the Center for Campus Ministry.

coaches how to spend their dollars," she said. She added that the athletic department tries to rotate the budget so that only two teams a year get new uniforms.

Schram gave several reasons for the fact that men's sports are often budgeted more money than women's.

Sports like football, she said, have more players and require more protective gear than other sports. Travel is more expensive for men because "they are bigger and they eat more," she said. She added that the men's teams are often forced to travel more because they do not belong to a conference.

"We have some of the top teams in the country and not everyone wants to play us. That is why we are trying to find a conference, so people will have to play us," Schram said. "The biggest part of our budget is allocated for travel, and the women's conference regulates that."

Wyatt also mentioned less tangible expenses that students usually are not aware of.

"Our student-to-faculty ratio is phenomenally low," she said. "That kind of small-group learning, especially the senior thesis, costs a lot of money."

Baseball

some tough competition from the northern schools early in the season. If we can get through that though, there will be a good possibility that we'll have a successful season."

Along with senior Thad Rhodes, the diamondmen will again look to seniors Scottie Cline and Clint Boling for leadership this year.

According to Wajert, "those three guys are capable of carrying a ballclub. They're just that good."

The coaches will also look to the consistency of senior Jason Jenkins, recipient of last year's Most Improved Player Award, to contribute this season.

With only four seniors returning for the Scots this year, the coaching staff is not only excited about this season, they're already looking forward to the future and the potential success that lies ahead.

Some of the Scots' younger talent consists of, among others, junior pitcher Scott Watson; sophomore pitcher Tim Glisson, who Wajert says "has looked really good during pre-season;" and John Dalton, a freshman out of Maryville High School who, according to Coach Etchison, "will be a good, steady player for us this year."

that the college continually looks for ways to tighten up the budget. "I've seen fat, but there is not much fat at Maryville College. Last year MC had a $100,000 contingency fund and used it for scholarships, while this year it only has $5,000. There is no magic slush fund, no room for anyone to fall," he said.

He added that over the last ten years, the college has shifted from spending more money on administration and plant operations to spending more on students.

Junior senator David King suggested that "students who have been here longer seem to have more trouble getting financial aid than incoming students."

In response, Wyatt said, "Historically, financial aid has been used as a recruiting tool and not as a teaching tool. We want to turn that tide."

*"Love Your Mother," the 1992 Maryville College Spring Community Forum, will focus on the environment in five presentations lasting through April 30. ## President Ferrin responds to concerns over tuition rise

This interview was conducted by Michelle Hall and Don Evon of the Echo Staff.

Q. The Green Letter states that "the financial obligations of the college will increase more than $800,000," yet the increase in tuition will be roughly $1500 for about 900 students. So what happens to the extra money that is apparently unaccounted for?

Ferrin. Let's do the mathematics. We have about 830 students this year, and 130 of those are evening students who are paying a much lower rate. So this tuition increase is really affecting about 700 students. A little less than two-thirds of those students live on campus. So the $1400 increase really applies to about two-thirds of 700 students.

Q. Will financial aid for present and incoming students increase, and, if so, how much? The Green Letter states that the college will keep its promise to meet 100 percent of students' need as determined by the Financial Aid Form. But when that help comes in the form of loans which students must pay back, even at a low interest rate, how much help is it really?

Ferrin. The college has a formula that becomes a rule of thumb. Whatever the student's need is, roughly 60 percent of that is met through grants or scholarships. Whatever the increase is, if there is no greater ability to pay from the family, we will assume 60 percent of that increase. So if a student had a need that increased $1400, 60 percent of that would be met with increased grants. The other 40 percent would have to come from a combination of work and loans.

Q. With the presidential scholarships (full tuition) for new students being lowered to four for next year, does that mean that there will be an increase in other types of scholarships, such as dean scholarships (one-half tuition)?

Ferrin. What I want current students to know is that there are not going to be changes in the financial aid program that will negatively affect the current students. Any changes, such as reduction of presidential scholarships or redistribution of financial aid

see Ferrin, p. 8

"There are not going to be changes in the financial aid program that will negatively affect the current students." President Ferrin

Wyatt urges Student Senate to get more involved

by Beth Bishop
Echo Staff

The student senate's role in the overall governance of Maryville College was the topic addressed by Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, at the Feb. 27 senate meeting.

Using a written overview of the college's Government Manual, Wyatt discussed the functions of various groups which work under the headings of "Faculty," "Staff" or "Student" committees. Wyatt stressed the involvement of students in all three of the divisions, a fairly new development in MC governance.

"Eight years ago, students were not involved, and until three years ago, staff were excluded," Wyatt said. She went on to explain that each division has certain functions that are largely independent of the other divisions. Frequently, though, the divisions work together with broader issues and decisions which affect more than one aspect of campus life.

The focal point of Wyatt's discussion was an emphasis on student involvement in Maryville College governance. She pointed out that since half of the college's income is from tuition and fees, "the power base at this institution is the students." The responsibility which accompanies that power, Wyatt explained, is absorbed largely by the student senate. She

Students advised to take responsibility for insuring financial aid for next year

by Karen Beaty

When Maryville College's "Green Letter" went out to students nearly a month ago, it heralded two historical events: one, the price of tuition was increasing; and two, for one day, campus mail didn't go straight into the recycling receptacle. The news was read and talked about all over campus.

Unfortunately, a tuition increase is not only the concern of prospective students. Regardless of whether a student is a presidential scholar or a church-in-college scholar, his or her financial aid package is affected.

When asked if financial aid packages would be adjusted proportionally to the tuition increase, Director of Financial Aid Ventita Jones stated: "We try to meet 100 percent need," but went on to say that "there are no guarantees." Guaranteeing that students will be considered for financial aid is their responsibility and that of their parents, and that process involves some very simple and some very complex steps and regulations, Jones indicated.

First of all, a student must fill out a Financial Aid Form (FAF) and send it in. For the 1992-93 academic year, the Maryville College Financial Aid Office is making it mandatory for all students who desire any type of financial assistance or job on campus (be it resident staff, departmental help or lifeguard) to fill out an FAF.

Jones stressed that "unless someone comes to Maryville College expecting to pay the whole bill, he or she must fill out that form."

Jones said that regardless of whether or not students qualify for federal aid, the increase in Maryville College applicants may better the school's chance of receiving more federal aid, as the college's need would appear to be growing. Also, another

Campus paranoia and rumors jeopardize community spirit

The Echo strives to be a representative of students, faculty, staff and administration. As the campus voice, we try to speak for the college as a community. In the present climate on campus, this has become increasingly difficult. The campus has become polarized over the issue of whether the administration's commitment to ensure a drug-free environment is jeopardizing our sense of community. The issue has moved beyond the topic of drugs, paraphernalia and handbook policies, and can no longer be discussed in terms of rules. It has become necessary for us to reevaluate our definition of "community."

Student development representatives have assured us that there is not a "drug problem" on this campus. But the fact that three students have been suspended already this year is disturbing. Does this indicate that Maryville College is facing a crisis in student drug abuse or does it indicate that the situation has been blown out of proportion? If there is no problem, then student development seems to be overreacting.

Supposing that there is a problem — that some individuals may need help — then the response of student development would seem to be even more inappropriate. Students who have been suspended describe the process as impersonal. They describe being referred to as "Student A" or "Student B," being sent to student development by an "informant" and being asked to "inform" on other students. This kind of language seems inappropriate for a college campus and learning environment. Such "search and seizure" theatrics have no place in a "community."

And the paranoia is contagious. Rumors of "lists" of "undesirables" have students eyeing staff, administration and even fellow students with suspicion. It is a dangerous situation when a mere word of suggestion or implication by a single person is enough to send the entire staff of student development knocking on doors. This tension pervades every aspect of student life, and is especially stressful for those students who live, work and go to class all within the confines of this campus.

Surely a community cannot be successful if the students are paralyzed by fear. Again, it is more than just a question of rules or laws, but a question of motives. Do we want to help students, and if so, how can we do that most effectively? The answer seems to lie in respect for each other as community members and in communication. When we cross those boundaries of basic respect for one another, our community suffers. The solution to this problem may be as simple as talking to one another.

Maybe now is the time to do more than just pay lip-service to the idea of a "new era of candor and inclusiveness." While we are still a community, these issues need to be addressed openly. Although student development's presence at the recent "Tea Party" was a step in the right direction, there is a need to look at the issues in more depth and possibly to explore alternative handbook policies such as the covenant. The Echo proposes a special community meeting which would provide a setting for the same type of debate on a larger scale. The health and fate of our community depend on our coming together. The ingredients are there. We simply need to decide when and where. There is no better time than the present.

Tennesseans not interested in education of children

by David N. Parisi
Echo Columnist

I am extremely lucky. I'm lucky to be in college and fortunate enough to live in this state.

I am fortunate enough to have a private education, something that I have been a part of for almost twelve years. I hope that I've learned something in that time. I appreciate this education that I've been given and I thank my parents for it. However, some aren't as fortunate.

In Campbell County, about an hour from here, the school busses just started running again. The first time since October. This problem is due to a lack of funding for the Campbell County School Board.

Bussing always seems to be a problem with public schools. In the case of Campbell County, it's a different story. When the busses don't run, students don't go to school. There is no other way for most of these students to get to school other than in a big, shiny, yellow bus that says CAMPBELL COUNTY SCHOOLS on the side.

It took an ABC news broadcast about the plight of the Campbell County school system to attract any attention. Scores of donations from as far away as Maine were sent to the board of education after Peter Jennings first reported this story in late October.

These donations will only last until April.

You might find this interesting. Curious George was in Knoxville a few weeks ago, bragging about his new Secretary of Education, Lamar Alexander. In his re-election hoopla, Bush boasted about how well this state is doing economically and educationally. Exsqueeze me!!! If everything is so fine and dandy, if your wonderful Secretary would have done his job eight years ago, Campbell County would have enough money to send its students to school on a bus and Tennessee would be ranked higher than 48th in national educational standards.

I guess ol' George was off trying to save the world when all this went down and he just didn't know about it.

Currently, the state is trying to pass a .5 percent sales tax hike in an effort to compensate for the short comings of the state education budget. Oh, right, this is going to help a lot. Make everyone, including those who can't afford it, pay for education by imposing a tax on virtually everything.

A sales tax won't work, a state income tax will. Think about it: 3 percent-4 percent of a person's income that could include even more exemptions than the IRS stipulates. This way those who are tax exempt can still send their kids to school and not have to worry about the bus showing up every morning.

In addition, the revenue generated by this tax could go to schools throughout the state. These "less fortunate systems" could pay for more teachers, supplies, even new schools.

Maybe, just maybe, a few extra million would bring Tennessee's ranking up from the bowels of educational standards to the pinnacle of excellence that it needs so desperately. (If you were a CEO, would you want to set up shop here??)

What a great state to live in. Let's go down to a UT game, drink hillbilly moonshine and Jack Daniels' until we can't see. Forget about paying for our future by funding schools, Tennesseans don't need no damn education. Southern logic, ain't it great, Bubba?

Just one more thing before I quit. Those of you who plan on living here, I have some advice. Go ahead, get married, buy a house, start a family, and do all that good family type stuff, but send your kids to school in New York or Maryland or Ohio, anywhere but here. You see, this here state jus dont kare 'bout no dad-burn edjewkashun.

Questions for those in the know

Dear Editor:

This academic year has raised many questions, the answers to which a great number of students (including myself) are ignorant. Since I am unable to answer these questions, I will instead pose just a few of them.

Why were students _____, _____, and "B" suspended or forced to withdraw from school without the college allowing its counseling facilities to perform their functions? Would this alternative have saved time, money, an academic career or even a life?

Why were the "Copeland 5" harassed and/or disciplined for smoking herbal tea?

Is Student Development really so incompetent as to mistake "Red Zinger" for Panama Red?

Is there a list of "undesirable" students on campus?

Are there "informants" in our midst?

Do these code names contribute to my feeling we're in Occupied France?

Is Student Development truly trying to build community on campus?

If someone with the correct answers to these questions would let me know, it would be much appreciated.

Sincerely,
Christopher Ryland

February Meetings a disappointment

Dear Editor:

On the week of Feb. 17, I attended two of the three February Meetings. I was there because I am interested in intellectual discussion and enjoy listening to respected scholars bring new ideas to this campus.

Even though I am fully aware February Meetings is an historically religious event, I attended the worship services with optimism and interest.

Unfortunately, I was disappointed. Instead of being a theological lecture, which I was expecting, the hour was instead an advertisement for George Verwer and "OM." It seems Mr. Verwer is an administrative missionary who sells books while converting heathens.

I know February Meetings is a minor affair with a small budget, but I also know the speakers we invite to our campus mirror the concerns of the administration. I assume the choice of Mr. Verwer was a deliberate decision. Therefore, I must infer the college has decided to embrace the religious intolerance missionwork symbolizes.

Nevertheless, I do refuse to believe Maryville College is deliberately ignoring its commitment to religious scholarship and free-thought. With that commitment in mind, I request that the next time Maryville College invites a speaker on a religious topic to campus, it be a scholar who has something to say.

Sincerely,
Christopher Ryland

On Japanese bashing and the lack of cultural understanding

by John Worth
Echo Staff

Most people are aware of the recent Japanese American relations, or at least the strife therein. Almost every evening on the national news there is a story on some recent development between the two countries, some area where anger is building. But how many people read the print media? These are the people truly informed.

For those people who are behind in their news, I will give a little background. The Japanese will not buy American goods, but Americans buy a lot of Japanese goods. This creates a trade deficit, somewhere on the order of $42 billion. General Motors recently announced that it would be laying off some 25,000 workers. Naturally the workers got mad at Japan (after all, they can see the Japanese car driving down the street, a convenient scapegoat).

George Bush, along with several American heads of corporation, took a little trip to the Pacific and tried to get the Japanese to loosen their trading habits. The response came a couple of weeks later in the form of insults from some Japanese politicians, who said that American workers were lazy and did not work hard. To top it all off, a Japanese company wanted to buy the Seattle Mariners in order to keep the team in Seattle (how many people would have protested if, say, Alberta, Canada had made the offer? There are already teams in two Canadian cities. Why is this country different from Japan?).

All this did not go over well. Since that time there has been a growing anti-Japanese mood in America. The president of a Japanese college was shot and killed in Boston; a Japanese family man from "middle class America" met the same fate. A small Toyota car was given a good going over with a sledge hammer by some angry auto workers.

These are the stories told on the news. Television, however, should not be the source of our news but an overview of the day's most important events. Magazines and newspapers are the places to find the whole story.

How many people, for example, are aware of the true agenda Bush was supposed to follow when he went to Japan in late December? Seemingly very few. He took the tour to secure peace in the region and to deal with more diplomatic matters. But Bush changed the topic, thus insulting the Japanese.

And how many people are aware of the insults spoken by auto mogul Lee Iacocca (whose new Chryslers are made in Japan by Mitsubishi)? He insulted the Japanese business practices and the men who run them. This was before the Japanese insulted the US.

The trade deficit with Japan is astoundingly high. Yet three-fourths comes from the automobile industry. Most of the rest is in the area of computers and raw materials. In the agricultural market, however, there is a trade surplus. The Japanese buy most of their meat from the United States, and one-third of the soybean exports are taken to Japan. There is a genuine and very well founded fear among the American farmers that all of the pressure being placed on the government to force the Japanese to even the trade market will hurt them, when the gripes are coming from the auto industry. So let's look at that problem.

The Japanese will not buy American cars largely because the steering wheel is on the wrong side. American auto companies will not put the steering wheel on the right side until the Japanese buy more American cars. It is a concentric circle.

The Japanese will not buy American cars because the metric system has not made its way into the American auto industry. Why should every mechanic in Japan be forced to buy a whole different set of tools to work on American cars. Yet GM, Ford, etc. will not retool the plants to equip the cars with metric bolts.

The rest of the world does not depend on the automobile like Americans. In Japan it costs over a thousand dollars to get a driver's license, and the recipient has to go through weeks of special classes. In addition to this, gasoline costs four or five dollars a gallon (at the cheapest), and the rail system is extensive, so why drive when you can ride the train?

An opinion voiced by many is that the Americans no longer have a scapegoat. For 40 years the cold war was blamed for all of the country's woes. Japan is beginning to take over that role. This is extremely unfair to the Japanese. The recession is not as strongly connected with the Japanese as it is still with the cold war (remember the arms race and Reagan's large military spending?).

The American auto industry is in a sense largely responsible for the anti-Japanese feelings. It is very unfortunate that auto workers will be laid off. They cannot help being angry. But that anger should be directed at the company and not at the Japanese. It is the American auto manufacturer who has allowed plants to become technologically inferior, and the workers are inferior to Japanese because the machinery used in the Japanese auto industry is so advanced that the workers must be highly skilled to operate them. It is the American company that has caused all of the employment problems.

How many people truly understand Japanese business practices? The highest official in a Japanese auto plant makes right at four times that of the lowest worker and no more. In America there is no ceiling on the income of CEO's. If the janitor in a Japanese plant takes a cut, everyone takes a cut. The general manager of GM received a raise as the same time the employees went without Christmas bonuses and were laid off. Japanese plants are opening in America. American plants are opening in Korea and Mexico.

Many people are upset by the strong influx of Japanese businesses. But do people really understand the cultural mindset of the Japanese? Most older generation Americans (those who lived through WWII) are strongly anti Japanese, mainly because of Pearl Harbor. Yet most Japanese of the same generation are pro-American, realizing that America is the reason for the prosperity. Many Japanese CEO's wish that their government would be a little more lenient on the Americans, and are very sorry that the recession is somewhat their

by David Roberts
Echo Columnist

Well, have no fear. The next installment of Dave's List Of Things You Ought To Be Thinking About, Even When You Would Rather Be Drinking A Beer is coming up. — As the late Fred Mercury of Queen used to say, "another one bites the dust." That's right, yet another student has been issued his walking papers for possessing drug paraphernalia. I don't know many of the details for sure, but I have heard several rumors.

— Recently some students in Copeland were reprimanded quite severely for smoking herbal tea in their room. Tea. As in Lipton. What? Did they slip another rule into the handbook while we weren't looking? I understand the students were punished for "intent to deceive".

— Well, did you guys read the last issue? Apparently, we are getting a $19,000 education for a piddling $13,000. What a bargain! I guess none of us can complain next year when we get it for a mere $14,000, or the next year, when we get the incredible deal for only $15,000.

— I received several letters about my last column, and I thank everyone who took the time. Please continue to send ideas, etc. I'm considering sending out a questionnaire to everyone regarding some juicy topics on campus, so watch for it.

Now, with that drudgery out of the way, we return to:

DAVE'S LIST OF THINGS YOU

OUGHT TO BE THINKING ABOUT, EVEN WHEN YOU WOULD RATHER BE DRINKING A BEER.

Since we dealt with such heavy topics last issue, I thought in this issue we might deal with some of the perennial, though sometimes goofy, questions that people have always asked.

1. Which came first, the chicken or the egg?

Possible answers:

— The chicken: if God went around creating animals, then he would create animals, not eggs. Besides, who would keep the egg warm to hatch?

— The egg: perhaps God created the potential for a chicken and let it develop naturally in its egg. If not, how did the chicken develop?

— Neither: evolution proceeds gradually, and there is no point at which either a chicken or an egg just popped up.

2. Is mankind fundamentally good or evil?

— Evil: if men are good, how see Dave, p. 7

Bashing

fault. By the same token, however, they are tired of playing by America's rules.

The situation is analogous to a typical parent-child relationship. The child is adopted, clothed, and sheltered by a very dominant parent. Yet the child is never allowed to stand fully on its own. When the child does develop into an adult, the parent does not want to consider it as an equal adult, but still as a child. It is time America looked to Japan as an equal, someone we can learn from, and not as the child of years gone by.

However, Japanese businesses need to change their practices. It is all too obvious that something is wrong. WWII began because the Japanese were fed up with Western influences. It was only in 1853 that the Perry forced the Japanese to open trade with the West. Before that a person faced death if caught dealing with any foreign country.

The Japanese have a talent for assimilating other cultures into their own. Quickly they became economically and militarily powerful. The feudal Shogun system was still in operation, and violence was inbred. The nation took over China and many small Pacific nations, much as the United States had done in acquiring land in the 19th century. Yet no matter how hard the Japanese tried to become a power, the empires of Britain and America prevailed. So force was used to set things aright.

Modern Japanese have a similar philosophy, except now they are using economic power to become international equals. This power has become dangerous. Japanese students at MC have expressed the sentiment that the Japanese government should give a little, much as the American government has in years past. Small American businesses are finding it increasingly difficult to break into the Japanese markets. A custom official at the docks in Yokohama can on a whim leave many crates of food or other products on the docks to rot and ruin.

The Japanese people have said in many surveys that the comments made by the Japanese government concerning American work habits were wrong; not wrong in fact, just wrong to say. There is a certain anti-American sentiment brewing in the younger Japanese generations (in the 1960's there was the same feeling, due to the dominance of America in their country). This feeling grows out of the violence of America. All that they hear about is the violence of America (further inforced by the slayings of the two Japanese and the car beating). Little is ever mentioned of the good found in many American's.

The whole problem is simple: the Japanese have a stereotypical view of the Americans, and the Americans have a stereotypical view of the Japanese. When the violence and gross stereotypes begin to interfere with the mutual exchange of culture, as can be found on this campus, then it there is a problem. MC is a place for the mind to broaden, not close. It is best to let the problems of governments be settled by governments, and let people be people.

The Maryville Tea Party on the Pearsons lawn

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff

On March 5, a number of students gathered in front of Pearsons for a silent protest over the recent expulsion of students who breached this year's new campus drug policy.

But the silence was broken when Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, and Marcia Gibson, director of campus life, met with the students to discuss their concerns, frustrations and fears over the new drug policy, among other things.

Roger Howdyshell, student senate president, said that if students want to get help for a friend with a drug problem, "we're afraid as soon as we say that the police will be called and (the friend's) room will be searched."

Wyatt restated the college policy and said that police cannot search a student's room unless someone is willing to testify in court to the fact that drugs were seen in the room. "If a friend needs help, that's not sufficient grounds for a search," she said. Wyatt added that "we want to do what is legally right."

Sarah Sawyer, junior, asked if there was a way she could come to student development and talk to someone about a friend who has a drug problem. Wyatt pointed to Bruce Guillaume, who was also present at the meeting.

"Bruce Guillaume has legally protected confidentiality," Wyatt said. "He can't be subpoenaed."

"Go to Bruce," Wyatt emphasized, "or if you don't want to go . . . to Crawford House, just call. You don't even have to give your name."

When a student asked if lists of undesirable were being kept, Wyatt said there was an academic probation list of students.

David Yocum said of such a list that there appeared to be "a conflict of interest," that students with a low G.P.A. are more in danger of getting caught with drugs than students with a high G.P.A. who have the same drug problem. "I would rank alcohol as a bigger problem than a low G.P.A.," he said.

Wyatt said that that was a good point.

Guillaume said that a low G.P.A. is "a red flag" that something is interfering with the student's academic abilities. When asked how many red flags it takes to get his attention, Guillaume said that he works on "the very first red flag" and goes on from there.

Patrick Mumpower suggested having incident sessions for drug users, similar to the incident sessions given for alcohol problems.

"It's a bit harsh to kick someone out for having paraphernalia in the room," he said.

Gibson emphasized the much-talked-about covenant idea. Amie Davis, Vance Grant and Jenni McAfferty are the members of the covenant committee appointed by the student senate.

Wyatt said that ideas for the covenant should be proposed to the committee. The covenant, shaped by the students, would replace the handbook and would be based on mutual respect and trust.

Several students agreed that work on a covenant should be started right away.

Wyatt also said that proposals can be written by students, but must pass through the student senate and be approved.

Dorm life: The Copeland 5 have tea, Gunshots hit Lloyd windows

by Matt Osborne
Echo Contributor

Whoever said life in the dorms is boring wasn't around Gamble, Copeland and Lloyd Halls last month.

On the night of Feb. 19, students living on the third floor of Lloyd Hall reported that shots had been fired at their room and lounge windows from the direction of Gamble Hall. The shots apparently came from an air rifle or BB gun. There were no injuries and little damage. But the following evening, more shots hit the eastern lounge windows on both floors, upsetting residents further.

Gamble Residence Director Larry Ervin was holding a staff meeting in his apartment when he received a call from a Lloyd Resident Assistant, who Ervin says informed him that "someone saw a gun out of a window on your building."

The R.A. informed him of the window's location, whereupon the entire Gamble Hall staff approached the students in the suspected room and wrote an incident report. The students' names have not been released.

The damage done to Lloyd Hall was minor. There are apparently eleven BB holes in the windows of the lounges at the eastern end of the hall. Two students' room windows were also struck. Fortunately, the ammunition appears to have been insufficient to penetrate forcefully. If the students responsible intended a violation only on Lloyd Hall, Director of Campus Life Marcia Gibson indicated that they have only hurt their own residence.

"Gamble Hall (staff) has tried very, very hard this year to turn around a bad reputation by some people who didn't care much about themselves or what other people think. They have worked very diligently on behalf of the residents of their hall.... I think that this was very disappointing for them," Gibson said.

Ervin agreed. When he knocked on the door of the room where the gun was seen, he said that he "turned around and saw the whole staff right there with me, and they were all mad. We had made some decent strides here, and for something like that to be coming out of our dorm just slapped us all in the face."

Gibson asks that all students with weapons of any sort read the Student Handbook policy, located on page 26:

The use and/or possession of any lethal or potentially harmful weapon, explosive, or hunting device (e.g., firearms, BB guns, pellet guns, sling shots, knives, fireworks, explosives, bows and arrows, ammunition, etc.) on College property is expressly prohibited. Weapons brought to campus for hunting purposes must be stored in the campus security office.

Such hunting weapons are available for checkout by the owner through Chief Hurst.

Another incident the previous Monday night threatens to become campus folklore. In what has been called 'the Copeland Tea Party,' five Copeland Hall residents were present during a search and seizure by student development staff members who were authorized to search for drugs and/or drug paraphernalia, only to find that the students were smoking herbal teas.

According to Copeland R.D. Mark Cate, a resident reported a suspicion of marijuana use to a staff member, who confirmed the suspicion and called the R.D. on duty, Ervin. Ervin arrived and called the director of campus life and the campus security officer to assist in the search of the room, as student staff are not asked to participate in searches.

They then knocked on the door and asked for admittance. They were granted entry and all those present agree that they received good cooperation from the students.

A thorough search yielded two pipes and many bags of herbal tea; the items were taken for testing by the Maryville Police Department and the testing revealed that the tobacco-like substance was not marijuana.

David McEver, one of the room's occupants, said there was no intention of achieving psychedelic effects, nor were any such effects achieved. However, the Copeland 5 agree that the search was conducted properly and their rights were protected. "There are no complaints by us about how they made the procedure. It's just that the idea of being accosted for smoking tea seems quite ludicrous," McEver said.

However, five people did smell what they believed to be marijuana while outside the room. Residence staff are trained to identify the scent, and Ervin and the security officer are both very familiar with the smell.

"If marijuana is smelled, we will handle the situation the same way, and we will always follow that process," Cate said.

According to Gibson, no disciplinary action was taken against the students involved in the Copeland "tea party," because there were not illegal substances present at the time of the search. The students were given formal, verbal notice of the drug and paraphernalia policy on campus to clear up an misconception and to ensure their understanding of the campus response to the situation.

Gibson also pointed out that "if you are going to participate in activities that leave the impression that you're doing something illegal, then other students and residents are going to make assumptions."

Cate is adamant that his staff handled the situation well. "(They) handled it appropriately, and I'm not embarrassed by any matter of the way it was handled."

Gibson pointed out that many recent incidents show a need for individual responsibility and thoughtful action. "People who assume that there is no harm in what they are doing need to stop and think about the possible consequences.... If your friend or roommate is doing something outside of the rules, you need to be person enough to stand up and say 'I think what you're doing is wrong' and excuse yourself from the situation."

MC faculty/students receive Mellon grants

by Robin Morris

Echo Staff

The Mellon Faculty/Student Research Grant is a grant that is issued through the Appalachian College Association for faculty and students in the social science or humanities division for the purpose of research. A guideline for applying for the grant is that the research must include student participation.

The 1992 Mellon Grant recipients are Dr Susan Ambler, assistant professor of sociology, and Dr Leonard Butts, assistant professor of English.

They were each granted $8,000 for summer research. Ambler will work with Dudley Hawkins and Tracey Herrick, and Butts with Jason Ezell, Michelle Hall and Christopher Ryland.

Ambler will be continuing a study which she began last summer with a fellowship from the University of Kentucky. She is conducting an oral history of an organization called Mountain Women's Exchange located in Jellico, Tenn. This organization has been in existence since 1978.

Ambler explained that the organization is a group of poor, rural women who come together in the interest to improve their communities. The group focuses on improving their educational and economical situations. The organization has had more success on developing and improving the educational aspects of their communities. Ambler explained that she got involved in the project through a college cooperative program.

Ambler said that it is important to document the work of this organization because "they are a grassroots women's organization and not much work has been done on those types of organizations."

Both students chosen to help with this project are sociology individualized majors. "The project will be beneficial to [Hawkins and Herrick] because it will help them in their careers by giving them skills to analyze and keep records, and these skills will be beneficial to their career development." One of the students intends to be a sociological researcher and the other wants to be a social worker.

Ambler, Hawkins and Herrick will be conducting interviews of women involved in the organization. The staff and board members and the founding mothers (the women who helped found the organization) are the members who will be concentrated on most. The researchers will tape record the interviews and later transcribe them into a computer. "This will be our data to analyze and a source of information to figure out important events and problems the women had in the past," Ambler explained.

Their project will begin in July and go through the end of the 1992 fall semester. Ambler stated that the project in its entirety will not be completed for two to three years. When the project is complete, Ambler said she will probably write a monograph, an extensive paper, on her research.

Butts and his student researchers intend to study the manuscripts of Ernest Hemingway that were published after his death.

Butts said that they intend to take two to three trips to Atlanta this summer to work with the manuscripts at the Jimmy Carter Library. The Hemingway Collection, at the John F. Kennedy Library in Boston, will send photocopies of the manuscripts to the Jimmy Carter Library. Butts explained that they will also have a preparatory class of instruction in manuscript study and in reading Hemingway for three weeks in May.

Butts plans to have Ezell, Ryland and Hall submit their analyses for publication.

"This is a project that meets all of the criteria of faculty-student research as defined in the grant that was accepted by the Mellon Foundation," Butts said. "First of all, it is a project that needs to be done. No one has published much on the discrepancies between Hemingway's manuscripts and the books that editors develop from them. Second, it involves the students in all aspects of the research, from initial evaluation to publication, and it provides them with the skills that they can use in graduate school. Third, it affords me the chance to get reinvolved in a project that I began two years ago but I would have not returned to for quite some time."

Butts explained that Ezell, Hall and Ryland are doing senior theses on see Mellon, p. 7

NEH goes to Roitman

Jessica Roitman, a junior religion major, has just become a recipient of a National Endowment for the Humanities grant for undergraduate, individual research.

The grant will allow Roitman to spend the summer in research on her topic — the convergence of sociology and theology.

Dr. Glenn Hewitt, assistant professor of religion and philosophy, is acting as Roitman's faculty advisor in the research.

The grant is for $2,400. In addition, Kevin Cauley, a senior religion major, has received an academic fellowship to Union Theological Seminary in Richmond, Va.

Cauley was nominated for the fellowship by the department of religion and philosophy and the dean of the college.

Both awards are highly competitive.

V.O.P. sings MC community

by Jeff Huffman

Echo Staff

The Voices of Praise (V.O.P) is one of the newest creations at Maryville College. Made up of a number of students from different minorities and different majorities, from the area and from other countries, the gospel choir has been helping spread the messages of unity and of God to the Maryville College community.

On Feb. 29, the V.O.P. had its first official concert on campus and sang a number of gospel tunes that made the audience clap and sing along. Throughout the month, V.O.P. has been performing to help get the message of Black History Month across.

Larry Ervin, the first coordinator of student minority services, organized and directs the choir.

The choir is there "to help break down walls and establish relationships," Ervin said. It is "what we need to do in every aspect of the college campus."

The V.O.P. inspires "the building of community" and "is a vehicle for people to see the Lord," Ervin added.

Ervin is the gospel director of St. John's Baptist in Alcoa, and with the help of MC graduate and Alcoa School system teacher Trent Gilmore, he has shifted the choir into high gear.

Campus beautification under way

by Kristi Giles

Echo Staff

Work is quickly being completed on the walkway construction between Anderson and Fayerweather halls.

Andy McCall, the physical plant director at MC, said that the "target date is mid-April. By spring break some things should be coming together, but weather is a big factor."

The walkway project is only one of many improvements to be made as part of the master plan for campus beautification.

Donna Davis, vice president for administrative services, explained that campus beautification plans were "started about two years ago."

"There was money available through the Tennessee Department of Conservation, a matching grant to do planning for historic structures. We sent in a proposal and they gave us $17,500, and we matched it with gifts from various places. In order to put the plan together, it took about a year."

Davis also explained some of the concepts which went into the planning for campus improvements. The goal was not only to improve existing structures on the MC campus, but to assure the preservation of its historical significance as well.

Social activity was also a concern. Davis said that part of the planning for the walkway reconstruction was devoted to "looking at campus grounds and recognizing the pedestrian nature of the campus."

"To build a community, you want people out seeing each other face to face. You want to make it convenient for them to get where they want to go and in a way that they will have natural places to congregate and to see each other."

Donors are an essential part of the completion of campus beautification projects. McCall pointed out that "donors may have a certain project that they want to do, and we're not going to do them that right. So the plan does address sequencing, but there are some projected dates."

Both McCall and Davis emphasized the importance campus beautification plays in addressing the present and future needs of MC students.

As Davis said, "the whole notion of improving the campus grounds is to benefit the student. It's part of what makes it a place where people are sure to come to a small campus that facilitates a sense of connectedness and community."

Play ball!

by Don Evon

Although the Maryville College baseball team dropped two of three games in its season-opening series with the Bulldogs of Adrian College, the diamondmen showed a lot of character and determination by refusing to give in, even when the odds were against them. The team's spirit was exemplified by the many rallies it was able to build during the series.

After dropping their season opener 5-3 which head coach coach Brian Wajert attributed partly to due partly to "first game jitters," the Scots were able to split their doubleheader the following day.

After falling behind 2-0 in the second inning of the opening game of the doubleheader, the Scots rallied for three runs in the third.

The Bulldogs countered by adding six more runs in the next two innings to take an 8-3 lead.

The Scots rallied once again in the sixth however, to tie the contest at eight runs apiece.

Still, Adrian managed to clinch the victory with a run in the seventh. Finally, in the second game of the doubleheader, the perseverance of the Scots began to pay off.

With the game tied 1-1 at the end of the first inning, three Maryville errors led to six unearned runs off of only one hit for the Bulldogs in the top of the second.

Adrian went on to add another run in the third inning to take an 8-1 lead.

"We're happy with the offensive output. Everybody came through when they had to."

Eric Etchison

The Scots began their comeback with three runs in the bottom of the third, and in the fourth inning, Clint Boling turned an unassisted double play to get the Scots out of a jam.

The diamondmen were able to capitalize on two Adrian errors by scoring three more runs in the bottom of the fourth.

Reliever Scott Solomon was able to pry the Scots out of another tight spot in the fifth, yet the Bulldogs persisted with two more runs in the sixth inning to go ahead 10-7.

But having employed the better half of their pitching staff by the end of the second game, Adrian was unable to defend against a four run Maryville rally in the bottom of the sixth. Solomon shut out the Bulldogs in the top of the seventh to secure an 11-10 win.

Scott Watson pitched a two-hitter on Wednesday to lead the Scots to a 3-2 victory over Rose-Hulman of Indiana.

"Scott Solomon and Scott Watson did a fantastic job keeping the opposition off balance," said assistant coach Eric Etchison. "We're happy with the offensive output. Everybody came through when they had to."

Later the same day, Scott Solomon threw a four-hitter, to give a 8-3 win over Ohio Northern.

After losing the first game of Saturday's double header with Wabash College of Indiana 5-2, Scott Solomon came through with a two-run single in the bottom of the seventh inning, enabling the Scots to split the two-game series.

Now 4-3 on the season, the Scots next home game will take place on Friday, Mar. 13 at 1:30 against Ohio Wesleyan.

separate literary topics and the Hemingway project will give them another opportunity to work one-on-one with a faculty member and to explore another literary topic in depth. Butts encourages other faculty members to pursue these types of projects.

Butts added that "Dean Boldon, who wrote the final application for the Mellon foundation grant that allowed individual faculty to apply for the faculty-student research grants, should be given credit for his efforts, because these kinds of grants have the potential of fostering a mentoring program that goes beyond what we are currently able to do with the senior thesis."

could such absolute evil possibly exist? Look at Hitler. Look at Stalin.

— Good: God created us in his image. If we were left untouched, we would all be caring and compassionate and we would hug each other to no end. The evil people were perverted by circumstances beyond their control, and they deserve our utmost sympathy.

— Neither: each man makes his own choices. Each man chooses his fundamental nature and is responsible for it. If man is fundamentally anything, it is selfish, i.e., concerned with the self. That can have good or bad consequences.

MC Concert Choir performs March 27

The Maryville College Concert Choir will perform their annual Homecoming concert in the Music Hall of the Fine Arts Center on Friday, March 27, at 8 p.m.

The program will include a cappella and accompanied sacred and secular music.

Part I features Renaissance motets by Byrd, Morley and Hassler, and nineteenth- and twentieth-century anthems by Tchaikovsky, Bruckner, Stanford, Gretchaninoff, Specner, Thompson, Yardumian, Manz and Nystedt.

Part II features madrigals by Morley and Gibbons; three spirituals, two by Shaw-Parker and one by Hairston; vocal jazz arrangements of "My Funny Valentine" and "When I Fall in Love;" and a medley from the Broadway hit Les Miserables.

The choir is directed by Dr. Daniel Taddie, Chair of the Division of Fine Arts.

The choir consists of 31 members, all of whom were selected by audition.

AID

advantage to filling out the FAF is that students' financial status would be automatically transferred to the college's computer system.

The FAF needs to be completed early. Dr. Sue Wyatt, dean of students, suggested sending it in before spring break. She explained that "Venita Jones is finding new external scholarships that we were not aware of before, and even though the deadlines on these applications may be in May, that money may have already run out."

Secondly, a student should not assume that the process is completed once the form is in the mail. "Students should be prepared to follow up with getting extra documentation to our office — documentation which verifies the needs and incomes of returning students and the financial aid transcripts of transfer students," Jones said.

For a lot of people, filling out the FAF is a long, complicated, and tedious process. Student development has made that easier, as Wyatt pointed out: "The RAs (Resident Directors) have been trained to help students fill out the FAFs, and they have also been trained to have initial conversations about scholarships and the financial need of students."

If the road to grants, loans or scholarships looks dark, lonely and long, it's not. Jones said that she personally looks at every financial aid package individually. "I stretch the aid as much as I can, in their benefit," she said.

When asked if she expected many students to leave Maryville College due to rising costs, Wyatt said, "Historically, there are not great losses of students when tuition goes up," and went on to add that if someone was really doubting his or her financial ability to return to Maryville College, "we would sit down with that student, re-work budgets, and find additional aid."

Ferrin

would apply to new students but would not impact current students. We are right in the middle of looking at the program for new students. A financial aid consultant has looked at the financial aid program, and there is likely to be a revamping of the program for new students. We want to use the financial aid money as wisely as we can to help students who really need it. As it stands now, four presidential and six dean scholarships will be given to incoming freshmen.

Q. At a recent student senate meeting, Dr. Wyatt explained that the tuition increase was based on the assumption that enrollment would remain relatively constant. The admissions office seems to be projecting that we are going to have a large class of incoming freshman students. If enrollment does go up enough that we would not have to cover as much of that cost, would there be some type of rebate; would tuition ever decrease?

Ferrin. Admission applications are running well ahead of last year, well ahead of any year. At this point, we also have a larger graduating class than last year. Based on the percentage of students who are likely to return, you end up with a smaller number of returning students because you have such a large graduating class. If the number of new students only goes up enough to offset the decrease in returning students, then you really have a steady enrollment, and that is the budget assumption. If we have more revenue than we expect, we would have to look at what the needs were right then.

Q. In light of the fact that tuition went up last year, is this tuition increase going to be an annual event?

Ferrin. In the last dozen years, there has been one year that tuition did not go up (in the early 1980's), and the college ended up paying for that by having budget problems that year. I would anticipate that if our costs go up, tuition will probably need to increase some.

Q. Do you think that a significant number of students will not be able to come back here next year due to financial reasons?

Ferrin. I would hate to see any student leave here who would like to be here, for financial reasons. The financial aid office and Venita Jones are anxious to work with anybody and any family who says, "I can't do it another year." If there are people who want to be here to get an education, we want them here.

Q. With the increase in tuition, the increase in the student activity fee and the decrease in the number of certain scholarships, all occurring in the same year, how would you reassure students?

Ferrin. I think it is a perception that "Oh my goodness, I'm not going to be able to afford this." That probably is not going to be true for most students. Some students may benefit from a new piece of legislation, the Higher Education Reauthorization Act, that has recently cleared the Senate and is now headed for the House. This would increase the maximum income ceiling level to be eligible for a Pell Grant to $42,000, and the maximum award would go up to $3,700 from $2,400.

So I hope students do not panic and conclude that it is too expensive until they have completed all the financial aid forms and gotten them all in early enough. This is especially true for Tennessee residents who may be eligible for the Tennessee Student Assistance Award. They have many more applicants than available money and will probably run out in mid-April.

Q. The Green Letter mentions the debt and the college's commitment to debt retirement. What is the nature of the debt exactly, and how did it arise?

Ferrin. The college has about $4 million of debt from all sources, and that includes when the dormitories were built and the money being paid back to the federal government for that every year and a variety of things over the years, including the college running a deficit budget every year for several years in the early to mid-1980's. We are not adding to the deficit; we are slowly chipping away at it.

Q. The Green letter states that we have launched a "new era of candor and inclusiveness" in the decision making process and institutional planning. Just how involved were students in the decision to raise tuition?

Ferrin. There is a group called the president's advisory council, and it is part of the governance system which consists of four people from the faculty, four from the staff, and four from student senate. In this first process, there were two students, Roger Howdyshe and Janet Gelbach, who were involved in the discussions from day one. But we need to involve all three sets of four, not just the two. It was a group pulled together this fall, representative of students, faculty and staff, but it was not the full president's advisory council, which it really needs to be.

Q. Is Vision 1994 connected to the tuition increase or is that solely in line with the capital campaign fund? Can you give us a progress report?

Ferrin. Vision 1994 is a $22 million campaign. Roughly, $5 million of that is for the annual fund, $1 million a year. So part of the campaign is to raise $1 million a year to go with tuition and the money that we get from the endowment earnings to make up the budget. Seventy percent of the budget (including financial aid) is paid for by students. The other 30 percent comes from the annual fund, endowment earnings and sources like summer conferences and bookstore earnings. Overall, we are approaching $14 million raised or pledged on this $22 million campaign. The recession is making it difficult. We have to work harder than ever — there is more competition for philanthropic dollars — but we are right on track.

It does relate; it provides money for the overall program. Part of the campaign ($2 million of the $22 million) is for learning resource development, such as the library, library automation, books and computer labs, which directly relate to the educational program.

Senate

further stressed the necessity and importance of senators striving to be accurate representatives of the whole student body.

Wyatt discussed a few issues that directly involve student opinion and accurate representation, such as a new Student Handbook. The writing of a new handbook will require a working knowledge of Maryville College government systems and cooperative teamwork on the parts of the senators, as well as clear communication with the students. Wyatt stated that a student handbook is "not a means of student oppression, but a tool for living together in a community of respect and cooperation."

In discussing current policies and student representation, the senate praised the consistency of this year's policy implementation, but there was also concern expressed that minority opinions were not being heard.

Wyatt answered this concern by indicating her desire that every group on campus be heard, considered and involved when decisions are made.

"It's not majority rules; it's consensus... I suspect that everyone on this campus wants to be respected as an individual... there must be some common ground somewhere," she concluded.

The senate also discussed alternate plans for student parking on campus which would solve immediate and future parking difficulties.

Computers/ cable t.v. to be dorm additions

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

Students campus-wide will be "on-line" beginning next year. A $2 million grant from a Maryville College alumnus, Harold D'Nero, will fund the computerization of the residence halls.

By September 1992, each residence hall room will be furnished with a desktop Hyundai, equipped with Wordperfect 5.1, campus E-mail, cafeteria menus and library listings.

Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, stated that "this is something we have needed for a long time, but it is a tremendously expensive endeavor, a cost that could only have been met by a tuition increase in the future."

Marcia Gibson, director of campus life, concurred: "This is a great idea but, until now, financially out of reach. It could have remained on the back burner for years." Gibson added that students were the first to

Comprehensive Exams Cancelled for Spring 1992

by Kristi Giles
Echo Staff

Senior Comprehensive Examinations, a longstanding tradition at MC, have been cancelled for those students who plan to graduate in May 1992.

During a faculty meeting that took place over Spring Break, faculty members could not reach an agreement about the exams.

Though faculty members did agree that there was a strong need for a change in testing the comprehensive knowledge of majors, only approximately half believed that comprehensive exams test that knowledge adequately.

After much debate, faculty members decided to cancel the April exams until a permanent solution can be reached.

Graduating seniors will not have to take comprehensive exams. This will perhaps be the first class to escape — rather, not to experience — this tradition.

The main question over the exams concerned their overall effectiveness. Faculty looked at the problem of whether or not the present testing methods used in different academic departments were indeed reflective of a student's performance. An important point of debate was that in the past many students who have been very competent in their studies have not fared well in such an intensive testing situation.

A final decision about the future of comps has not been reached. Faculty members will meet over the summer, in an intensive workshop, to discuss the issues, and students will be notified of the outcome.

So relax, seniors. Put away those horrendous stacks of study notes. Take a deep breath...you are free!

Alcohol policy revised; Lloyd to host happy hour

by Don Evon
Echo Staff

Student development administrators decided late last week to grant Lloyd Hall residents of legal age the right to consume alcoholic beverages in their rooms, so long as no one under the age of 21 is present, of course.

The decision came in response to complaints from many of the dorm's upper classmen.

"Those of us who are of legal age should have just as much of a right to consume alcohol as the 21-year-olds living in Pearsons," exclaimed senior Lloyd resident Patrick Hagerty, "I'm just sorry the decision has come so late, not that school policy has kept me from drinking beer in my room up to this point."

According to Lloyd Resident Hall Director Leigh-Anne Cofer, "the older students had a legitimate claim, and we decided to take it into consideration. Besides, I do, believe it or not, know what it feels like to want to come home and throw a few down after my classes are over at U.T."

Publications Offices Vandalized

We were appalled last week when we entered the Echo office in Fayerweather Hall to find that vandals had managed to circumvent the elaborate security system and damage valuable resources for student publications.

Upon close examination, we discovered the following missing materials and items:

- light tables used for laying out the Echo, Chillhowan and Impressions.
- color scanner and color laser printer.
- five dual-age monitors for doing page layout and design.
- sheet-fed waxing machine for page paste-up.
- five computer desks.
- five filing cabinets.
- five Macintosh computers.
- assorted knives and scissors.
- wall-to-wall carpeting.
- air-conditioning unit.
- curtains and shades.

In addition, the vandals left huge holes in the ceiling through which the plaster lathing can be viewed. The plaster itself, in hunks from 2-foot square to a few inches, lay scattered upon the floor in great dusty piles.

We abhor such violence done to college property, and we are working closely with campus security and the local police to apprehend the knaves responsible for this attack on press freedom.

The equipment and materials and supplies will be replaced, of course, by increasing the percentage of the student activity fees that are allocated for publications. Last year, as you recall, the fees were increased 200 percent, so that now we are able to fund student activities adequately.

MC named most communal campus

Congratulations are in order for our college. In a recent survey by Jane's Fighting Ships and Liberal Arts Colleges, MC was named the most communal campus in America.

Although college officials seemed a little puzzled by the designation, students celebrated by exchanging clothing, cooking and eating together, and frolicing (under strict supervision of student development) on the commons.

According to an assistant editor at Jane's, the communal designation is given each year to the college that most faithfully adheres to "values of the past," including but not exclusively those of the 1960s, which is about as far back as anyone on our campus can remember anyway.

So give a hug. You deserve it, you far out dudes!

Junior Molly Hewa is one student who actively campaigned for computers in residence rooms. "I never did understand why it couldn't be done on a campus as small as ours. We only have five dorms. Now I don't have to go to the library to see if we have a certain article or book. I don't have to go to the post office everyday. I don't have to waste a trip to the cafeteria when they are having green bean casserole. I don't even have to go to class; I can send my homework to my professor by computer."

Senior Chris Millsaps said that he was excited about the computers, too. "There are some days when you just can't make it to class, especially 8 o'clock classes, and it is nice to be able to just put your homework in the computer and not worry about walking all the way to your teacher's office or being penalized for late work," he said.

Wyatt said that she sees the computerization of the residence halls as the answer to several problems. She pointed out that it would decrease the large amount of paper presently used in campus communications. "Campus-wide bulletins could be entered into the computer and students could view them at their convenience," she said.

Wyatt also said that many faculty members had expressed concern about requiring students to turn assignments in on computer disks, even though not all students have a personal computer. They also cited problems with compatibility of the Anderson and Sutton labs and student complaints about losing work in those computers as reasons to put in individual computers.

Dr. Leonard Butts, assistant professor of English and director of the Anderson lab, said that the grant committee chose the Hyundai computers because they are "reliable and affordable and are not made in America."

Wyatt said that the D'Nero grant committee is already considering possible uses for any money that remains after the dorm computerization. Some possibilities include fax machines for every room and big-screen televisions with cable television in each room. "Students have expressed a desire to have MTV and ESPN at their fingertips 24 hours a day. We are doing what we can to accommodate them. We want to offer a comfortable, relaxing environment for our students."

Harold D'Nero is a 1956 graduate of Maryville College with a double major in religion and business.

'Leadership Challenge' asks more than academic smarts of new presidential scholars

Responsibilities to include campus and community involvement

by Karen Beaty
Echo Staff

Beginning next year, being a presidential scholar will have new meaning.

Of course, it will still mean that those students chosen to receive the full-tuition award will never have to worry over the rising cost of attending Maryville College, but instead they may find themselves worrying over the responsibilities required of them, as sketched out in Maryville College's new Leadership Challenge program.

The program, a culmination of ideas shared by Dr. Richard Ferrin, Dr. Sue Wyatt, Dr. Dean Boldon, and Mr. Dave Powell, will require that the incoming presidential scholars of the freshman class get involved in some aspect of campus and community life. Other than maintaining a 3.25 GPA, they must, during their four years, help in a tutorial program, attend some honor classes and participate in a short leadership seminar.

We don't want them to become leaders for the school's sake, but for their own.

Dave Powell

Junior presidential scholar Doug Hof finds merit in the challenge: "I think it's a great program. The school is giving Presidential scholars a lot by giving them full-tuition scholarships and up until now has only asked that they maintain a 3.25 GPA. Part of the interview process is choosing someone who has leadership abilities. In the past, some presidential scholars haven't been that involved."

that it is "only right that a Presidential scholar exemplify leadership; otherwise one really wouldn't be worthy to receive the scholarship."

Dave Powell, the faculty member asked to serve as the program's advisor, wants to make sure that presidential scholars don't feel like it is a burden to get involved, and thinks that such a program and requirements are long overdue: "Before now, we've really not paid attention to these students. We're focusing on this group to make sure they are fulfilling their potential. For them, it's an opportunity to learn, to lead, and to excel." He went on to say, "We don't want them to become leaders for the school's sake, but for their own....The title is well thought-out. We're challenging them to challenge themselves."

Defining the program seems to be almost as hard as defining leadership. Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, thinks that part of making the program a success is "determining what leadership means in this day and age." Wyatt looks at the program as "improving the impact of Presidential scholars on campus."

Powell expounded: "The quality of leadership has nothing to do with personality. Being a leader means that someone has the ability to organize, persuade people to work for or with others, be optimistic and creative, and most importantly get the job done."

Of course, Powell does not expect all freshman scholars to run for class president, student senate or hall council. "It is such a confusing time for them. I mean, they spend 90 percent of their time being homesick. These requirements are spread out over four years. Some are more specific, others more general. A student can decide when they can fulfill these requirements," he explained. From here on out, Powell, as the advisor, will sit down with each first-year presidential scholar individually and see that the expectations are being fulfilled, then he will monitor the student's progress each year.

In the past, some presidential scholars haven't been that involved.

Doug Hof

Overall, Powell is very optimistic about the program. "I think we can make it work. I wouldn't have taken this on if I hadn't thought it was worthwhile and for the benefit of the students. We still don't know much about the program, and nothing is written in stone, but if something doesn't work, we'll dump it."

Wyatt hopes that the participants in the leadership challenge will share their criticism: "Hopefully, we can evaluate, improve and remain committed to its success."

Powell has a vision for the program. He sees this as an opportunity to bring the Presidential Scholars together. Obviously they will not all have the same interests, but with the program implemented, he thinks they will share some of the same experiences. He defined it as a potential fellowship, whereas in the past they have had nothing to hold them together as a group. Ultimately, Powell hopes that the junior and senior presidential scholars will run the program themselves: "Peer leadership is, in some ways, more effective. And their organizing it would be a part of fulfilling their leadership requirement." As for now, he views his new position as his own leadership challenge.

EPA statistician concerned with fluff

by John Worth
Echo Staff

The Community Forum series on the environment continued March 26 with a speaker from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

Dan Reinhart is a statistician who began life as a government employee at age 40. His department is in charge of determining the extent of the spread of toxic substances. He concentrated his lecture on how to get information about environmental problems to the general public.

"To make [environmentalists] happy, communication must be broadened — communication between the scientists and the general public," he said.

The example used by Reinhart was the steel salvage industry. He presented some slides that showed how steel, primarily from automobiles, was shredded and separated. The process, he said, has many grey areas.

One problem is in the "fluff," or miscellaneous material that is unsalvageable. The exact chemical make up of some of the fluff showed a high probability of containing PCB's, a known carcinogen that is easily absorbed and stored by human and animal life.

Reinhart ended his lecture by discussing the EPA's role in the modern environmental movement. He said that the agency must follow the current environmental legislation. Legislators will create legislation only as a means to appease the constituents, he stated. The voters will not pressure Congress to change legislation until awareness is increased, and awareness will not increase until communication expands between the scientists and the people, he added.

It is a complicated process, Reinhart emphasized, but stated that he and his department can only do so much. Only when the laws change, he said, will the environment improve.

Dear Editor:

The article by John Worth does an excellent job of explaining the American trade deficit.

Worth built a fact-laden case against the American auto companies.

Hopefully more Americans will realize the same facts Worth stated — especially the extremely ignorant who abuse foreign products with sledge hammers (probably foreign made).

Community Forum speaker makes a career out of dirt

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Mary Beth Adams, Ph. D., was the speaker March 5, in the MC Community Forum series on the environment. She is a supervisory soil scientist for the USDA Forest Service. Adams lives and works in Parsons, W. Va., in the Appalachian mountains.

Adams explained that her job involves being a project leader of a research branch that is organized around forestry projects. Adams said that the USDA is a land management agency that provides information to the Forest Service and to Congress about environmental and ecological situations.

Adams obtained a bachelor's degree in forestry and a master's degree in soil science from Purdue University, and a Ph. D. in soil science from North Carolina State University.

Adams asserted that she had wanted to be a veterinarian when she was growing up until she got her first high school job with the National Wildlife Refuge. She spent a summer building trails or picking up trash in forest areas.

Adams explained that the job taught her about the environment.

"From that I decided I really enjoyed it and for the next three summers I worked there and then I decided I wanted to go into forestry," Adams added.

Adams stressed that each person can do something to help the condition of the environment.

"So many of the problems we have are a direct result of us being energy gluttons," Adams commented.

Adams presented a list of things people can do to save energy:

1. Recycle aluminum, glass, paper, and plastic;
2. Change your dependency on the automobile;
3. Always turn off lights when they are unneeded;
4. Keep doors and windows shut;
5. Watch out for faucets with drips or leaks;
6. Learn as much as possible about the environment—question what you read, it is not always right.

Adams said that soon federal recycling will be mandatory, but we should take the initiative to recycle because "everything we do has an impact and we can't throw anything away because there is no place for it to go."

Adams emphasized that "our world is a compact, complex place [and we should] be aware and try to understand it. Solutions are not simple."

Roitman NEH grant focuses on theorists

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Jessica Roitman, junior, has received a National Endowment for the Humanities Grant, as announced in the last issue of the Echo.

According to her adviser on the project Dr. Glenn Hewitt, competition for NEH grants is tough, and Roitman said that when she received notification of the grant, she was thrilled and excited.

Roitman, a religion major, will receive $2,000 at the beginning of the summer to do extensive research on a topic approved by the NEH foundation. Hewitt, assistant professor of religion and philosophy, will receive $400.

The topic of her research is social theory, prophesy, and theology in contemporary society. The title of her research is "Where Have All The Prophets Gone?"

Roitman explained that she will be studying social theorists Peter Berger and Robert Bellah in sociological and theological perspectives.

Roitman asserted that she will explore "how their social theory has assumed the role of prophesy in society." Roitman added, "By prophesy I am referring to the role assumed by the ancient Hebraic prophets, which is that of pointing out societal ills and pointing the way towards viable solutions for those ills."

Roitman had already researched the topic in great depth before she applied for the grant. She had to submit a tentative bibliography and a list of her qualifications before receiving the grant. Hewitt had to submit a list of his qualifications and credentials, also.

Hewitt was enthusiastic about Roitman's project. "It [her project] is relevant and current. I don't know of anyone else who is doing exactly the same thing — it is original research," Hewitt commented.

Roitman plans to live in Maryville this summer so she can have her research completed by the deadline: September 30.

Scots close out season with best-ever record

*Lambert takes coaching honors;
Willinghams and Lawrence end careers*

The Maryville College Scots basketball team this season established the best record in college history, 25-4, despite ending the season with a loss to the University of Wisconsin-Platteville in the NCAA Division III sectionals held on campus March 13-14.

The loss to Platteville was doubly disappointing because the Scots missed a shot to win in the final seconds and lost the game in overtime, 87-83, and because a win would have put them into the Division III Final Four, with a chance for the national championship.

This was the second straight NCAA Tournament appearance for the Scots, and this year's achievements led to Coach Randy Lambert's being named District Coach of the Year by the National Association of Basketball Coaches.

In addition, Lambert, who is also MC's athletics director, is up for the Division III's national Coach of the Year award, the winner of which will be announced on April 5.

Lambert, a graduate of Maryville High School and of Maryville College, joined the college's athletic staff in 1980, after coaching for three years at Lenoir City High School.

He coached the Scots to an Old Dominion Athletic Conference title in 1984-85, and to a national ranking in 1987-88. Last year, the Scots set the school record for wins, with 22, and received a bid to the NCAA Division III Tournament for the first time ever.

The loss to Wisconsin-Platteville also marked the end of the college basketball careers of brothers Babatu and Amirou Willingham and of Tim Lawrence.

Babatu Willingham was selected to the NCAA All-Tournament team.

The Maryville College basketball teams compiled a combined record of 49-8 this season and now have appeared in eight NCAA tourneys.

Shannon O'Brien leaves MC football for coaching post at Kent State

Shannon O'Brien, offensive coordinator for the MC Scots football team since 1989 is leaving the college to take a coaching position at Kent State University in Ohio.

He will join the Kent State staff as wide receiver coach.

O'Brien attended MC from 1980-84, and played receiver on the football team. He took a master's degree from Lincoln Memorial University, and at the University of Minnesota was a graduate assistant on the coaching staff of Pete Cordelli. Cordelli is now the head coach of the Kent State team.

O'Brien spent two years coaching at Austin Peay University in Clarksville, Tenn., and a year at North Alabama before joining Phil Wilkes' staff at MC in 1988.

Lady Scots' successes now include four NCAA appearances/90-21 record

The Maryville College Lady Scots basketball team finished their very successful season on March 8, with a 73-71 loss to Roanoke College in the first round of the Women's Division III NCAA Tournament, held on the MC campus.

The Lady Scots were ranked fifth in the country going into the tournament, and ended the season with a 24-4 record.

This marked the fourth consecutive NCAA Tournament appearance for the Lady Scots. In this four year span, they have compiled a 90-21 record.

Maryville had beaten Roanoke twice during the regular season and nearly downed the Lady Maroons for a third time, but a last-second, desperation shot by Roanoke's Donna Cogar, from 25 feet away, went in, giving Roanoke an upset win over the number-one seeded Lady Scots.

Lady Scots coach Wes Moore termed the season very enjoyable, except for seniors Sherri Daigle and Lisa Locke having to end their basketball days at MC on such a disappointing note.

Scot softballers strive to make less count more

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

The Maryville College women's softball team has played six games, winning one and losing five, and has been rained out for four games with Tusculum College and with Austin Peay University. The win was against Chattanooga State.

Coach Kandi Schram said, "Our first team is strong, but with only 10 players we can't have a bad day. We can't get tired, get injured, or feel bad."

The roster of the team is:

Sr. Angie Lawler-outfield, pitcher, second base.

Jr./Sr. Shannon McCurry-catcher, third base.

Jr. Dena Godsey-shortstop.

So. Nikki Boop-pitcher, second base.

So. Jenny McCafferty-outfield, first base.

Fr. Heidi Jones-outfield.

Fr. Tish Hall-outfield.

Fr. Beth King-first base.

Fr. Jennifer (Sam) Sloan-catcher.

Fr. Tobi Russell-third base, second base.

"With half our team being freshman, we are just learning how to make mistakes and move on," Schram said. She said she is recruiting hard to bring in more softball players to help build a strong team for the coming years. If she can bring in 10 more softball players, there will be a fall as well as a spring softball season. Schram said that the team's strength is in defense and the weakness is in too few players.

A make-up of the Tusculum College games was played on Monday, March 30, followed on Tuesday by games at Carson Newman College. Both meetings are double-headers.

Tusculum College, ranked in the top 10 in the country in the NAIA; Carson Newman, in the top 20 last year; and Hope College, a Division III NCAA team, are the toughest teams on the schedule, according to Schram.

"Don't get me wrong — talent matters but on any given day any team can have a bad day and lose. And any team can have a good day and win against a better team. There is no in-between," Schram said.

Baseball Scots now 11-9

by Don Evon
Echo Staff

While the rest of us were packing our beach towels and swimming suits before heading off to Florida for Spring Break, the Maryville College baseball team was preparing to play.

The Scots were 4-3 heading into the break, and an 11-5 victory over No. 12 ranked Ohio Wesleyan on Friday, March 13, brought the Scots to 5-3 on the season.

On the following Sunday, the team dropped to 5-5 after being swept by Ferrum, one of the nation's best offensive teams.

Although Glenn Cullop pitched an impressive four-hitter in his first outing for the Scots (just two days after the Maryville basketball team was ousted from the national tournament), Maryville lost the game 10-6.

In the second game, the Scots could manage only two hits off of Ferrum pitcher Steve Wagner, whose fastball registers in the 90 mph range. Clint Boling had both hits while Bobby Pringle was tagged with the 6-1 loss.

On Friday, March 20, the Scots improved to 6-5 as they defeated Wittenburg College of Ohio 15-10. Scott Watson got the win and Pringle earned a save. John Dalton went 4-for-5 with three stolen bases. Jeff Rosa and Scottie Cline both homered, Mark Curtis and Blair Harrison both went 3-for-5 and Boling added two hits.

The next day, Thad Rhodes hit a single in the bottom of the seventh to drive in the winning run against Hope College in the first game of the doubleheader. Cullop was credited with the victory.

Maryville fell to 7-6 after dropping the second game 4-2. Scott Solomon was the losing pitcher for the Scots.

The doubleheader with Bethany on Sunday was rained out, as was Thursday's game with Oberlin.

After losing two to NAIA Division I Berry College in Rome, GA this past Friday, the Scots came back home to sweep Emory University of Atlanta in Saturday's doubleheader.

Finally, the Scots took 2-of-3 from Bethany in a rare tripleheader on Sunday. Besides the scheduled doubleheader, the two teams made up one of the games that had been rained out back on March 22.

The Scots now stand at 11-9 on the season as they head into their doubleheader with the University of the South at home on Tuesday at 1 p.m..

Guitarist to perform as affiliate artist

Classical guitarist Michael Chapdelaine, the ALCOA Foundation Affiliate Artist at Maryville College this year, will be on campus April 20 to May 1, and will be available for performances before school and other groups.

The appearances by the Affiliate Artist, called "Informances," are a combination of performance and explanation about the instrument, the music and the training necessary to master the instrument.

Those interested in scheduling an Informance for the dates remaining on the schedule should call Libby Rankin at 981-8203.

Chapdelaine will have a public concert on April 30 at Maryville College.

Anderson's art on display

Todd Anderson, Maryville College student from Rockford, will have a show of his work as an art major April 6-24, in the Art Gallery of the Fine Arts Center on the College campus.

Anderson is a senior art major. The art gallery is open to the public daily from Monday through Friday. There is no charge for admission.

The show, titled "La Virtue ou le Vice" (Virtue or Vice), consists of prints, photographs and a painting.

What me, make a decision?!?!

Great Decisions, a foreign policy discussion program in which the public is invited to participate, will be held on Tuesdays at the College and each Thursday at Asbury Acres. There is no charge to participate.

A Maryville College speaker will present the topic for 15 minutes, invite discussion, and give an opportunity to vote. The opening topic March 24 is "The Middle East After Desert Storm."

The campus meetings will be in the Proffitt Dining Hall at noon. The Asbury Acres meetings will be in the chapel from 4-5 p.m.

"Great Decisions 92," a briefing book with 12-page summaries of each issue, is available from the Maryville College Bookstore.

Other topics and the dates are:

- March 31: Global Refugee Crisis.
- April 7: Latin America's New Course.
- April 14: Africa South of the Sahara.
- April 21: AIDS Pandemic.
- April 28: Breakup of the Soviet Union.

Reports from the field of France

by Ayesha Dastgir
Echo Staff

France was the subject of the March 10 session of Reports from the Field. J.P. Johnson, the speaker, served an internship at the Ralston Energy Systems in the city of Ebuch. The company makes batteries and is known for its Eveready brand.

During his three-month stay, from the end of May until the end of June, Johnson found his responsibilities to be somewhat unclear.

"I spent a lot of time trying to find work.... There were no distinct jobs," he said.

Nevertheless, one of the projects he worked on was taking photos of rejected cells. The idea was to set standards for the quality of the batteries.

As for cultural differences, Johnson found the French view of the month of August to be an interesting alternative.

"Everyone takes three or more weeks vacation at the same time in August," he said. "The city was dead. Everything shut down."

Alcohol

wanted to try to keep their decision quiet until it could be formally announced to Lloyd residents at a dorm meeting this week, Cofer admitted that "once the paper comes out, I imagine that the news will get around pretty quick. According to Coordinator of Student Life Marcia Gibson, "This is just the first step toward loosening some of our stricter administrative policies. We hope to be able to make the same adjustment in the rest of the dorms next fall."

Dr. Wyatt added that "we've got a great group of mature, responsible adults here at Maryville and those who are permitted by federal law to drink should have the right to do so if they choose."

Evidently, the reason Lloyd has been chosen as the prototype for the change is because they've been the most persistent in demanding it. Furthermore, according to Gibson, "the maturity level is a tad bit higher in Lloyd since its occupancy is comprised solely of sophomores, juniors and seniors."

Cofer also hinted that Lloyd staff members were toying with the idea of sponsoring a "happy hour" in the basement of the dorm on Friday and Saturday nights from 9 p.m. to 12 a.m. All Maryville College students 21 years old and older would be invited to B.Y.O.B.. Andrew Cole has even volunteered to "spin disks" for the students' musical enjoyment. "Eventually," he said, "we'd like to invite some of the campus bands to play, just to give it kind of a bar-like atmosphere." Obviously, proper identification would be required at the door, and Coach Pavao has expressed an interest in assuming the responsibilities of the bouncer for the event.

"Our hope is that this strategy might keep more students from leaving the campus on the weekends," Wyatt explained. "Ideally, we feel that this might be safer than forcing students to drive off campus where it's legal for them to drink. We're afraid that, someday, someone's really going to get hurt (or hurt someone else) if our students keep having to leave the campus to drink," explained Wyatt.

While the new policy is scheduled to go into effect immediately, the "happy hour" plan is still in the developmental stages.

"Maybe the Friday after comps would be a good time to inaugurate that idea," Gibson suggested.

Capital Campaign Update: 'We're midway to our goal.'

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

As Vision 1994 approaches, many are asking the question "Where will all of this money come from?" Eleanor Morrow, director of development and executive director of the Vision 1994 campaign, has some answers.

According to Morrow, the total Vision 1994 goal will require over $22 million to be raised by the college. "We are approximately midway to our goal," she said.

As of Thursday, April 9, the capital campaign fund total came to $14, 092, 795. Although this figure seems to be more than half of the amount needed, Morrow explained that many of the gifts received are not for projects that were included in the original Vision 1994 plan. To reach those original goals, MC will actually have to raise more than the $22 million, she said.

She added that the goal for this year was to have raised $16 million by the end of the fiscal year on June 30, which means, despite the optimistic figures, the campaign is actually a little behind schedule.

Morrow said that whether MC meets the June goal or not, she feels confident that the overall goals of Vision 1994 will be reached.

Computerization of MC campus moves ahead

by Kristi Giles
Echo Staff

MC students can expect to see some significant improvements in the campus computer network by next fall. Plans are currently being made for such things as on-line advising, additions of faculty to the computer network and, in the near future, an integrated library system.

Leon Binder, director of data systems, said that "probably the single biggest thing that's happened is that we have added 20 faculty to the network — the campus-wide integrated network. That means that they are able to have access to all of the software that we have on the network and that they are able to exchange electronic mail with other faculty and staff."

For students, the addition of faculty to the network will also improve the process of academic advising.

Binder explained that the "on-line advising should be implemented for the next school year. When a student goes to a faculty member's office, that faculty member will have access to that student's records through the Registrar's Office and can do a much better job of advising. About half of the faculty are now on line, and about 10 more will be added next year.

Students can also expect positive changes in the college library system. "We are adding a cable to Thaw Hall, which is actually part of bringing those professors onto the network. But it's also see Computers, p. 8

Financial assistance offered for international students

by John Worth
Echo Staff

In the past international students attending Maryville College full time have been ineligible for scholarships. Next year will be different.

The financial aid department, in conjunction with International House, will be offering financial assistance next year to all foreign students taking a full schedule. A student could receive anywhere from $500 to $2,000.

Various groups on campus, answering an obvious need, asked the financial aid office if money was available for foreign students. After see AID, p. 8

Financial aid office wants to spread the wealth

by Karen Beaty
Echo Staff

There are a number of students who get paid to attend Maryville College.

Because of a combination of scholarships, loans and grants, some lucky students receive a refund check after the registration for each semester.

"That's against our policy," Director of Financial Aid Venita Jones explained. "I mean, would you pay someone to buy your product?"

Next year, there will no longer be cash refunds to students who have been awarded money above and beyond the cost of attending MC. Although this may be perceived as a change in policy, it is not. The financial aid office, according to Jones, is supposed to make sure that students are not overawarded, and next year that policy will be enforced.

"There are federal regulations on how we put together a student's (financial aid) package," Jones said. "We do not have the liberty to just do whatever we want. We would like to meet 100 percent of a student's (financial) need, but we do not have so large an endowment that we are able to do everything for all students."

The change should help more students financially, Jones indicated. The purpose is "to make the dollars available go further. We want to spread the money better, more equitably. Instead, the minority of students are receiving the majority of the money."

Jones described the financial aid see Financial, p. 8

MC awakens to celebrate spring

Many of us attended the annual Academic and Service Awards Banquet Saturday night. This year the banquet could not have come at a better time. Only days ago, we woke up to 80-degree weather. The dogwoods seemed to have exploded overnight. As we listened to 91-year-old MC alumnus Hayden Laster speak at the banquet, one story led to another, but no one seemed to mind much. Good humor abounded. We fanned ourselves with programs in time. Finally, windows were opened; a breeze drifted in. Music could be faintly heard from somewhere upstairs or outside. Nothing seemed more natural than listening to stories about what MC was like over 60 years ago. There is a certain sense of continuity that comes with the annual rites of spring.

After a prolonged winter, spring fever has taken hold of Maryville College. We've turned back the clocks. The days are longer and warmer, and everyone wants to be outside. In the dorms, the music is turned up a notch louder. Fans are brought out, but not grudgingly; the heat has not become oppressive yet. Even on the third floor of Anderson there is an occasional breeze. Everyone migrates to Lloyd beach to "study" in the sun. Students come to class without their homework but with suspicious sunburns. Frisbees and dogs and sunglasses abound, and everyday is a day to go barefoot.

In the aftermath of comprehensive exams and senior theses, our seniors let out a slow, collective sigh. Those hurdles behind, there is time to relax.

All about us we see people shaking off the drowse of winter and slipping into the easy cadence of spring. The ritual has begun.

Responsibility needed to end campus violence

Guest Column

by Beth Bishop
Echo Staff

Sexual assault. Theft. Public and private violence. And nearly all related to alcohol and drug abuse.

Scenes from a "Rescue 911" episode?

No. These things are happening weekly here at our Cozytown, U.S.A. liberal arts college. I don't know about you, but I was shocked to find that my second home is not so sweet as I had thought. It appalls me to consider that if the number of violent acts committed on this campus is not reduced, I may not be safe walking from building to building unescorted after dark.

This is reality. And there is no evil stranger at work here. WE are the violent ones. I could very likely put a face with every violent offender's name, and that is a bit hard to take. Sometimes I think I'd rather not know.

Keeping things quiet, though, is not the answer. Right now it is our biggest problem. I would bet that most of the students are not aware of how much violence and abuse occur on this campus, so most of us would not consider violence a leading concern. Well, I'm here to tell you, fellow students, that it IS a concern if any of us care at all about our standard of living, the value of our education or the people of this school.

What has to happen to reduce these dangers in our community? Responsibility for what goes on.

I am not suggesting that anyone single-handedly attempt to stop violent incidents in progress. The action involves more of an overall change in attitude.

Most importantly, we must commit ourselves to be responsible for each other. This means simply watching out for people you know, caring whether or not they make it home if they are sick or drunk, knowing where individuals in your immediate group of friends will be if they leave alone.

Also, we must make it known among ourselves that violent acts are unacceptable. It must be clear to possible offenders that they will in no way be respected or even ignored because of what they have done. We must voice our opinions in public gatherings that we as students are concerned and are willing to try to change circumstances on our campus that are conducive to violence. That means we must make attempts to learn about what occurs on our campus and

ParkMed offers alternative student health care plan

by Michelle Hall
Echo Staff

Beginning immediately, Maryville College students have the option of going to ParkMed clinic for health care services or to Blount Memorial hospital.

According to Quentin Davis, student health services task force member, an alternative to Blount Memorial was offered primarily as a result of student requests for a clinic service that was more convenient and efficient in billing. "There have been a lot of complaints about Blount Memorial and we decided to look for a service more receptive to students' needs," she said.

Bruce Guillaume, director of the life enrichment center, which handles student health services, said that he prefers not to refer to ParkMed as the "new" health services program: "It is an addition to what we already have. We are not cutting anything out; it's just another option for students."

Until now, the college paid Blount Memorial to provide clinic services to MC students at a cost of $10 per student. Maryville College paid the $10. Problems arose, Davis said, when student patients required tests such as a throat culture or lab work. When the hospital did any kind of testing, the student was often taken out of the clinic category and billed as a regular patient. Then the student would be charged for an emergency room visit, the doctor's time and any tests that were done.

Davis said that the problem worsened when the students received unexpected bills. "It just was not made clear when the student was no longer considered a clinic patient. Students would leave the hospital thinking that they were not going to be charged for the visit because the hospital is considered the college clinic."

According to the new agreement with ParkMed, students may receive clinic services there at a cost of $35 per visit. This will cover any fees resulting from lab work or special procedures (excluding x-rays and any medication prescribed) up to $100. MC will still pay $10 of the clinic visit fee to ParkMed, lowering the cost of the student's visit to $25. MC will also pay $5 for any allergy shots administered to students.

When charges exceed $100, the student will be charged for a regular office visit, and MC will not pay the $10. Davis said that ParkMed employees have agreed to clearly communicate to students when their fees have exceeded $100 so that there will be no "surprise" bills.

ParkMed will also file insurance forms for the students. Students who do not have MC insurance must bring their insurance cards with them.

Davis, who has visited ParkMed and met with ParkMed's Dr. Russell Gibson, said that inconsistent billing was not the only reason students had requested an alternative to Blount Memorial. She said that many students feel uncomfortable going to the emergency room when they only have a how we as a community can prevent violent offenses from happening. It is very easy to "mind your own business" and pretend you're not involved, but without your voice, abuses will continue to occur, and the silent, spineless majority will let them.

We do not want or need to be police for each other, watching for any slight wavering from school rules. What I am suggesting is what people should be willing to do for others they care about; it should come almost naturally, especially knowing that there is the possibility of immediate danger.

If we wish to be treated like adults, we are going to have to stop making messes (or standing by to watch) and leaving them for student development to clean up. It is not joke that freedom has a price. And the price works two ways: 1) we can take responsibility for the society in which we live and make sure it is a good one, or 2) we can let student development impose the responsibility through stricter sanctions.

Only the students can decide which price to pay. We are the problem; we must be the solution.

"Everywhere is somewhere and anywhere is nowhere."

A couple of Johns, a Greyhound, and that town of glitter and sleaze make for a Spring Break only Elvis would love

by John Worth
& John Parham

"Everywhere is somewhere and anywhere is nowhere."

So went the sage comment of a homeless man, one of the many interesting people that can be met in this world. How did we meet him? By traveling across the country during Spring Break to Las Vegas, the home of what could be the world's most desperate human beings.

The city is all lights and slot machines and very old cocktail waitresses. The streets are lit night and day; the casinos are always dark. Time does not exist there. There is no sense of when, only of how much. All that is real becomes lost in the frenzy to win a few nickels to compensate for the ten dollar bills you keep throwing the cashier.

Yet there is a certain glamour to it all. Magic must exist in a town that can make superstars out of has-beens like Wayne Newton, Rich Little, Marilyn McCoo, and Tony Orlando (a never-was). Besides that, the food is really cheap — the only hand we won was at the prime rib buffet.

If this does not make your sphincter tingle, then let us entice you further. Supposing you blew all your money within a few hours, and (just suppose) you couldn't afford to see a show (not even "Sex at Forty" starring Ilsa, from the Ilsa trilogy of films); then you could always watch the greedy people, pitying them in their avarice, while at the same time carefully examining the floor for stray coins.

If this fails, then there is a plethora of fine literature extolling the virtues of young men and women engaged in the only profession where a person can make $130 an hour — not that we'd know (ahem). One hint: avoid all people with one shoe, especially if they are wearing red jackets and eating out of garbage cans.

Vegas was, however, only a pause in our journey (some of you might be way ahead of us on this). If you have heard the story, you already know: 48 hours in Vegas, 113 hours in Hell.

You know, you never really know how many idiots there are in the world until you ride a bus for almost five days. (Keep this in perspective: Spring Break only lasts eight). Idiots may be a bit strong; perhaps they are just "special." In any case, they're scary.

Not that we are paranoid, but anyone who can hold a conversation with nothing but the empty seat beside him for eight hours (midnight to dawn) is worthy of fear. Not to mention his semi-constant (conscious?) self-beatings. As it turns out, he was the only one who had a seat to himself, though I do not think he realized this.

Although he won the award for Longest Monologue by a Mentally Unstable Male with a Captive Audience, he was trounced in the voting for both the coveted Gee, Your Sweat Smells Terrific award (by the fellow who also took home the trophy for Most Invisible Flies Caught in One Sitting), and the prized Most Droll on one Outfit award. The latter did not draw a lot of attention to himself, relatively speaking. The former, however, could not help but be noticed. His presence was made known to the bus via a large woman who pleaded of the bus driver, "You got somethin' to spray on this man? He stinks!"

Bus drivers are themselves an odd group of people. Consider the man who once put a mountain lion in the luggage compartment thinking it was dead (much to his chagrin, it wasn't). This is also the same fellow who was called out of bed (after a ten day, cross country trek) to pilot our bus; because the scheduled driver just didn't show up (hey, what the hell, it's just a group of people wanting to get somewhere). To make the trip more interesting for him, he chose two innocent young lads (ahem) as the objects of his caustic chauffeuric wit. Not just satisfied with making us, um, those two guys turn off their music, he also accused one of them of being drunk. In reply: "Nope, just a dumb-ass."

There is also a select group affectionately dubbed "DWA."

That's Drivers With Attitude. The reigning champ:

- left a group of non-English speakers at the Dairy Queen;
- warned all passengers that he was behind schedule and that he could not cancel the next smoke break but he could leave them behind (the smokers all huddled in the back of the bus with their legs clenched tightly together);
- boasted of his reputation of always being on time;
- told the smokers who insisted on breaking the no smoking policy, "I know who you are. If you light up again, I'll have an early Christmas present for you, and you ain't gonna like it;
- spent the entire four hours between Memphis and Nashville trying to score (from a line ladies; that Great Greyhound Getaway is boarding now!).

Not to be forgotten from the Bus Driver Hall of Fame is the silent man of the seat — last name Sanchez, first name E (we suppose). He navigated our bus across the Texas Wastelands, maintaining as calm an attitude as you could ask for in a driver. His virility will not soon be forgotten.

Yet, in retrospect, there was a greater meaning to it all. Some students wasted time on the beach drinking beer, staring at the opposite sex, and witnessing random urinations. Others went home, which is admirable but hardly exciting. We, instead, sought grander venues (such as purchasing a plane trip back with our "winnings").

We realized that there is a lot to be learned from the world, most of which is told to you by the crazy man beside you. Society will soon consume and conform us, with all of its trappings of pink slips, time cards, and the free market economy. We saw the multi-levels of society conversing freely with one another, and witnessed how brief moments can unite even the most astringent sects of people.

Even if you have no intentions of parleying with anyone, you can't help but be drawn into the mystique of it all. True growth occurs in odd soil (of which there is a plentiful supply on a bus). The point is, take a chance. Do something completely off the wall, because soon it would be too late.

We are everywhere, and yet here is nowhere.

"Some students wasted time on the beach drinking beer, staring at the opposite sex, and witnessing random urinations. Others went home, which is admirable but hardly exciting. We instead sought grander venues."

Earth Forum speaker says, 'One person can make a tremendous difference.'

by Robin Morris
Echo Staff

Stephen Anderson Smith, co-founder and president of the Foundation for Global Sustainability, was the guest speaker at Community Forum on April 9.

Smith is a graduate student at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville. He is studying veterinarian medicine. Smith is involved with area projects and organizations that pertain to environmental and global issues.

Smith describes himself as an activist. He said that he believes in acting on his principles. "Talk is cheap," he commented. He said to be wary of those who talk a lot about environmental change and don't seem to do much.

Smith has been arrested several times for protesting issues he did not agree with, such as the Gulf War and environmental hazards in Oak Ridge.

Smith covered a diverse array of environmental problems in his speech. He said that although there are major issues to be taken care of on the larger scale, there are profound problems here in East Tennessee that must be confronted.

The Smoky Mountain National Park, according to Smith, has trees cut down everyday to make pathways for new roads. Smith explained that there are various laws that protect the trees in the mountains, but there are none that protect the trees in the forests. Smith said that the people of Tennessee should be allowed to decide what happens to the national forest, but

When it's recycled, Where does it go?

by Jeff Huffman
Echo Staff

Recycling is usually perceived as the simple task of putting an aluminum can or a newspaper in a container, but a lot more goes on in the recycling process after the can or newspaper is discarded.

Maryville College is currently undertaking its own recycling campaign to answer the global warnings and filled-landfill predictions. Aluminum cans, newsprint, white paper, computer paper, mixed paper and cardboard are the products being recycled on campus.

Aluminum cans are being collected from tall, white boxes by Habitat for Humanity and large blue plastic cans by the Environmental Concerns Committee for the "Don't be a Dog Campaign." Most of the cans collected by both groups are taken to the Aluminum Company of America (ALCOA), with some of the cans being taken to the Maryville Vocational Rehabilitation Center.

ALCOA puts the cans through a recycling process, transforming the aluminum into new products that consume 95 percent less energy than is required to mine the metal.

Newsprint, white paper and computer paper are taken to Paperstock Dealers, Inc. of Knoxville. The paper is collected from campus offices, computer labs, the library, the center for campus ministry and the post office. Every Friday, the paper is collected by a student on work study under Physical Plant Director Andy McCall's supervision.

Mixed paper is also collected in the same areas as the other paper. It is taken to Knox Recycle Fiber of Knoxville. Collected every Friday along with the other paper, the mixed paper is taken with the other paper on the last Thursday of each month.

Cardboard is collected by the physical plant and taken to Blount Memorial Hospital, where it is crushed into more easily transportable material by the hospital's compressor. Blount Memorial then takes the cardboard to Knox Recycle Fiber.

Maryville College and Blount Memorial Hospital have established a joint account to share the funds generated by selling the recycled fiber. Blount Memorial also sends some of the different types of papers to Maryville for convenient transportation of the material.

McCall said of Blount Memorial, "They do a lot better job than we do. There is still a lot that goes into the mainstream." McCall added "We should be collecting a lot more white paper than we are."

McCall also speculated on the possibility that a trailer could be used to collect and transport the recycled materials on campus, but at the moment there is no funding for the estimated $1,500 needed for it.

There is also a yard waste compost heap behind the soccer field. Not an all-organic waste system, the heap is made up of leaves, sticks and any other type of yard waste. The compost heap creates rich fertilizer after it has set out in the elements to rot for a period of time. David Powell, instructor of English and a founding member of the Environmental Concerns Committee, said of the compost fertilizer, "I used it on my garden. It's great!"

McCall remarked on the amount of waste generated by Maryville College. "We're not taking but a little to the landfill. What we do take is stuff like broken furniture; any metal we find we strip and sell as scrap." He added that "brush is taken to rot in the woods."

International Studies Major modified

by Don Evon
Echo Staff

On March 26, the faculty approved a proposal to modify the current international studies curriculum.

The proposal suggests ways to more effectively meet the institutional goal of developing a "sensitivity and responsiveness to the individuality and needs of other cultures as well as one's own," as stated in the Maryville College catalog.

If the proposal is approved by the board of directors on April 25, the international studies major will reflect these changes, beginning in the Fall of 1992. The major will consist of a required core curriculum of at least 27 hours of course work (which will emphasize international, or comparative, studies) and at least 18 hours in either the international business or general track. In addition, "each student will undertake a period of study of at least six weeks" at either Kansai University in Japan, Han

MC baseball team approaches milestone

by Don Evon
Echo Staff

The Maryville College baseball team earned its 20th win of the season by defeating Emory and Henry 14-4 in the second game of Sunday's doubleheader. The Scots also won the first game 8-1.

With eight games still remaining, the diamondmen have already surpassed last year's 19-win total and need just three more victories to set a new school record for the most wins in a single season.

On Sunday, center fielder John Roszell broke the school record for the most stolen bases in a season. Roszell had two thefts against Emory and Henry to give him 23, thus exceeding the previous mark of 21.

Clint Boling has moved to within just four hits of capturing the school record for the most hits in a season. Boling, who had two hits against Emory and Henry, now has 43. He is expected to surpass the current record (47) held by assistant coach Eric Etchison sometime this week.

The Scots improved to 13-9 back on March 31 by sweeping the University of the South 10-0 and 5-1 in a doubleheader at home.

On the following Thursday, Boling scored the winning run in a 1-0 victory over Oglethorpe University (Atlanta) on a sacrifice fly by Jason Jenkins in the 11th inning.

Glenn Cullop pitched the entire game, allowing only four hits while striking out six.

On Sunday, April 5, the diamondmen moved to 15-10 as they split a doubleheader with Knoxville College. The Scots won the first game 6-4 but lost the second 4-3.

After being snowed out in Emory, Va. a week earlier, the Scots split with Emory and Henry last Wednesday. Maryville dropped the second game 11-4 after defeating Emory and Henry 5-2 in Game One.

On Thursday, the Scots split another doubleheader with Knoxville College. The diamondmen stomped KC 15-5 in the first game only to lose Game Two 3-1.

Finally, this past Saturday, the Scots defeated the University of the South before returning home to sweep Emory and Henry on Sunday.

The Scots who have won 17 of their last 22 games, are now 20-12 on the season. Their next home game will be Saturday, April 18 at 1:30 against Savannah College.

Capital

"I know it sounds like a tall order. We cannot promise success, but we will work hard to reach those goals."

She said that finding funds for Vision 1994 is a long and difficult process: "Those big gifts do not come quickly. It takes a lot of cultivating and working with people before they are ready to make a commitment that large." She said an additional difficulty was that, traditionally, MC graduates have gone into service-related fields such as teaching or ministering and are not necessarily very financially successful. She also stated that it has been difficult for MC to get funding from some major national foundations because of the college's financial instability in the past.

Morrow said that the campaigning was actually begun before January, 1991, when Vision 1994 was officially announced. "We began the 'quiet phase' of the campaign in July of 1989. Since the college had already done some campaigning, we kicked off the campaign with about $9 million," she said.

She added that she hoped that Vision 1994 was not seen only in terms of material, tangible progress, such as the renovation of Carnegie. "It's not strictly a capital campaign. It's more comprehensive than that."

Morrow said that the total campaign fund is actually divided into several categories. Facilities restoration and renovation refers to such projects as Carnegie Hall restoration and the renovation of Fayweather Hall and the Physical Education building. New construction will include the new student center. The planned campus integrated computer network falls into the campaign's learning resource development category.

In addition to these "capital" projects, the campaign also encompasses endowments for faculty chairs, and scholarships, current scholarship funding and faculty/staff development. The annual fund is also a part of the capital campaign fund. This is money donated to the college by friends and alumni annually and not designated for a specific use. The annual fund helps pay the operating costs of the college and defray the cost of tuition for students.

Softballers struggling

The Maryville College softball team continues to struggle this season.

With a 2-11 record going into this past weekend's contest with Belmont College, the Lady Scots are playing competitively, but their slim roster and schedule continue to put them at a disadvantage.

Last week, the Lady Scots lost 10-8 and 10-5 to Chattanooga State in Maryville.

According to Coach Kandi Schram, when State made errors, the Lady Scots had no one on base, and when the Lady Scots made errors, Chattanooga capitalized.

Maryville rallied from a 10-1 deficit in one of the games, but it was too little, too late.

AID

conferring with a specialist in financial aid, it was decided that the money existed.

The new scholarship will help the school meet its goal of having a diversified campus. The scholarships will be used by Kelly Franklin, director of the CELL program, in recruiting students from other countries.

In addition, international students are also eligible for the church and college scholarship. For more information, students should contact Franklin in International House or Venita Jones in financial aid.

Choral scholarship auditions to be held

Auditions for choral scholarships and for next year's Concert Choir will be held from 2:30-4:30 p.m. on Monday, April 20; Wednesday, April 22; and Friday, April 24 in the FAC rehearsal room.

A sign-up sheet is posted on the music bulletin board in the FAC.

Students auditioning on Saturday, April 11, for music performance scholarships need not do a choral audition. For more information, call 8151.

First presentation by new drama fraternity tonight at 8 p.m.

The Tennessee Williams play "27 Wagons Full of Cotton" will be presented tonight in the Maryville College Theatre Complex at 8 p.m.

The performance is sponsored by Alpha Psi Omega, the college's new dramatic fraternity. The play will be directed by Charlotte Borderieux.

Tickets, available at the door on the evening of the performance, are $1.

The play is a Blount County Dogwood Arts Festival event.

The play is a one-act drama and takes place in the South. It involves a married couple with strange values and a cotton ginner with a malicious charm. The story revolves around the relationships among these people and how they come to recognize themselves.

Faculty/Staff talent on tab for April 23

The second annual Maryville College Faculty/Staff Talent Night to benefit Habitat for Humanity will be held April 23 in the FAC Music Hall at 8 p.m.

Last year's display featured such memorable performances as the Chemistry Cowboy Terry 'the hat' Bunde, the Crocodile Rockers Elizabeth Perez-Reilly and Mardi Craig, the singing preacher Glenn (Campbell) Hewitt, and that enigma of musical talent the Nameless Band.

The Habitat for Humanity group is seeking $1,000 each to help send MC students to build homes in Nicaragua this summer.

Computers

preparation for when we put the library system in," Binder said.

"With the new system, if you're in the computer lab and you need to check on a book, you can see if it's checked out without actually leaving the lab. Or if a student is working on a senior thesis or a term paper, that student can look for sources on the system. It will give every student electronic access to the card catalog.

Health

cold or minor illness. They often have to wait for several hours behind people with serious illnesses and injuries before seeing a doctor. She added that because ParkMed does not handle serious injuries, the average wait is usually no more than 15-20 minutes. "It's a much more comfortable setting," she said.

Guillaume stressed the fact that students were given the responsibility of modifying MC health care services: "I made a recommendation to a group of students in the fall. That group handled it responsibly and came up with a great option. It's an example of students taking on a responsibility and doing it well."

Along with Davis, Lisa Branam, Michael Damron, Michelle Hall and Ben Sohrabi make up the student health services task force.

ParkMed is located on Gill Street across from Kroger in the Armory Place medical complex. It is open Monday-Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 7 p.m. and Saturday 10 a.m. to 4 p.m..

Financial

package of a hypothetical MC commuter to illustrate how the policy will be enforced: He has the presidential scholarship, which pays full tuition, and he has the $2,000 Blount County graduate scholarship. Because his tuition is paid in full by the P.S. and he lives at home, only the cost of his books and activity fee would be deducted from the $2,000 scholarship. The remainder would go back into the financial aid pool.

One other change in financial aid policy requires that students must be enrolled full-time before they are eligible for institutional funds — money from the college that is not derived from state and federal sources. But, Jones said, "It is a grandfather clause," so not everyone will be affected.

As it is now, the admissions office boasts that roughly 80 percent of MC students receive financial aid. While that sounds like a beneficial accomplishment, it could simply mean that of eight out of ten students, seven may be receiving $1,000 in financial aid and the eighth receiving $14,000.

Those in charge of financial aid hope to "spread the wealth" a little more evenly.

only a few people are making the decisions about what actually happens to it.

Smith also pointed out the pollution problem of the Tennessee River. He said that he and various volunteers conducted a River Rescue in which they pulled out 500 tires, refrigerators and barrels that had been dumped in the river. He stated that many East Tennesseans get their drinking water from this river. "All of us can do something about this problem," Smith argued.

Tennessee Valley Authority is not doing an effective job of conserving energy, according to Smith. Smith claimed that TVA should be promoting the energy-conserving florescent light bulb (that only uses 18 watts of energy to burn) instead of negotiating to build new power plants.

Smith also talked about the problems of pollution in Oak Ridge. He stated that Oak Ridge is one of most highly polluted areas of the United States. Smith said that the Department of Energy should be labeled the Department of Nuclear Arms because it concentrates on making weapons instead of addressing the energy problem.

Smith commented that the world that we live in is a very beautiful place and we should do everything we can to take care of it. Smith said that we should definitely do more than talk about the problems. He suggested that we do things on personal levels such as recycling and buying recycled materials. "The environmental issue is one of the greatest challenges to face humanity," Smith said. "One person can make a tremendous difference."

International

Nam University or Yonsei University in Korea, the Northeast Wales Institute at Wrexham, the Inter-American University in Puerto Rico, "an institution with which Maryville College has student exchange agreements, or another approved college." When English is a second language for the student, he/she is exempt from the foreign language and foreign study requirements.

In May of 1991, after current and potential students expressed an interest in an international business major, an endowment from the Teagle Foundation made it possible to explore the idea. The social science department, along with Mr. Dave Powell, instructor of English; Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly, associate professor of foreign languages; and Dr. Sarah McNiell, chair of the history department and associate professor of history; met to investigate the possibility of broadening the scope of the international studies major (currently, the program focuses solely on East Asia).

The proposal states that "the major in international studies is designed to enable the student to appreciate other cultures and cultural diversity, to engage in cross-cultural dialogue and to understand the events and forces that shape the relations between nations and cultures." It also says that "the international business track meets the need for providing an opportunity to study international business in a manner that emphasizes the cultural element in conducting international business."

According to Dr. Sherry Kasper, assistant professor of economics, the purpose of the modification is to expand the cultural aspect of the major and to make it more international. She implied that to be successful in international business, students must not only be aware of, but understand, be knowledgeable of, and be sympathetic to the cultures of those with whom they will interact.

One additional course, International Business, will be necessary to offer the modified international studies curriculum. Furthermore, the Principles of Economics course will have a new international emphasis aimed at "keeping with the intent of the international studies major to foster an understanding of the events and forces that shape relations between nations and cultures." Finally, because library holdings in international business are weak at the present time, funds from the Teagle grant will also be used for library acquisitions.

President Ferrin resigns

Maryville College President, Dr. Richard Ferrin, announced his resignation on April 25 during the regular spring meeting of the College Board of Directors. Citing personal reasons for leaving, Dr. Ferrin thanked the board for its support and for its dedicated commitment to the College. "You have been a joy to work with," he said.

Dr. Ferrin came to Maryville in March 1987. During his tenure as president, enrollment grew by 28 percent, operating revenues surged 78 percent, the quality and number of faculty increased, international programs and exchange agreements were developed, unrestricted gifts to the College increased from $385,000 a year to $1.2 million annually, and nearly $18 million was raised by the College. Also, more than $14 million has been raised in the $22 million Vision 1994 capital campaign, scheduled for completion in Fall 1994.

In his letter of resignation Dr. Ferrin said, "The five years as president of Maryville have been a rewarding, enriching experience for me. However, the time seems to be at hand to resign from the presidency. I will continue to support Maryville in any way that I can and that would be desired by the College."

Board Chairman Dick Ragsdale from Brentwood, TN, praised Ferrin for his leadership. "Dr. Ferrin's leadership brought stability, renewal, and growth to Maryville College. The progress under his tenure is a challenge to all involved with the College to build on this

Vision 1994 continues

by Robin Morris
& Mary Rose Slaughter
Echo Staff

In 1989, Dr. Richard Ferrin, president of Maryville College, had a "vision" of what the college would be like five years from that time. This "vision" soon became known as "Vision 1994," an extended plan with a series of goals and aspirations that the college was to follow. According to Joan Worley, director of Lamar Alexander library at MC, the faculty in each department decided they wanted to contribute their ideas to 'Vision 1994.' Soon, the seeds of the vision began to grow and "Vision 1994" began to set official goals for Maryville College.

The goals attempt to include all aspects of Maryville College — from academics to athletics. According to Ferrin, some of these goals have been met or are on their way to being met; some have not been met.

According to Ferrin, the College Endowment Fund has increased to $14 million. The goal stated in "Vision 1994" is $20 million.

The reconstruction of Carnegie Hall and the building of a new student center are some of the goals in the program. Ferrin said that he hopes construction on Carnegie

Letters to the Editor...

Goodbye card catalog

Dear Editor:

I am writing in response to the April 15 Echo article on the recent developments in the campus computer network. As Kristi Giles mentions in the article, once library automation is completed, the network will provide remote electronic access to information resources in the library.

However, it is simplistic and somewhat misleading to state that the campus network will give students "electronic access to the card catalog." A precondition of such access is that the present card catalog be converted into an electronic database (which is called OPAC in library lingo for Online Public Access Catalog).

In addition to machine readable bibliographic records of the book collection in the library, the database will also contain our journal and periodical holdings, circulation data, information about reserve items, and the status of materials requested for purchase. We also plan to provide through the same system remote access to various CD ROM indexes and to UT's OPAC. Before we know it the term "card catalog" will be obsolete — something to tell your children about.

Sincerely,
Chris Nugent, Librarian

Seniors praise college's sign language program

Dear Editor:

We would like to take this opportunity to thank Maryville College for the education we have received here. Our special gratitude goes to the instruction in our major field of study — sign language interpreting.

MC is very unique to offer this major, which should not be overlooked. Many institutions have two-year interpreter training programs and a few even have (or will have) a four-year program that is great.

However, Maryville's offer is truly exceptional. This place has not only given us a solid, liberal arts background, but we also have learned and digested the theory and practice we need to work in the field of interpreting.

How do we know this? Because due to the course requirements here at MC, our practicum and internship experiences have forced our work to be an on-going process for several years. We have not only experienced interpreting in Knoxville, but collectively we have worked with deaf and hard-of-hearing folks of all ages and from places all across the U.S.

We have found that we are not only well-prepared in skills, but we have the higher education to comprehend what we are interpreting. The road was not easy, and we would like to thank those who made it the toughest!

Sincerely,
Heather Smith, Lisa Dills, Anna Henderson, Carol Chisholm, Angela Wardeska, D. Alyson Neville.

Nestled in the foothills....

by Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly

The school is a liberal arts college "nestled in the foothills" of beautiful mountains, and having the advantage of being less than an hour's drive from a metropolitan area that is the site of a major state university. The school was founded by the Presbyterian Church and still retains a relationship with the denomination. The town in which the college is situated is small, traditional, and friendly, easily accessible by an interstate highway. The college campus is green and well-kept, characterized by rolling hills and a mixture of modern and traditional architecture. Many varieties of trees and plants abound on the extensive grassy areas. The general atmosphere of the campus is one of friendliness and informality. This is definitely a jeans and tee-shirt school. Groups of students clad in shorts, sneakers, and shirts are sitting on benches under the trees enjoying the warm weather, their backpacks full of books lying on the ground nearby. An occasional professor charitably holds class outside, much to the delight of the students who wave at their friends passing by.

In between classes, the snack bar is full of young people lined up for Cokes and the ubiquitous "junk food." I join the line, hoping to acquire a cup of coffee prior to my 11 a.m. meeting with the Vice President for Academic Affairs. Upon reaching his office, I find myself at the end of another line of students. Yesterday was the last day to enter classes, so the Dean's approval must be bestowed on both the procrastinators and the bewildered before permission will be granted for late enrollment. Most of the students exit the office with sighs of relief, though there are a few disgruntled faces.

In my conversation with the Dean, I learn that although this is a liberal arts college, business is by far the most popular major; about 40 percent of the students are commuters who live at home with their families; many of the students are the first in their families to attend college; and about 80 percent receive some kind of financial aid. Service to the community and the world, personal and spiritual growth, and a varied academic background are important components of the educational program. I decide that I like this place, and I definitely think that I could become a part of this community very quickly.

No, I am not at Maryville College. I am not a prospective faculty member here for an interview. I am at Inter American University in Puerto Rico, and I have come to make final arrangements for a reciprocal exchange program between the two institutions, which are strikingly similar.

When I look more closely, though, I see that there are also differences. The groups of see Puerto Rico, p. 8

Sociology major to boost liberal arts curriculum

by Beth Bishop
Echo Staff

A proposed major in sociology at MC has been tentatively structured for approval by the board of directors.

The major in sociology has been designed based on students' need for such a major according to Dr. Susan Ambler, assistant professor of sociology.

Many students who are interested in sociology have so far been faced with what Ambler calls the "grueling process" of structuring, proposing and compromising in attempts to individualize a major in their areas of interest.

Ambler said that most students working with individualized majors are trying to form some sort of major in sociology. Five students are currently working with an individualized major involving sociology.

The proposed major, which has been approved by the faculty, requires 42 credit hours, of those in sociology and 12 in related areas such as math, social science, psychology, economics and political science.

A new course in social theory is also part of the design for the major, and is considered by Ambler to be "essential to the scientific study of sociology."

Students majoring in sociology have a broad range of career and involvement opportunities according to Ambler, including working with government, community organizations, human services, teaching and research. Ambler pointed out that "many businesses prefer to hire business majors on the merits of their cross-curricular experiences and perspectives."

Heather Smith named Outstanding Senior

by Kristi Giles

Echo Staff

Heather Lyn Smith has been named the outstanding senior for the class of 1992.

Heather, a sign language interpreting major from Marietta, Ga., credits a special friend with being an important influence on her decision to attend Maryville College.

"When I was in high school a good friend of mine was deaf," Heather explained. "We went to the same church and were in the same youth group. I started interpreting for her, and I found out a lot about sign language that way. So when I started looking for a college to go to, I knew I wanted a good liberal arts education but I didn't really have an interest, I didn't really know what I wanted to do. A friend told me about a school in Tennessee that had a four-year degree in interpreting so I looked it up. I came for a visit and I loved it. That's how I ended up here — it was a kind of a spur-of-the-moment decision, but it was a good decision."

Heather has been very active while at MC. She has been a Presidential Scholar, Alpha Lambda Delta president, and 1991 Homecoming Queen. Yet her distinguished list of activities also includes: Life Enrichment Task Force, Residence Hall staff, MC Chapter Director of Best Buddies of America, University Of Tennessee Educational Interpreter, Freelance Interpreter for Knoxville Area Communication Center for the Deaf, Volunteer Interpreter for Tennessee School for the Deaf, MC Student Foundation, Dismas House volunteer, Student Programming volunteer, Sign Language Club, Mountain Challenge, and 1992 Who's Who.

Heather believes that MC's diversity has been an advantage in shaping the way that she views the world.

"I think that one thing while I've been here is that everybody with any kind of views can find a place here, that there is a variety of representation on campus of different viewpoints," Heather said. "We have seen all sides of some very controversial issues here. It has prepared me to be a citizen of this world, to look beyond my own views."

After graduation Heather plans to return home to pursue a career.

"Last summer I did part of my internship with Georgia Interpreting Services Network. They have said that as soon as I graduate I can start freelancing for them. This coming weekend I'm taking a national certification exam and I'll find out the results of that in 3 or 4 months. If I pass that, I could have the opportunity to be a staff member for them. But I think I'm going to freelance for a while because that leaves me open to say yes or no. I'm going to see what else is out there in Georgia."

Heather has made some special friends while at MC. "A lot of good things have happened to me here," she said. "I appreciate awards, but I feel like there are a lot of deserving people on this campus."

When asked what advice she would offer to those still facing another two or three years at MC, Heather replied, "Don't quit, even when it's tempting. And remember that you are supposed to learn good and bad things here. I think you should cherish the good ones when they happen because they're not as frequent, but I think that through bad experiences you almost learn more."

Heather Smith, named outstanding senior, was also the 1991 MC Homecoming Queen.

THE ROBERTS UNOFFICIAL AND UNSANCTIONED SURVEY

conducted by Dave Roberts

Well, there's is going to be somewhat of a change in this issue's Dave's World. With regard to the administration and its policies, I'm going to try to be fair-minded, realistic, and practical (characteristics which, as many of you pointed out, have been lacking in past columns). As Ezra Pound said to Walt Whitman in his poem "The Pact," "We have one sap and one root -/ Let there be commerce between us." I have somewhat tired of shouting inflammatory rhetoric with little knowledge of the problem and little hope for solution. I think now that I have a better grasp of the ailments of this college and a better grasp of what solutions are needed (solutions I will propose at the end of this column).

But first, what about those darn surveys? Well, I've got a truckload of statistics for you. Please pay attention to them. Believe me, after tallying all of these cursed surveys (about 100 of the 700 students surveyed, or 17% , responded — this would be considered a high response rate on this campus) I know how boring statistics can be, but this isn't some goofy U.S.A. Today survey about the sexual habits of balding transsexual taxi drivers; this is your classmates talking. So listen up.

First question: how do you feel towards the administration?

24% of you felt pretty good about how things are run, 20% either have no opinion or felt ambivalent, and 56% felt negative in some way or another. 56% is not high enough to damn any administration - it might even be healthy - but perhaps the administration should sit up and take note: there are a lot of angry people out there.

Favorite survey quote: "You know when it's really hot and you have tight underwear on...?"

Second question: is there a significant problem between the students and the administration?

57% of you think that there is. I guess it's logical that those with problems think that there is a problem. Still, like I said, the administration should not ignore that fact that well over half of us think that something is wrong.

Favorite quote: "A Liberal Arts environment will always provide some tension."

Third question: what about the student staff members?

Well, good news for all you R.A.'s and S.A.'s out there — 38% of us think you're swell, 37% think that there is a little of both, and only 25% of us think that you are all jerks. In the end, I guess it all comes down to the individual. Almost everyone who had the slightest problem used the word "police." For those of you that are guilty, please, ease up. We're all in the same boat. For the rest of you, keep it up, your courtesy and concern are noted and appreciated.

Favorite quote: "They are hedonistic devils who are simply in the business for the exorbitant salaries that they command, for the respect they garner from the rest of the staff and faculty, and for the constant love and admiration which is heaped upon them by the students."

Fourth: is there a drug problem on campus?

Heck no! 68% say that they don't see a problem. In other words, if there is a big stink about drugs, it's not about the quantity of the problem, it's about the quality of the response to it.

Favorite quote: "I do not think drug 'use' necessarily equals drug 'problem.'"

Fifth: what drugs have you tried?

7% say that they have never even tried alcohol. 43% have tried alcohol, but alcohol only. The majority, 51%, have tried others. And when I say others, I mean it. We're talking everything from marijuana to kitchen crank and everything between.

Favorite quote: "Mary Jane, PCP, Cocaine, LSD, Alcohol, Crude Crack, Valium, Codeine, Percocet, numerous prescribed pills, Quaaludes, Nitrous Oxide, Embalming Fluid, strychnine" (Embalming fluid?)

Sixth: what drugs do you use on a regular basis?

Everyone who wet your pants over the last question, relax. 58% say they don't even drink regularly. 30% drink but nothing else, and a mere 17% do more than that. If you ask me, that hardly constitutes a drug or alcohol problem.

Two favorite quotes: "prescription drug for acne" (did I really need to know that?), and "Alcohol, acid, speed, marijuana, and TEA."

Seventh: what about the alcohol policy?

This question drew almost the biggest reaction. An overwhelming 69% of students say that alcohol should be allowed anywhere on campus for those of age. 23% favor the current policy, and 8% (almost all of whom gave religious reasons) feel that alcohol should be completely banned. It is significant, I think, that a large number of people mentioned that alcohol on campus would be far preferable to people driving to and from Knoxville under the influence. It is a good point.

Favorite quote: "If the administration can follow the laws against the use of pot, then they should also follow the law concerning alcohol. People 21 or over are allowed to purchase and consume alcoholic beverages."

Eighth: what drugs would be legalized, if any?

Marijuana made a decent showing, with 44% in favor of legalization, but the other drugs were defeated in a landslide, receiving only 8% or less.

Favorite quote: "Legalize them all! It would tear apart the economic base of much criminal activity and throw the burden of responsibility for healthy use completely on the user (act smart or die)."

Ninth: should students be suspended on their first drug (or paraphernalia) offense?

A huge majority of 70% were in favor of some type of punishment other than suspension (most for counseling, some for probation, some for community service, some for just a warning). 24% favored suspension and 6% said that it depends from case to case. If 70% of the student body say that the administration is violating the sense of "community," surely, the administration should reconsider its stance.

Favorite quote: "Yes. This school doesn't owe anybody a damn thing!" (With classmates like this, who needs an administration?)

Tenth: what do you think about the price of a Maryville education?

This was by far the most vehement response. 74% of the students think that Maryville is too expensive. 24% think that it is appropriately priced, and a lonely (and, I assume, rich) 1% think that M.C. is cheap. A lot of people who said "too expensive" added that funds are being spent for the wrong things (i.e. planting gardens while buildings fall apart).

Favorite quote: "Raise in tuition? What raise in tuition?"

Eleventh: are you satisfied with:

- Handboo — 48% said yes, 48% said no, 4% not sure.
 — Favorite quote: "We have a handbook?"
- Administration — 46% said yes, 45% no, 9% not sure.
 — Favorite quote: "Never."
- Education — 78% think they are being well-educated. Congrats to the faculty!
 — Favorite quote: "I don't know, I don't really go to class."
- College as a whole — 66% say yes.
 — Favorite quote: "No! Satisfaction implies complacency."
- Dave's World — 72% say yes. Thanks!
 — Two favorite quotes: "Yes! Yes! Yes! Multiple orgasm!" and "NO. It's overly simplistic (philosophically), arrogant, and self-aggrandizing."

Other Interesting Statistics:

1. Junior class has the highest percentage of people who have been suspended for drugs.
2. Junior class has the highest percentage of people who think suspension is appropriate for first offense.
3. Percentage of people who have tried marijuana that have also tried other drugs (LSD, etc.): 72%
4. Percentage of people who use marijuana regularly who use only alcohol and marijuana: 65%
5. Senior class has the biggest percentage of people who have tried drugs.
6. Senior class has the biggest percentage of people who use drugs regularly.
7. Senior class has the biggest percentage of people who like Dave's World. Hmmm...
8. Sophomore class has the biggest percentage of people who view the administration negatively.
9. Sophomore class has the biggest percentage of people who support a change in the alcohol policy.
10. Sophomore class has the biggest percentage of people who are in favor of legalizing marijuana.
11. Sophomore class has the biggest percentage of people who are against suspension as a first offense punishment.
12. Of all the surveys that were returned, only four of them wrote that Dave's World should be more "positive." All four of them were from Resident Directors (R.D.'s).

So, what does all of this mean? To tell the truth, it is entirely possible (especially for the last list) that these statistics are misleading. I don't know much about statistical analysis, but the response was relatively small compared to the total number of students, so maybe the majority was not truly represented. To be honest, it doesn't really matter. Why? It is simple. Ideas, facts, values, etc. are right or wrong regardless of and independent from majority opinion. In other words, nothing is right or good solely because a lot of people think it is.

Arguments must stand or fall on their objective merit.

Here is what I think about the problems facing this college:

College is a unique time in a person's life. We are just old enough to be coming into our own as individuals, but not yet old enough to be stuck in the real world, categorized and restricted by the ties of familial and financial responsibilities. College is not here to "prepare us for the real world" any more than high school is. You can stay in college for ten years and the real world is still going to slap you in the face. There is no way to prepare for the real world other than to experience it. College is a time of self-discovery, of spiritual searching. It is a time of experimentation, discussion, thought, revelation, and most importantly, freedom. This, my friends, is our last chance to find out who we are before we are forced to act as if we know.

So, given this basic premise, what should be the role of a college administration? Fundamentally, an administration should exist to provide an ideal environment for the fulfillment of the students. The largest emphasis, obviously, should be on learning. Not only classroom learning (though that should be the primary focus), but spiritual learning. The most difficult dilemma of a college administration, and I will be the first to admit that their dilemmas are legion, is how to keep order for the students who want it and still provide freedom for those who don't. There are those students who hate chaos, who want to be able to learn and live in a quiet, structured environment. There is absolutely nothing wrong with that. But, there are also those students who want to take advantage of their last four years of freedom to experiment with different lifestyles, to do things they've never done before, and yes, to break the rules. Everyone's got to act young sometime. A college administration must take into account both types of students and try to structure a campus in which both can coexist peacefully. Obviously, I am not advocating that the people in charge encourage drug use or hedonism or nude mud wrestling or any illegal activity. I simply think a college should be a place where you can screw up sometimes, where you can be young and stupid, and still feel like you have a little leeway.

So, with these principles in mind, what should this administration do? Here are some various and sundry things that I believe ought to be done:

1. Change the alcohol policy. Allow anyone who is 21 to drink in their rooms and at certain social occasions (more than just Spring Fling and Homecoming). A huge majority of students favor this change, it doesn't violate state law, and it would ease a lot of resentment among the student body, 21-year-olds and minors alike. Also, the current alcohol policy is vague about punishment, which is a virtual invitation to break it. Impose progressive fines for alcohol violations and suspension for the fourth offense. Fines would deter drinking far more than pointless Crawford House meetings.
2. Change the drug policy. Suspension of the first offense is harsh and smacks of over-restriction and lack of trust. The first offense should involve a meeting with a counselor (to determine if there is a problem) and a fine. The second offense, probation or suspension, depending on the nature of that case and the individual. The third, expulsion.
3. A huge majority of students are disturbed about the financial situation at M.C. With all of the students here giving a tremendous amount of money each year, they want to see tangible results. There is a common feeling that the money is being funneled into some huge black hole, and all the pie charts in the world won't change that. So what is the solution? Obviously, it costs a lot of money to run the college. But, the most important investment here is the students. Make the students happy. Make them feel like something is being done. The ceiling in Lloyd is deteriorating, the FAC is falling apart — all the buildings look like relics from the 1920's except Sutton. We're heated by steam, for Christ's sake! Don't restore Carnegie for future students until you restore the buildings that the students use now. Keep the library open longer. Buy new desks. Fix the water fountains. Mow the lawns when classes aren't meeting. It would not take all that much money to make a few simple changes that the students can see. I'm sure the administration has the college's welfare at heart, but they need to remember that students care a lot more about Vision 1992 than Vision 1994, and the students are the ones paying.
4. Cut the student development office at least in half, and spend that money on faculty. Student development (no offense to all the wonderful people working there) is a largely unneeded department, at least to the extent that it is being bloated. Keep Sue and Marsha and a few other administrators to guide things, but let the students plan their own activities. I mean, if the students were given a little freedom, parties would happen spontaneously. No one cares about the Davis Moon Luau Tanning Fling, or whatever it is. Students don't want goofy themes and costumes and stuff; they just want to get together and have fun. Let them. The administration needs to quit trying to leash the students and lead them to a good time.
5. Reduce the number and power of the student staff. Give the students more responsibility for keeping themselves in order. It is ridiculous that any student should have the power or

Howdyshell reflects; King proposes

Senate President and President-Elect discuss their views past and future

by Karen Beaty
Echo Staff

Today, May 6, Maryville College students will cast their votes for student senators and class officers. One election has already been held and David King was elected as president of the student senate. His term will officially begin next fall.

I interviewed both King and Roger Howdyshell, the current president. Much of what King and Howdyshell spoke of is very relevant to the elections being held today. They both indirectly stressed the importance and seriousness of having a cooperative senate next year, and indicated that certain considerations should be made before choosing a representative. Roger Howdyshell.

Q: Your term as president began with some amount of controversy, particularly stemming from the handbook. What was your opinion of it? Did you hope to change it? How?

A: "I wasn't really favorable of the handbook because there wasn't any input from the students. Also, the changes weren't brought to light. They just made us sign that piece of paper saying that we got it. Also, there was some lack of communication between me and Dr. Wyatt. The handbook was completed over the summer, and I really didn't have the opportunity to talk to her about it."

Q: This year, several students were forced to withdraw. Did you feel that you and/or the senate had any influence on these decisions?

A: "No, not at all. I wish the students who were kicked out had the option of having their cases reviewed by the senate judicial board. They may have had that option — I'm not aware that they did. We gave input after the students left, and these suggestions may be taken for changes made this summer. Our influence this year should be felt next fall."

Q: The covenant— What was your hope for it? Did it materialize in the manner that you hoped it would?

A: "I had really high aspirations for it— probably too high. I hoped that it would put everybody on the same level; establish a community of students, faculty, and staff, and make everyone responsible for their own actions. It really didn't materialize the way I wanted. I believe that [its failure] was because the campus is divided into two groups: freshmen/sophomores and juniors/seniors. Their representatives in senate represented two different values. The junior/senior representative felt obligated to preserve and protect their rights. The freshman/sophomore representatives didn't view it as a big concern."

Q: Was it a good year or a bad year for students' rights?

A: "That's a sticky question... I wouldn't say that it was a good year for students' rights. I think that certain situations could have been handled differently. From a judicial perspective, the decisions were, at least, consistent. It was a good year to get students involved with students' rights. This was the first time I saw students stand up for their rights and show concern for their fellow students, too. It's kind of what we hope the covenant will do."

Q: What do you think you accomplished?

A: "We didn't get as much stuff done as I would have liked. At times, I felt bogged down in senate arguments. Sometimes we didn't even have the quorum needed for a meeting. One thing we did accomplish was the establishment of some type of policy requiring senators to attend senate meetings. Also, there have been several rough drafts drawn up for some changes on how judicial process will be handled next year. Most of what was accomplished won't be seen until next year. I'll be staying in Maryville this summer, and I hope to work with Dr. Wyatt and Dave [King]. There are still issues that I want to see change — some were left up in the air, and I'd like to see them resolved."

Q: Do you have any advice for David King?

A: "My advice would be that he try to represent the students, but that's a position he'll kind of have to learn on his own. Everyone has a different method of running meetings and dealing with administration. Dave's a strong enough leader that he'll be able to do that effectively. He'll do just fine. He'll be a good president."

David King.

Q: You've been on senate for one year now. From your observations, what are you going to do differently?

A: "I would like to see a little more structure. A lot of times, people got a little out of order, and some people didn't attend. I don't think that was a reflection on Roger, but on this year's senate. As for specifics, I would like to see more time and money spent on intramural sports. I would also like to see more structure in the drug and alcohol policy, and a change in judicial process."

Q: Could you expound upon structure in the alcohol and drug policy?

A: "It either needs to be enforced or changed. When I say 'structure,' I mean that we need a more consistent policy — have a little leeway, but not as much leeway as there is now. I do think that the drug paraphernalia cases could have been handled differently, but I like the fact that the policy is a statement from the college saying, 'We're striving to be a drug-free campus.'"

Q: And about the change in judicial process?

A: "Nothing's set in stone, but we're hoping to incorporate some aspects of the Sewanee Honor Court. It would involve assigning students to find out and deliver facts, not accusations, to a student "grand jury." Giving this responsibility to the students is not only a part of the covenant idea, but it would also give student development more time to do things for students, instead of punishing them. I do think student development is doing a good job. They just have more than they can handle."

Q: How long do you think it will take for the covenant to take hold?

A: "At least four or five years. It will take it that long to phase it in. We're listening to suggestions, and working on specifics. It's not going to happen overnight. But hopefully the judicial process change will be reality next year."

Q: These changes will be noted in the handbook. Will the changes be better advertised than it was last fall?

A: "If there are changes, people should be made aware by maybe putting a sheet of paper on the inside or printing on the front cover something that says: 'note these changes.' The complications last year probably were not the fault of the administration. They either didn't feel that the changes were big enough to affect us, or either they felt that students would either read the handbook or hear about it word-of-mouth."

Scots post impressive 24-14 record

by Don Evon
Echo Staff

With a doubleheader sweep (10-0, 16-2) of Savannah College of Art and Design (SCAD) on April 18, the Maryville baseball team brought the 1992 season to a record-breaking close.

The Scots' second victory over SCAD also marked their 24th win of the season, thus setting a new school record.

Other records broken this year included most stolen bases in a season, by John Roszell, most hits in a season, by Clint Boling, and most career wins, by Bobby Pringle.

Unfortunately however, the program must now bid adieu to several talented players. Departing are seniors Boling, Pringle, Scottie Cline, and Jason Jenkins, and junior Glenn Cullop, who will transfer to Georgia Tech in the fall to complete the requirements for his engineering degree.

"We were shooting for the record and we got it," head coach Brian Wajert said, "but it's kind of bittersweet because we lose a lot of good players. They were a great bunch of guys and great players. They built the program to where we are respected in the Region now. It's been great."

Lady Scots bring season to disappointing close

by Don Evon

Although Shannon McCurry went 6-for-9 with two home runs and four runs batted in, the Lady Scots softball team fell to 4-15 back on April 18 as they dropped two games to Tusculum (5-4 and 10-7) in Greenville.

On Saturday, April 25, the team finally brought its season to an end, as it lost both games (12-1 and 16-3) in a doubleheader against Carson-Newman.

After a long season, the losses dropped the Scots to a disappointing 4-17 on the year.

Roberts

the inclination to patrol the halls and listen at doors. The staff should exist solely to handle problems that the students have tried and failed to solve themselves (and to lend the vacuum). 6. Concentrate on academics. Department heads are given secretaries for three hours a day. That is ludicrous. Hell, give them some of the people from Student Development. More importantly, hire new faculty. The faculty members that we have now are overworked and underpaid, especially since they perform many of the functions that Crawford House is designed for. I know that when I have a problem, I go to a professor to discuss it, and I think many other students do as well. I don't want to rock climb or canoe, I want to talk to an intelligent person who can empathize and who won't preach. Also, raise admissions standards, which several faculty members say have fallen in recent years. If we are going to continually compare ourselves with colleges like Sewanee when the subject of tuition comes up, then let's get a comparable standard of admissions. In other words, improve the faculty and the student body. That should be our absolute number one priority, both in time and money.

7. In general, involve the students more in administrative activities. The communication between administration and students has improved lately, but it has a long way to go. Many students feel that rules and decisions are imposed on them arbitrarily, without their contribution. Hold weekly forums in which a member of the faculty or staff discusses the week's developments and explains what problems are being discussed. Publish the minutes of the student senate meetings. Be honest and straightforward about the measures being taken against drugs or any other problem. Be our friends, not our keepers.

Well, there you have it. I doubt this column will make any difference in the way things are done here, but I hope at least that everyone has a better perspective on things. We have our problems, but they aren't as bad as they could be, and I certainly can no longer say in clear conscience that the administration has any malevolent intentions. They are trying, and we should try too. There is the idea of a covenant being discussed (about the alcohol policy) which I think would involve students agreeing to be responsible and the administration agreeing to loosen the restraint a little bit. I think this idea should be expanded to include all facets of college life, both academic and disciplinary. We're not in high school any more, and everyone on both sides of the issue needs to understand and accept that. But, a note to my fellow students: please, please, please, if they trust us more, let's not blow it. Just use your noggin and don't let anybody get hurt. With a little confidence and trust on both sides, who knows what could happen?

After all, we have one sap and one root.

Let there be commerce between us.

Vision

Hall will resume. "We will start construction when we have enough pledges to cover the funding for the project," Ferrin commented.

Another major focus of "Vision 1994" is to build a new gymnasium. "The money has been pledged, but is tied up in the state," Ferrin noted. "We are getting a little trickle of money [and] in the summer, [there] will be things done [for the old gymnasium] that will be visible," he continued.

"Vision 1994" outlines a better international program. Since 1989, the college has expanded the exchange programs it did have and created new programs, Ferrin said.

Other achievements of "Vision 1994" include the beginnings of an established honor code. Ferrin said that the covenant theory that students are in the process of establishing is the beginning of an honor code. "There is [also] some work being done on building an assessment portfolio for students that would contain various accomplishments that would show that student's growth [during their time at Maryville College]. That [plan] is still in discussion; the student/faculty committee is still working on it," Ferrin explained.

There is a goal for more financial aid. That plan has not gone through yet because of the budget crisis, according to Ferrin. There has been, however, an expansion of internships and practicum for MC students. "The most dramatic of this are the two internships offered in Europe for the summer," Ferrin said. Career Planning and Placement now has two full time workers as a part of the systematic planning program that is mentioned in "Vision 1994."

The plan for the library to become computerized is well on its way, according to Worley. "We have taken many tangible steps since 1989. We now have access to a bibliographic utility (Online Computer Library Center) that allows us to share cataloging data with libraries [around the country]," Worley stated.

Worley also asserted that the library has purchased a CD-ROM that was mentioned in her response paper to "Vision 1994." These are computer information centers such as PsycLIT and ERIC. Worley mentioned that the library would like to purchase the Modern Language Association bibliography in the CD-ROM version.

"If a grant that is pending [goes through], we will use it to take all the collection we now have [in the card catalogue] and turn the catalogues into machine readable data," Worley stated. "This is a major step toward computerization. Then all we need is the computers and software," she added.

Another goal of "Vision 1994" is to increase the sense of community among students. "Some phrases that are tucked in [Vision 1994], like dignity for ethnic minorities have not been accomplished, I think we moved backward on that," Ferrin asserted.

According to Ferrin, another aspect of college community that is a set back to establishing community is the existence of secret societies. "I'd like very much to see the societies out. Student grouping is natural, but there is more value in having the groups accountable to one another and to society. Secret societies, in essence, avoid accountability by being secret," Ferrin commented momentum," he said.

Harwell Proffitt, who completed his term as Board Chairman this spring, said, "Maryville College has had remarkable growth the last five years. Under Dick Ferrin's leadership the board of directors has been expanded and improved. His skillful management and enthusiasm have been an inspiration to all who have known and worked with him. Thanks to Dick Ferrin, Maryville College is ready to enter the 21st century as a great liberal arts institution. Dick is a close personal friend, and I shall truly miss working with him."

Ferrin's resignation will be effective June 30. Ragsdale said that a presidential search committee will be formed shortly and that "we will seek as our new president a man or woman who will build on the gains of the past several years and who will sustain the fine momentum currently underway at the College."

Puerto Rico

students and their professors are speaking Spanish under the trees, not English; Spanish guitar music is often heard coming from one of the benches, which happens to be under a coconut palm; and the music blaring from the car windows could just as easily be salsa as rap with a Spanish accent. Snacks in the cafeteria include native fruits, empanadillas, and pastelillos. The coffee is thick and definitely Latin American. While the mountains and a major city are within less than an hour's drive, there is a beautiful white sand beach within twenty miles in a different direc-

Campus regulations are a little stricter, too. There are no coed dorms; visitation is limited to public areas, such as lobbies and recreation rooms; drinking and smoking within the rooms are definitely forbidden; and all students must observe a curfew. Campus social life appears to be a little more lively, though; and students are seen everywhere at all hours of the day, as well as late into the night. Off campus, the legal drinking age is eighteen; but the school does not have a serious problem with substance abuse on the part of the students. I am impressed with the neat, attractive appearance of the residence halls (in which the students obviously take a lot of pride) and the sense of community that is evident in this campus of 9,000 students.

The exchange program between Maryville College and Inter American University, located in San Oerman, Puerto Rico, will go into effect beginning Fall Semester, 1992. Each school plans to send four students to the partner institution for one semester. The students from Inter American will come to Maryville in August, while Maryville College students will go to Puerto Rico in January.

Since Inter American University is a bilingual school, M.C. students may take classes in Spanish, English, or a combination thereof. Although fluency in Spanish is not a prerequisite for study, two years of Spanish at Maryville College are strongly recommended as a means of facilitating integration into the campus community at Inter American. Although Puerto Ricans have some knowledge of English, Spanish is very much the lingua franca of the island. Inter American Uni-

should not be a problem. Since most courses include at least one section conducted in English, it should not be difficult for students with limited Spanish proficiency to enroll for a full course of study. Puerto Rico is officially United States territory; therefore, visas, passports, and foreign currency exchange are unnecessary. As part of the reciprocal exchange agreement, Maryville College students will incur no additional expenses in attending Inter American University other than round-trip air fare.

When asked whether I thought that Maryville College students would like Inter American University, I responded that the only problem I could foresee would be the difficulty of getting them to come back home at the end of the semester. I was certainly tempted to stay, but the memories of the dogwood in the spring and the striking autumn colors made me resist. If you would like to be so tempted, please come by my office (Anderson 313) and we will explore the possibilities.

Enrollment increase brings new faces to MC

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

To the returning students of Maryville College, there are many new faces on campus this year. If this does not strike you as a profound statement, take this into consideration: there are 194 students in this freshman class alone. This number does not include the increase in CELL students, transfers, and re-admits. Total enrollment for day-school students is 700. Compare this to last year's freshman class of 159 and a total enrollment of 691. While the numbers may not show a significant growth on paper, typically, an enrollment increase is not normal after losing the number of graduating seniors the College lost last spring.

This increase came as a pleasant surprise to many offices, particularly those in admissions and student development, where housing became a problem in late July and early August. Regarding the increase in housing requests, Marcia Gibson, director of campus life, described it as "a good problem to have," but added that "it was totally unexpected. A few returning students did not go through the room draw in the spring, and some new students did not fill out the appropriate forms."

LANGUAGES

Dr. Clarice Doucette is the new assistant professor of French at Maryville College. Doucette is presently teaching courses in French and Spanish.

Before Doucette came to Maryville College, she taught at Memphis Harding Academy, a college preparatory private school. Doucette taught French and Spanish classes for two years.

After obtaining a bachelor's in French and English from Colorado State University, Doucette studied for six weeks at Laval University in Quebec.

Doucette then obtained a master's degree in French from the University of Kansas, after which Doucette transferred to Washington University in St. Louis where she earned a master's and a doctoral degree in comparative literature. While she was earning her Ph. D., she spent a year in Reims, France teaching English to high school students.

Doucette's first full-time teaching position in America, aside from her teaching positions in graduate school, was at Rhodes College in Memphis.

Doucette was impressed with the concentra-

Anderson receives much needed facelift

by Robin Morris
Staff Writer

Anderson Hall has recently undergone some very noticeable changes in its appearance. According to Andy McCall, physical plant director of Maryville College, these changes were made possible after the college refinanced one of its loans.

The renovations began approximately Aug. 1. McCall explained that the money for the project was not available until that time. McCall said that the main areas maintenance is trying to address are all of the academic departments, the financial aid and admissions departments and the outside of Anderson.

According to McCall, the money that is used for each building is mostly up to the department heads. "We try to work with the department heads because they know best about the problems of each building," McCall said.

McCall then explained that maintenance can only work within the limitations of the budget. If the requests are not within reason, the maintenance department will have to work out a new plan for that department.

All of the classrooms received new chalkboards and new coats of paint. McCall

Poll shows health care, deficit top voter concerns

by The Associated Press

Domestic issues such as health care costs and job security top the concerns of New Jersey voters, a recent poll shows.

Respondents to the latest New Jersey Poll said they also were concerned with the federal budget deficit and the high cost of housing, while they were less worried about defense spending and foreign trade.

The poll, conducted by the Asbury Park Press for a several New Jersey newspapers, asked respondents to weigh the importance of specific subjects under the broad heading of "the economy." The poll follows one a month earlier in respondents identified the economy as the election-year issue that most interests them.

The 621 respondents, polled in a random telephone sample from Sept. 18-20, were asked how important each 10 subjects were to them, with "1" being the least important and "5" the most important. Nine of the 10 subjects were deemed "most important" by respondents.

Health care costs was the subject the majority of respondents said was most important. The topic was given a "5" rating by 71 percent of those polled.

The budget deficit was rated most important by 48 percent of the respondents, while 47 percent gave a "5" to both job security and housing affordability.

Close behind were inflation _ given a "5" by 45 percent _ and federal taxes and wages, deemed most important by 43 percent each.

Interest rates, at 36 percent, and foreign trade at 27 percent were the final two topics given a "5" by respondents.

The only subject not to receive a most important rating from the majority of respondents was defense spending. While 25 percent said it deserved the highest rating, 30 percent ranked it a "3."

Respondents also were asked to identify which level of gov-

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

With close to 200 new freshman and a large number of transfers filling the absence of one of the largest graduating classes in recent years, our college community has shifted and changed. Returning students bring the baggage of past college years with them, and new students arrive with a clean slate.

As we come together, uncertainty is the initial emotion. But, common to us all, it binds us. Though our uncertainties vary, they are all rooted in change—new friends, new classes, new professors, and, for some, a new world.

We are also tied by the ability to make the uncertain certain. The outcome of our year at Maryville largely depends on us. As a result of last year's debate over student involvement in the judicial process, students who break the rules now have the right to be "tried" by peers. Students played a significant role in determining the structure of the new judicial system and are carrying much of the responsibility of implementing it. Its success depends on the willingness of students to get involved. Students will also participate in the selection of the next president of Maryville College, a decision that will help shape the course of the college and its vision long after Vision 1994. As we search for a new leader, the entire college community must pause and redefine what Maryville College stands for. The student voice will be vital in forming that definition.

And the opportunity to shape the future extends beyond the boundaries of Maryville College. Students are already coming together to make changes in their recycling habits, affecting change both locally and globally. In November, we will have the chance, the first for many students, to participate in the selection of the next president. This election year may boast the largest number of young voters in America's history; young people are registering in droves all over the country. Now, more than ever, our voice may be one of the loudest in initiating the changes that will set the course of our country.

Everyone is poised to listen. It's time we found our voice.

Dear Editor,

The members of the Student Programming would like to thank those students who showed up to support the band "The Medicine Men," which played September 5, 1992. In light of the participation, we thought it might be a good idea to explain exactly what the SPB does.

The SPB is composed of 13 volunteer members. Those members meet once a week to discuss and plan activities for the whole campus. Lately, we have been putting more into the programs than we are getting out.

The "Medicine Men" cost us $1250 to play for what was originally supposed to be four hours, but due to poor participation, the time was reduced to three hours. That means that $1250 of your money has been spent and cannot be used again. The SPB was given $20,000 of the total dollars collected from the activity fee money. We now have $18,750 left to provide the campus with activities.

To be quite frank about the whole thing, we are getting tired of spending our time and getting only complaints. Whenever we ask for suggestions, we always get the typical response of "a beer party!" Well, Maryville College is a dry campus, and nothing can be done to change that fact.

Another suggestion has been to get well-known bands. Well, the more popular band is, the more expensive they are. Why would we want to spend $4000-$5000 on a well-known band for 20 people (the average attendance for the "Medicine Men")?

Another suggestion was to have events in an area other than Lloyd Lobby. Well, we cannot have bands outside at night because of the noise. So you all come up with some ideas. Thirteen people can only do so much.

We are going to place a board in Fayerweather for suggestions and ideas. This is a call for help. If it is ignored, we may just have to ignore our responsibility and give the money back to the school (that would mean no Homecoming, Spring Fling, Mardi Gras, or Mootnanning). We cannot keep wasting our time and the time of the bands we hire. We feel that it would be better to have nothing at all than to have a complete lack of participation.

Sincerely,

The Student Programming Board

Dave's World

by Dave Roberts

Hey, kids. Welcome back to another year of leaky ceilings, drug busts, and tuition hikes. That's right, it's the 1992-93 academic year here at Maryville College, sure to go down in the history books as just another year.

Well, how was your summer? Did you spend it in constructive, character-building employment, traveling the country, learning about our rich cultural heritage, sitting on your ass, watching the boob tube? Yeah, me too.

One highlight of the summer, as I'm sure you are all aware, was the beginning of another nauseating political season here in the good ole' U. S. of A. Since national politics is a subject that we should all be educated about (no matter how depressing it may be), I've decided to devote the year's first Dave's World to the political rat race that is going on as we speak.

It doesn't take a genius to figure out that something is highly amiss in our political system. Voters are, in general, pissed off. Unfortunately, this anger is being turned into just another soundbite by the media and the politicians. All you have to do is turn on your TV and you will see either Bush or Clinton (or possibly Perot, depending on what week you are watching) saying, "Well, the voters are angry because blah blah blah it's his fault blah blah . . . And what the voters want is blah blah blah me and my agenda blah blah . . ." If you are anything like me (God forbid), it really irritates you to be told what it is you want.

Here is the basic problem, as I see it: the presidential race has been made into a duel. Americans are competitive people, they thrive on conflict—Magic vs. Bird, Tyson vs. Holyfield, the Cowboys vs. the Steelers, good vs. evil, us vs. them. We always need someone to root for. This, in itself, is a perfectly healthy impulse. We admire people for doing what they do well. We idolize ability. Wonderful.

But, it is one thing to watch a boxing match and another thing completely to watch a political race. Boxing involves, basically, beating on your opponent. To root for Mike Tyson, all you have to be convinced of is that he is really good at beating on his opponents—that he is a good boxer. But what do we root for in a political fight? More and more, I'm afraid that we admire politics. We root for the best politician, and I'm sure I don't have to tell you, political skill is not a substitute for the skills a president most needs—the strength and conviction to guide the country the way the people have mandated. Unfortunately, the entire game has become a matter of politics, and substance (i.e. truth) has been fazed out.

The result: a political race that lives and dies by the media, by soundbites and convenient stances.

The whole miserable thing has become a duel. The Democrats have to make everything that Republicans do look evil, and vice versa. But what is true? Here's my impression of the candidates.

Bill Clinton: The Consummate Politician . . . blow-dried, slick-looking, fake-smiling sweet-talking facade. He and his running mate are all image; young, handsome, and pushing all the right buttons. They promise all things to all people. One day he supports school choice, the next day (before the NEA) he promises little change. He claims to support the death penalty, but promises to appoint a liberal supreme court judge which will almost certainly oppose it. He claims to be pro-choice, but supports parental notification in Arkansas. He says he isn't a traditional Democrat, but proposes millions in new taxes and new government programs (and the numbers he throws around are ridiculously optimistic). He is obviously a born and bred politician who will say what he thinks he has to to get his party in power. Such transparent manipulation of the people's desires turns me right off.

As for the draft issue—so what? As for the marijuana issue—so what? They shouldn't even be considered as serious issues. I wish, for once, he would be honest and forthright and just say, "Yes, I opposed the war and took the opportunity to avoid service in it. Yes, I smoked marijuana once, and not only did I inhale, I got high as a kite! I was 22 years old for Christ's sake, I was a dumb kid and I made dumb mistakes."

George Bush: The Ultimate Pragmatist . . . he will always take the expedient route, always bow to pressure, and always straddle the fence rather than take a stand. He has completely botched the job of being president, except for a few foreign relations triumphs which were largely due to Ronald Reagan's leadership. His problem is that he lacks a set of strong guiding values. He lacks, as he put it, the "vision thing." He is a man of reaction, never action. It is true the the democratic congress has fought him every step of the way, but I get the feeling that, until the election came up, the gridlocked government didn't really bother George Bush.

Ross Perot: who . . . ? He's back in? So who is he? Well, he has a lot of money. And He quit the race once when the pressure became too much. And? He has really funny looking ears and an annoying voice. I am somewhat baffled that the American people can even consider putting a cantankerous uncompromising businessman in the delicate job of president.

Next Issue: find out Dave's advice and predictions about the upcoming election.

Surviving Columbus'

Nancy Plevin
Associated Press Writer

ALBUQUERQUE (AP)—The oral his- tory of the Pueblo Indians gives an account of the New World differ- ent than that told in the history books.

is the story of brutal enslavement and mpted societal destruction rather than otic vision and heroic discovery.

nd it tells of a battle for cultural survival continues today, no longer against con- adors seeking mythical riches but against government intrusion and the modern d.

"Surviving Columbus," a public televi- sional special to air nationally on Columbus Oct. 12, Indians from pueblos in New Mexico and Arizona tell their stories—as ed down from their forefathers—of 450 s of European contact.

eblo history is believed to have begun nd the birth of Christ with the Anasazi, built sophisticated roads, irrigation sys- and stone and adobe multi-story build- among the red, yellow and white mesa and sandstone canyons of the arid Southwest.

In the search for water, some communities migrated and settled by the Rio Grande, where many of today's pueblos straddle the once- great river and its tributaries.

"On the eve of the first contact with Euro- pean culture the Pueblo people comprised a peaceful, highly successful civilization made up of over 100 pueblos of 50,000 people speaking eight sovereign languages," says Chino, 44.

Today there are 26 pueblos in the Ameri- can Southwest—19 in New Mexico, six in Arizona and one in Texas with a combined population of about 80,000.

Pueblo confrontation with Spanish con- quistadors began in 1539 with enslavement, torture and forced conversions to Christiani- ty.

"Coronado may be a knight, an explorer and a pioneer to Spanish people and to you American people in general, but from the Pueblo perspective he was a disaster," says Alfonso Ortiz, 53, a University of New Mexico anthropologist and San Juan Pueblo Indian.

"Really, it was Coronado by behavior who was the savage," he says.

Over decades, the relationship between the two societies evolved into one of shaky coex- istence as the pueblos, after a major revolt in 1680 that lasted 12 years, were forced to adopt elements of Spanish culture and reli- gion that they blended with their own ancient traditions.

Eventually, land was granted by the Span- ish crown, much still held by the pueblos today, but a battle over souls continued as the Catholic Church "sought to replace our tradi- tional beliefs with Christianity," Chino says.

But the relative stability under the Spanish ended in 1821 with Mexico's independence. Pueblo land was taken and another rebellion crushed.

"The conflict ... would continue and would become even more severe after the Ameri- cans invaded New Mexico in 1846," leading to the final armed rebellion by the Pueblo people, Chino says.

Twentieth Century progress brought its own unique onslaught.

Mining towns flourished, forests were lev- eled for lumber and Indi- ans were defrauded of their land.

In a further attempt to destroy pueblo life, chil- dren were sent to distant boarding schools where they were dressed in set- tlers' clothes and forbid- den to speak native lan- guages.

"From fifth grade you get sent to the boarding school in Santa Fe," says Esther Martinez, 78, of San Juan Pueblo. "I didn't like that at all. Nighttime is when it was lonely. When you go to bed you have nice clean sheets waiting for you, a nice bed, but there's no grandfather, there's no grandma there to sit on their lap and listen to the stories."

Next came anthropolo- gists, photographers and tourists hoping for a last glimpse of what was then portrayed as a vanishing culture.

They were accompa- nished by a slew of federal laws that again threatened pueblo existence, includ- ing legalizing the rights of squatters on pueblo lands and outlawing Indian reli- gions.

"The secret dance is per- haps one of the greatest evils. What goes on I will not attempt to say, but I firmly believe that is little less than a ribald system of debauchery," says a 1923 statement from the U.S. superintendent of pueblos.

In the 1940s, pueblo land was taken for the war effort. Los Alamos National Laboratory, birthplace of the atomic bomb, was built on San Ildefonso Pueblo land and uranium was discovered at Laguna Pueblo.

The Atomic Age brought short-term jobs but forced the abandonment of traditional pueblo ranching.

A decade later, the government tried to terminate treaty responsibilities while the Bureau of Indian Affairs relocated many Indi- ans to cities.

Official efforts to destroy native culture ended in the 1970s with the recognition of Indian sovereignty, but their legacy remains in the modern-day enemies of alcohol, drugs, urban encroachment and the loss of native languages and religions, Chino says.

"Not backing off, not giving up life, not shunning anything—we can still survive in times to come because we are unique people," says Alex Seowtewa, 59, of Zuni Pueblo.

tion on academics at MC. "I came here because I wanted an opportunity to be a part of a faculty that stresses strong teaching and scholarship," Doucette stated.

The size of the school is also another factor that attracted Doucette. "Working at a college this size makes it easier for us to work closely with the students," Doucette explained.

One of Doucette's goals is to build a strong French program at MC. "My primary focus for this year and the next year is to lay a firm foundation. After we have some solid first and second year courses, we can concentrate on making a [French] major," Doucette emphasized.

Doucette said that she enjoys teaching first and second year courses in French and Spanish. "It is rewarding to see how a student with little or no background in the language progresses within a semester or a year," Doucette stated.

HISTORY

The history department boasts a fresh medieval historian this year. Dr. Amy Livingstone has come to Maryville College after recently finishing her doctoral degree at Michigan State University where she began as an undergraduate. After a large northern university, small, southern Maryville College was quite a change for her, a change which she seems to find quite pleasant in several ways.

One of the biggest changes is the size of the campus and the classes. Referring to her medieval Europe course, she said, "I would never get the chance to teach eight students in a 300 level class. At M. S. U., the class would be cancelled so the opportunity to teach a class of eight students is wonderful." It is also something she looked for when she was visiting schools. "By the time I'd had several interviews," she said, "I knew I wanted to be at a small school. I wanted to get to know students and to talk to students . . . I genuinely enjoy interacting with students."

She has already found reasons to praise such a system and referred to the abilities of her upper level students as "a very pleasant surprise."

Probably the one aspect of Maryville College she likes best is the sense of community. "There's a real sense of community and a real

By the time I'd had several interviews, I knew I wanted to be at a small school. I wanted to get to know students and to talk to students.

sense of dedication. You're seen as a team player," she said. Dr. Livingstone considers herself "fortunate that the faculty have embraced me as a colleague" and said that the sense of "collegiality" and of community among the faculty, staff, and local residents is one of the reasons she is here.

She is also excited about the department here and commented that she thinks it is "very good, especially at offering a breadth of courses with a small faculty." When asked about her vision for her work here at Maryville, she said that if she had a "wish list" for the department it would hold a few new programs, namely, a women's studies program and courses in Islamic history—which she would like to begin—as well as African American studies program.

In her limited spare time she enjoys reading Latin and mystery novels and learning golf, which she said she has mastered enough that she "no longer endanger[s] everyone on the golf course." She also plays an occasional game of tennis and enjoys riding her horse.

There is one other big difference between Michigan and Maryville; northern bred Dr. Livingstone said, "I think I'm finally adjusting to the climate."

BUSINESS

Perhaps some of you business students have noticed "the new guy" treading purposefully in and out of the classrooms on the second floor of Thaw Hall; and if you don't know him yet, don't worry, chances are you will.

His name is Robert Ledman, and he has come to us from Richmond, Va. Since receiving his B.A. and M.B.A. from the University of Maryland, Ledman has taught at Randolph Macon College and Virginia Commonwealth University, where he is currently a Ph. D. candidate.

According to Ledman, he seems to have found exactly what he was looking for at Maryville College.

"We were interested in relocating, and Maryville College really fit the profile I was searching for. I wanted to teach at a small, liberal arts school," he said.

. . . Maryville College really fit the profile I was searching for. I wanted to teach at a small, liberal arts school.

Concerning the contribution Ledman hopes to make at Maryville, he said that he wants "to try to have an impact on how future managers are trained."

"If I can help management students at Maryville College overcome some of the weaknesses I've seen in managers I've worked with," said Ledman, "I think I will have accomplished what I set out to do."

In his spare time, Ledman enjoys taking photographs, playing golf and listening to music.

ENROLLMENT

In fact, housing is still a problem. Just ask any male living on the third floor of Lloyd. "We still do not have enough space for men," Gibson stated. "Rumor had it that we were going to ask seniors to live off campus. In truth, the residential policy was not ignored, nor was it changed. Only those students who were eligible were asked to consider living off campus," she added. ("Eligible" means that they were either 5th year seniors, at least 23 years of age, or could live locally with family.) Student development has kept a list of those willing to commute, but preferring to live on campus. As rooms become available, these students will be called.

So what is the most Maryville College can accommodate? Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, sees our existing campus accommodating 1,000 to 1,200 total students. When Carnegie is opened, the College can house 600 students. (As it now stands, there are 449 campus residents, an increase of 33 from last year.) "We would really be packed with 1,200 total students. We could accommodate that many, but it would be a stretch," Wyatt said. Vision '94, a project aimed at studying where Maryville College is and where it is going, established those figures as representative of the natural growth already occurring on campus.

"Natural growth" translates into having freshman classes of 250 students in the next two to three years. In explaining the process, Donna Davis, vice president of admissions and enrollment, said: "We went back to the recruiting process of the late '80's. We had a larger pool of students to narrow down. In the past two years, we haven't had such a large pool." When asked if we were attracting different types of students, Davis said that financially, academically, and geographically, we have a normal distribution—normal for the College.

While growth is an exciting part of the College, both admissions and student development want to manage this growth and work toward building a student body of numbers as well as diversity. "In my opinion, a big part of education in college is bumping up against people who are different than yourself, and learning about different cultures, values, and religions. Through this growth and maturity process, you then develop a sense of who you are, separate from what you may have been raised with," Gibson stated.

And now... the greatest hits of Leonard Nimoy?

by Kendall J. Willis
AP Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP)—Over the airwaves comes Leonard Nimoy of "Star Trek" fame moaning a languid version of "Proud Mary" from his album, "Mr. Spock's Music From Outer Space."

William Shatner, aka Capt. Kirk, lets out a primal scream at the end of his rendition of "Mr. Tambourine Man."

Scottie, beam us up, please.

However, some people don't want to get beamed up. Listeners of Kansas City public radio station KCUR-FM eagerly await this aural assault on alternating Mondays.

It's aptly named "The Bad Music Hour."

"Most of it is brilliantly awful," program hostess Michelle Boule acknowledged. "If I wasn't dismayed by it, I wouldn't like it."

Indeed, Boule plays songs that never got close to the pop charts and languished unplayed—and unmissed—for years.

The Brady Bunch comes back to life on two albums. Richard Chamberlain croons. Cher gives her "vintage worst." And Burt Reynolds sings about how much he likes having you around.

"It's a honker," Boule said, chuckling as she picked through a collection of other bad albums.

Certainly, other programs—including NBC's "Late Night with David Letterman" occasionally—have made sport of such records.

And Boule's program draws expected comparisons with the nationally syndicated "Dr. Demento" show. But she notes a key distinction: people featured on her show are trying to sing well, yet failing miserably, while the Demento parodies for the most part are intentionally bad or funny.

"That's the thing," Boule said of her own program. "It's sincere. It's not people trying to be bad."

But despite their apparent genuine efforts, even the most accomplished singers have made it into Boule's collection.

"Judy Garland, in a recording 'That's Entertainment,' starts slurring and skips over words," Boule said. "Then she stops singing and says, 'Oh, there are too many words in this song.' It's awful."

Even Bing Crosby, whose voice was better suited to melt hearts, somehow was persuaded to record an uncharacteristic, lackluster version of "Up, Up and Away."

Rather than flipping the dial, listeners have turned up the volume.

One listener, veterinarian Kyle LaRosh, thinks the show's greatest appeal is its irreverence.

"I like the idea that these people try to put out a serious album and what an atrocity it is," LaRosh said. "The music is horrible, although (the show's producers) do have their standards. They won't put up with anything cutesy, like 'Grandma Got Run Over by a Reindeer.' There have been some really choice ones."

Some listeners call the station to suggest truly terrible recordings.

"There seems to be different categories," Boule said. "Celebrities who think they can sing and other people who have absolutely no talent but they had enough money to cut a record."

"There's kind of a Murphy's Law — singers want to be actors, and actors want to be singers, like Don Johnson, who cut an album of ridiculous blatherings."

But the show proves that the genes that produce good actors are not the same ones that make good singers.

Although "The Bad Music Hour" contains a heavy dose of mockery, Boule insisted she really likes what she hears. She even plays it at home as background music while doing housework.

"I like it more than I'm making fun of it," she said. "Sometimes people get mean-spirited about it. But I like having a good laugh."

Boule, 25, gravitates to used record stores and combs through the reject bins in search of something long-forgotten and really atrocious.

"I think people who collect music get a kick out of pulling out a bad album and surprising their friends," she said. "A friend played the Leonard Nimoy album at a party... I just couldn't believe it. I had to hear more and more."

Boule began volunteering at the station in 1990 while pursuing a master's degree in art history at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Her break came when a guest canceled an appearance on a morning talk show and she filled in as a last-minute guest by playing 30-second snippets of bad music and challenging listeners to name the celebrity singer.

The response was so good that the station offered her an hour slot on alternating Mondays for her own show, which started in March.

The show's popularity may stem in part from a desire by many would-be crooners to hear others fall flat on their face.

"With karaoke bars, you can see people are really inspired. ... People go to these bars just to see other people sing poorly so they can feel superior," she said. "I exploit that aspect of human nature very well—the sense that you've got your act together and the celebrity doesn't."

MC student completes Marine leadership training

Junior biology major Howard A. Myrick, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold D. Myrick of Elizabethton, Tn., graduated from the Platoon Leaders Class at the Marine Corps Officer Candidate School this summer in Quantico, Va.

Graduation from the Platoon Leaders Class shows much hard work and dedication as the school is known for the most demanding officer program available.

MC presidential search underway

A search firm specializing in matching academic institutions with prospective presidents has been employed by the Maryville College Presidential Search Committee as the College seeks a successor to Dr. Richard Ferrin.

Academic Search Consultation Service is aiding with the process, and meetings are currently being held. Advertisements will be placed during the fall, and the selection process will proceed throughout the fall and during interim.

Current planning foresees selection of a candidate to be placed before the College Board of Directors for a vote at their winter Board meeting.

The Executive Committee of the Board established a Presidential Search Committee following President Ferrin's resignation.

Chair for the 14-member committee is Tutt Bradford, retired publisher of The Maryville Times and member of the Board. Vice Chair is Board member Harwell Proffitt, '40. Other members of the Board serving on the committee are Dan Ellis, '60, Diane Humphreys-Barlow, '70, Gordon Stewart, '64, Jon Veigel, and Mary Witherspoon, '56.

Local attorney, Carl McDonald, '63, will represent alumni. Drs. Terry Bunde and Susan Schneibel are faculty representatives, Bill Eling and Andy McCall are staff representatives, and students will be represented by senior Michelle Hall and third-year student Robert Thomas.

Splitting hairs over election issues

by Dr. Harry Howard
Special to the Echo

The quadrennial contest of aspiring U.S.A. chief executives is upon us once again. As of Sept. 18 according to the Gallup Poll, Clinton held a 9 percent lead over Bush (3 percent margin of error). With a margin of error of 3 percent, that lead might be as little as only 3 percent or as much as 15 percent. The campaign is about to heat up with the race potentially this close. Thus, this essay, and one to appear later this fall, will consider some of the issues of the campaign and their relative importance to the vote in November.

One of the more interesting characteristics of the presidential contest this fall is the number of issues on which Clinton and Bush either agree or on which they are not very far apart. The last three presidential elections included candidates with several striking differences on issues. There were Reagan and Carter in 1980, Reagan and Mondale in 1984, and Bush and Dukakis in 1988. In these contests voters could see clear differences between the candidates.

This year the differences are not as dramatic, and, I think, the root of much of the voters' political angst. In the past, such dramatic differences made it easier for voters to decide; this year it may not be that easy. Thus, we see the Clinton and Bush campaigns trying to distinguish their candidate from the opponent.

Consider the following examples of issues on which the candidates are not far apart. Bush, of course, believes the military action in Iran in 1991 was proper. Clinton agrees, although belatedly and with an air of reluctance. What are the implications of this fo-more general military policy question of the role of U.S. military intervention in future situations? To what degree are Clinton's and Bush's policy positions different on using U.S. forces in the Middle East? In the former republic of Yugoslavia?

Or, consider the eternal debate of the proper level of tax on capital gains. Bush's position has long been clear. He wants to reduce capital gains tax in order to free up more capital for investment, the result of which is to create more jobs. Yet, Bill Clinton's position and reasoning, while not identical with Bush's, is not that different. Clinton argues there should not be an across-the-board reduction of the capital gains tax; rather, he would reduce it in those instances of long-term productive investments. Why? Because increased private capital encourages investment, which creates jobs. Same logic, different degree.

The Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), so closely identified with the Reagan administration, did not die with the Gipper's retirement. Bush has successfully pushed for SDI research and development funds in each of the annual budgets since his inauguration. Clinton also supports continued research and development for SDI—his only difference with Bush is that he would ask for lower funding.

Consider one of the more volatile social issues in American society today—the status of the homosexual and lesbian. On the agenda of the gay community is the desire to have same-sex unions recognized and legitimated in a manner similar to the heterosexual marriage. Mr. Bush, a promoter of “family values” (more on this in the next issue), predictably opposes legitimization of same-sex unions. Clinton (also a promoter of “family values”), interestingly enough, agrees with the President on this question, although he is careful to note that as a matter of public we also must protect the civil rights of gays. Who will get the gay vote? Will gays vote at all?

Finally, consider the issue of abortion. Both Clinton and Bush support a 24-hour waiting period for an abortion (although it is not within the legislative power of the national government to pass on this sort of question). Clinton is careful, however, to note that if the limitation places a burden on women of low income, he would no longer support it. Bush, furthermore, supports parental consent for minor women to receive an abortion; Clinton, however, does not go quite as far, supporting parental notification rather than consent.

The point is that on a number of issues that are either of general importance to American society as a whole or of intense importance to certain segments of society, the positions of the candidates are strikingly similar, if not the same. The voters for whom these issues (along with others on which the candidates' positions are similar) are important may find it difficult to choose in November; indeed, it is precisely this dilemma that often is a factor in a decision not to vote.

What conclusions can we draw from this?

First, the Democrats have one of the most viable presidential candidates they have had in 16 years. The reason Clinton is so viable is because he is politically attractive to the broad, moderate middle ground of American society.

Second, the 1988 electoral success of George Bush was due in no small measure to the fact that voters saw him as the moderate portion of the American political spectrum (which is where the “Reagan Democrats” based).

Finally, voters must choose between two candidates in 1992, neither of whom begins to approach the ideological extremes of their respective political parties. This is why on a wide range of issues we ought not to expect to find much, if any, difference between the candidates.

Despite the ideological moderateness of Clinton and Bush and the resultant policy similarities, there are few major points at which they differ noticeably. Specifically the issues of recession, unemployment and health care will be the most significant issues on which the candidates seek to differentiate themselves and about which the American public is most concerned. The second essay will deal with these issues in the next issue of the Echo.

Time is running out Are you registered to vote?

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

Are you ready to participate in the selection of your leaders? Are you registered to vote?

If not, as a resident of Blount County, you can register to vote in Tennessee if you are 18 years old by voting day, a resident of Blount County for 20 or more days and if you have no felony record. No identification is required.

The place to register in Blount County is in the basement of the courthouse located on the corner of Lamar Alexander Parkway and South Court Street. Maryville College is a voting precinct, therefore, you would not have to go farther than the gym to vote.

If you are registered in another state and wish to vote as a resident of that state, notify your election commission of your wish to vote by absentee ballot as soon as possible. They will send you the ballot when you need to fill it out.

If you are registered in another state but wish to vote as a resident of Tennessee, you can do so at the courthouse. Simply, tell the election official that you are registered in another state. The commission will cancel your registration in the other state emment—federal, state, county or municipal—makes most of the decisions that affect them economically. They also were asked which level makes the best and worst decisions.

The majority, 48 percent, said the federal government makes the most decisions, with 28 percent choosing the state and four percent each choosing county and municipal governments.

Twenty-one percent said they thought the state made the best economic decisions, 17 percent chose the federal government, 16 percent chose their municipal government and counties pulled up the rear with 10 percent.

The federal government was the overwhelming choice for the level making the worst economic decisions, with 43 percent of the respondents picking it.

The state was next with 30 percent, followed by seven percent for municipalities and three percent for county governments.

The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus four percent.

MC soccer shows promise

by Julie Nemec and Briana Brugner
Staff Writers

Both the men's and women's soccer teams show promise for a good season but still have a long way to go.

On the men's team this season, leadership is being provided by the captains, leading scorer Ali Sohrobi and goalkeeper Ryan Riggins. In addition, the returning players are supported by the recruitment of several newcomers, most notably sweeper Kevin Ernsberger and center mid-fielder Clay Brantly.

Junior goalkeeper Bill Putnam summed up the team's status: "The fact that we don't have a lot of standouts but do have good team players can help us do well in the long run if we pull together as a team."

With the loss of eight key players and the arrival of six freshmen, the year appears to be one of rebuilding for the MC men's soccer team. So far the men's team has a record of 3-3-1. "Though off to a shaky start, the men's team can still come out on top," said Pepe Fernandez, head coach of both the men's and women's teams.

He added that the women's team shows real promise this year with a record of 6-1. With a large number of seniors and a larger group of new freshmen, the team has the ability to do well. "The women's team shows strength in their quick movement of the ball," Fernandez said. Further support is provided by a strong bench, including freshmen defenders Lucille Bayless, Amy McKeenan, and Shelette Johnson.

The women's team still has to face the challenge of playing several nationally ranked teams, but senior striker Julie Dingles said she thinks the team is up for the challenge: "With our dedication and hard training the team has the potential to go far, as long as we keep a positive attitude."

Kenyon Lacy, MC cage star, dies

Courtesy of Focus

Kenyon Lacy, 21, Fighting Scots star basketball player and "super sub" for the NCAA Tournament-bound team this year, died unexpectedly June 24 at his home town of Jeffersonville, IN. He was planning to return to Maryville College for his senior year in the fall.

The 6' 4", 185 pound forward averaged 9.2 points and 3.6 rebounds per game. He apparently died of a heart attack while playing a pickup game of basketball at his former high school in Jeffersonville.

Scots basketball Coach Randy Lambert said Lacy's death came as a shock to him and to his teammates and other members of the College Athletic Department. "When I think of Kenyon I think of a great athlete who ran up and down the floor like a gazelle," Lambert said. "He always seemed to be in excellent condition." His roommate, Kelin Mark, also was at a loss for an explanation. "He was probably the best conditioned athlete on the team. I roomed with him for three years and he never had any health problems," Mark said.

Lacy was an active member of the College community. Besides playing basketball he was a member of the Judicial Committee who worked hard at his studies as a chemistry major.

In honor of Lacy, Coach Lambert said the Scots' Team Player Award will now be called the Kenyon Lacy Team Player Award. The team is also expected to memorialize Lacy, possibly by leaving a seat at the end of the bench for him. It was a ritual for him always to sit on the end of the bench.

Coach Lambert and a number of teammates and College athletic faculty attended the funeral in Jeffersonville.

There will be a service to celebrate and remember the life of Kenyon Lacy at the community worship on Tuesday, October 6 at 11:30 in the Center for Campus Ministry.

BOX OFFICE

'Last of the Mohicans' first at box office

by John Horn
AP Entertainment Writer

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The frontier adventure epic "The Last of the Mohicans" took first place at the nation's theaters this weekend, collecting $11 million in receipts.

In second place after two weeks in first was the Robert Redford-Sidney Poitier computer crime caper "Sneakers" on a box-office take of $5.7 million, according to figures released Monday by Exhibitor Relations Co. Inc.

The shipboard farce "Captain Ron" collected $4.8 million for third, and the new "Mr. Saturday Night," starring and directed by Billy Crystal as an aging comedian, grossed just $4.5 million for fourth.

In fifth was twentysomething drama "Singles" on returns of $3.4 million, and "School Ties," a film about anti-semitism, finished in sixth with $2.7 million. The musical "Sarafina!" was seventh on receipts of $2.2 million and "Innocent Blood," a vampire thriller, opened in eighth with sales of $1.9 million.

In its second week of release, Woody Allen's "Husbands and Wives" was ninth with a gate of $1.8 million and the comedy "Honeymoon in Vegas" was 10th on $1.7 million.

Here are the estimated top ticket sales Friday through Sunday, according to Exhibitor Relations, with distributor, weekend gross, number of theater locations, average per location, total gross and number of weeks in release.

Figures are based on actual receipts and projections where actual figures were not available. One location can include several screens in multiplex theaters; studios generally do not disclose the true number of screens.

Theater's longest running musical, 'The Fantasticks,' comes to MC

by Sam Waycaster
Special to The Echo

"The Fantasticks," the longest running musical in theater history, is being presented at 8:00 p.m. on Nov. 5, 6, 7, and 8 by the Maryville College Playhouse.

The directing team for "The Fantasticks" is as follows: Dr. Jill Stapleton Bergeron, Director of Theatre, serves as designer and director for the production. Paula Archer is the musical director, and Alan Reihl is technical director. Bergeron commented at the design for the production should be simple and dreamlike. "We're really working on capturing the magical quality of 'The Fantasticks' in our production," she said. "The actors are all working hard on creating not only the characters we see in the show, but also the characters of the 'acting troupe' that present the show; it's a play within a play idea, which, of course, is inherent in the script and adds to the wonderful theatricality of the piece." Dr. Bergeron added that the production is to be presented as if "the whole production were a dream of the romantic Luisa."

"The Fantasticks," written by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, was first written in 1959 as a one-act play which later developed into the original version. The show opened in New York City in May, 1960 at the Sullivan Street Playhouse, off-Broadway. Today, that same small playhouse is still host to "The Fantasticks" which has been playing there for over 32 years.

The show focuses on a couple of young lovers and their fathers' attempts to bring them together. The theme of the production centers around young love developed through parent and child relationships, or lack thereof. It is filled with romanticism and passion, and idealizes the fond memories of youth, the wise contentment of middle age, and the true meaning of happiness. It is about everyday life and the dreams and realities experienced therein. Reviewers have

MATH

Ask William Kelly, Maryville's new professor in the Math Department, for an interview, and he will stick out his tongue and imitate Bill the Cat. While teaching math for ten years at Stone Mountain High School, in Georgia, he would pose for every picture with his face twisted and tongue out. "Finally, one year they had the guts to print it," he says. "I thought that if they were going to bother with my picture, it should at least be unusual or abnormal." He insists on enjoying himself.

But don't let that give you the wrong impression. Despite his penchant for being an odd ball, and the fact that he won't reveal his age ("I'm old enough without being too old," he explained) he is a very level-headed and soft spoken man. As a Christian, he has been a sponsor for the Fellowship of Christian Athletes and has led a reflective life. As a student trying to earn a PhD. at Georgia Tech,

Judicial processes reformed; students take charge

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

In case you haven't heard the news (or haven't read your handbook!), there are some major changes in the judicial process this year. With the confusion of the process last year and the dissatisfaction of some students regarding the way some cases were handled, the administration of Maryville College has decided to let representatives of the student body be in charge of ruling on incident reports and complaints involving their fellow peers.

The major difference in this process is the introduction of the Disciplinary Review Board. Composed of six members—one student from each dorm and one commuter student—the board will meet five times this semester to decide on "blind reports" as screened by the director of campus life, Marcia

CELL program receives top honors

The Maryville College Center for English Language Learning (CELL), under the direction of Kelly Franklin, has been named as a top-rated school for learning English by a large Japanese publisher. The publisher surveyed 58 intensive English programs around the world to make the ratings.

The schools were rated in six categories. The magazine awarded top marks to four schools including the Maryville College CELL program, and one program each in the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Canada. The publisher, ACL Press, specializes in books and journals in language instruction, mostly Japanese and English, and in opportunities for study abroad.

The magazine is called "Ryugaku Jiten: Campus Life Tokushugo." Translated, the title is "Study Abroad Encyclopedia: Campus Life Special Edition." The survey is in the Spring, 1992 edition.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR...

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2806.

To the Editor,

I am appreciative of the time and effort the yearbook staff spent on the 91/92 Chilhowean. The tone of it is mild, and, for the most part, the annual serves as a fair representation of the MC student body. There is, however, a glaring exception to this rule and one I would like to point out. This exception is the manner in which certain religious organizations and certain members of those organizations predominate throughout much of the annual. The sections where this predominance is most visible are the Organizations and Candids sections.

The first twelve groups listed in the Organizations section are Christian groups. These organizations range from scholarship groups to singing groups to activist groups. I frankly don't care whether or not these clubs exist on campus. I am concerned, though, about the priorities of the people whose decision it was to arrange Puppet Ministry and Tennessee Students for Life (clubs whose members are amply accounted for in other religious groups) ahead of Black Student Awareness and International Club (clubs whose members do not commonly belong to five or more institutions), not to mention honor societies and student government. The order of the clubs in this section reflects a false view of the tenor of this campus. Anyone looking through the yearbook would conclude that Maryville Bible College is an evangelical institution that puts ministry ahead of academics and scholarship, that person would be wrong. Maryville College is a lot of things to a lot of people, and the job of the yearbook is to represent that diversity.

This diversity is also lacking in the color Candids section (as well as some of the others). This space (six pages) is precious, and there certainly is no excuse for including, for the most part, people from the same social groups (at least three of these people appear twice). FCA and Davis Hall are not microcosms of Maryville College.

I know MC has Presbyterian affiliations. I owe my education to the progressive church-people who have helped me begin to fulfill this liberal arts background. I also know that working on the yearbook staff is usually a thankless task. I thank those people who cared enough to spend their time putting one together for us, but I do ask, however, that this year (and I hope in subsequent years) the annual will represent the campus as it is for all of us, and not just for an elect few.

Dear Editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to introduce myself: my name is Ronald Stem, and I am incarcerated at the Warren Correctional Institution in Lebanon, Ohio. Despite my current circumstances, I am a college student in the Wilmington College Program within this facility.

I entered this institution in November, 1989, as a high school drop-out and since that time I have received by GED diploma, an Associate of Arts degree in human services, and I am currently triple majoring in Psychology, Sociology, and Criminal Justice with a g.p.a. of 3.85, 92 semester hours completed. In addition, it is my intention upon my release to pursue a Masters Degree in Criminal Justice, or possibly a M.S.S.W..

I was wondering if it would be possible, and providing that space is available, to print my name and address in your publication as I am interested in corresponding with anyone who would be willing to spare a few moments of their time with a lonely fellow college student.

In closing, I would like to thank you for your time and consideration of this matter, and I look forward to hearing from someone in the near future.

Sincerely,

Dear Echo,

We would like to express our growing concerns about a problem with recycling on this campus. The blue recycling containers around campus are for cans and nothing else. Recently, however, we have discovered that people are using these containers for styrofoam, plastic containers, candy bar wrappers, various paper products, and other items which are definitely not aluminum cans. There are trash cans around campus which are designated for trash, and there is no excuse for this excessive laziness!!

A lot of hard work has been put into recycling on this campus by people who are concerned about being responsible with waste and resources. Using these recycling containers for trash hinders the recycling process. It is unfortunate if you are too lazy to be concerned about your environment, but please don't create problems for those who are.

Sincerely,
Robin Morris
Jennifer Danner

So, you've all been wondering with baited breath, what should we do? What sage advice does Dave have for our media-buffed brains in this stormy political year? Well, brothers and sisters, I bear no good tidings; I have no reliable rudder in my own political boat, so all you will get from me is the same conflicting thoughts that are broiling about in your own heads. I plan to unashamedly enter into a grand journalistic tradition—a recipe of nine parts problem and one part constructive solution. In other words, I plan to bitch.

I speak today with the perspective that three presidential and one vice-presidential debates has offered me. As any one of you who saw the debates knows, no reassuring, competent candidate came out of the woodwork to save us from our depressing choice. It's still the same three guys.

So who to vote for?

I'm sorry, I just can't make myself pull the lever for Bill Clinton. Despite his rhetoric to the contrary, he is not a middle-of-the-road Democrat, he is not a "new breed" of Democrat (as the soundbite goes). He is simply a crafty politician who has stuck a new face and new phrases on old ideas. To listen to his speeches, it sounds like America is living in the dark ages. And the solution he prescribes? A massive shift towards the European model of managed markets and welfare socialism, a paradigm of government that he obviously holds dear to his heart. He claims to have rejected the tax-and-spend ideas of his predecessors, but simply proposes new government programs and promises to tax only the rich. This tax-the-rich promise is obviously designed to appeal to the populism of the American people, but I hope you will all take a look at his numbers. It's a sucker punch. What bugs me most about Clinton is not his "promise all things to all people" politicism, it is his smiling, benevolent, twinkly-eyed mask. He wears a facade—born of a lifetime in the political arena—of perpetual, childlike wonder and "golly-darn, I'm just amazed at how wonderful all you people are" pseudo-sincerity. It makes me want to puke.

Similarly, I just don't know if I'm going to be able to make myself vote for George Bush. I think he is a good guy with good intentions, despite the bad rap he's gotten, but he's just not a very good president. A president needs strength, both in his convictions and his actions. Bush is a political robot, a man far more concerned with status and position than with genuine reform. Centered around him, the Republican party has become single-minded in their quest to remain in power, to the point that their guiding ideals have been lost. Many of the decisions that Bush has made are entirely defensible philosophically, but he has remained blithely ignorant of the fact that the American people want and need a philosophical explanation for their leader's actions. Good leaders must have passion, and Bush has become passionless.

Likewise, though I am often tempted, I don't think I can vote for Perot either. Although he's done quite well in the debates with his folksy wit and "I'm no politician" sincerity, he strikes me as a man who is able in one area—the economy. Yes, the economy needs fixing, but what about education, foreign affairs, health care, crime, etc.? Perot, I'm sure, is extremely adept at handling money, but in truth, the president has very little real effect on the economy. It would be nice to send Perot in and have him shake things up, but who knows what could shake loose in the process? There are good changes and bad changes, and Perot is one crap shoot that I am not prepared to support.

Luckily, here in Tennessee, we are tied for the highest number of names on our presidential ballot. So who knows, maybe I'll vote for Andre what's-his-face from the Libertarian Party. Or maybe the guy from the America First Party, or the dude from the Take America Back Party, or the American Communist Party, or the Americans for Scatological Freedom Party, or the Americans Who Just Want To Party. In a year with such depressing choices, wasting your vote is tempting. Apathy is easy.

All right, so there are my nine parts problem, now what about the one part constructive advice? My advice is this: don't give up. There are real, pressing problems out there—learn about them. Collect a broad range of opinions, mull these things over, decide where you think the country should go. Don't make your voice in our political system a stupid one. Maybe there isn't one candidate that is a shining, obvious choice, but there are real differences in philosophy and future policy. Ninety-nine percent of the blame for the country's current problems lies squarely on our shoulders. Yours and mine. We have become like babies, sucking at the teat of government. We expect it to heal us when we are sick, but we feel no compulsion to learn the nature of our own illness. If there is one lesson that the American people must learn before real change can begin, it is that government is a powerful, blundering thing, and it requires a knowledgeable citizenry to keep it under control. It's time for us to take responsibility for our country, especially since our politicians have made it entirely clear that they're not going to. Ignorance may be bliss but it's dangerous as hell.

Postcards from the edge

by John Tanner
Special to The Echo

As my plane taxied down the runway, all I could see were bright neon signs everywhere. The only problem was, I could not read a single word. I was in Osaka, Japan. It was the first day of my exchange semester with Kansai University of Foreign Studies. Six months had passed since I made the decision to go abroad, and there I was—away from my family, my friends, and most of all, the English language.

When I arrived at the University, I was told that I would be assigned a host family in a week. This gave me time to adjust and explore. Exploring is generally a wonderful experience but not when you have had only one year of Japanese. Not surprisingly, I got lost the first day. I was several miles from the dorm when I realized I was without my dictionary. No problem, I naively thought; all Japanese know English. WRONG! When I asked a local businessman for directions, he just laughed. The only words he understood were Kansai Gaidai. After struggling to communicate for twenty minutes, he finally drove me to the University. A total stranger took time away from his business to help an ignorant American. Amazingly, this type of courtesy is the norm in Japan. The culture shock was beginning to set in. The only public signs that I could recognize were ads for Coke and McDonald's, and I had hitchhiked with a stranger.

When I got back to the dorm, I was exhausted. It was then that I met some of the best friends one could ask for. One of the American students from the University of Georgia asked me if I wanted to get a beer. When I told him that I was too tired to go out, he laughed and explained that they weren't going out to a bar but to the beer vending machine next door. There were beer vending machines everywhere—a nightmare for a college junior trying to buckle down on his academic studies.

The first week went basically like this: explore, get lost, butcher the Japanese language, and drink beer with new friends. It is important to note that social drinking is looked upon differently in Japanese society. Drinking with friends, family and the boss is the norm there as opposed to the exception. It is not looked upon as a moral issue. For instance, most people use public transportation, so drinking and driving are not as prevalent in Japan.

During the second week, I met my host family. Instead of choosing a host family in advance, the University serves as a "match-maker" on the basis of questionnaires from the student and family members involved. An exchange student has the option of living in an international dorm or living with a host family. I chose to live with a host family to increase my language skills and enrich my cultural experience, but mostly because my dad said he wouldn't pay the airfare for me if I lived in a dorm. Regardless of the motives, that choice was the best I've ever made. I became close to my host family and now have a second family overseas.

The first couple of weeks with the Yasudas were literally very quiet due to the fact that their English was comparable to my Japanese. However, as time went on I felt right at home. At the risk of sounding sappy, memories of my semester abroad are not my trip to Hiroshima or Tokyo, but times spent with my host family. I would play baseball with my three brothers. My okaasan (host mother) was my movie buddy (they had American movies with Japanese subtitles). I also came home late one night from a reggae bar and talked politics with my host father until 4 a.m..

One thing that brought us all together was baseball. The Yasuda's are avid fans of the Tokyo Giants. True to Tanner form, I adopted their rival, the Hanshin Tigers. They took me to a game at Koshien Stadium to see the two teams play. The Giants won the game 8-0, and my brothers remind me of the score in every letter they send me. I became so close to my brothers that we even occasionally argued (the brotherly love thing), only I spoke in English!

I could ramble on for days about elderly Japanese women with purple hair, Kampai parties that families hosted for me, Japanese students in dreadlocks at Reggae bars, or trips to Kyoto, the historical and cultural center of Japan, but the main point I hope to get across in this article is that more students should take advantage of this program at Maryville College. From my conversations with MC students who studied abroad in other areas, the benefits of the program are strikingly similar regardless of the culture. As far as the academic program of Kansai Gaidai, it is challenging but not overbearing. I feel that I returned from Japan with not only a broader perspective and a new level of cultural awareness, but that the experience actually changed me in some fundamental way that I have difficulty articulating. All I can say for certain is that I'm ready to return... as soon as I can convince my dad to pay for it.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial...

In the first issue of the Echo, we challenged the campus community to speak out to effect change. Many accepted the challenge; the voice of Maryville College came in loud and clear via a number of letters, articles and columns submitted by students, faculty and even a recent graduate. We commend those who lent their voices in support. As a mouthpiece of the campus, the Echo strives to speak for everyone at MC. We want to live up to our name. As with a true echo, the voice you hear should be your own; our pages should reverberate with the opinions and concerns of our readers.

The murmurings have led to talking. The Echo is still listening....

Want to get involved but unsure of the way to go about it? Worried about AIDS, homelessness, illiteracy, race relations, domestic violence, mental health, or any of a host of other issues facing us today? Want to do something instead of just getting worked up? Come "Into the Streets" and join a national initiative designed to introduce more students to thoughtful community service and to provide a learning experience that will challenge us to volunteer on a regular basis.

Don't have enough time? Surely you have an extra hour. Only have thirty minutes to spare? Great! That's plenty. Come join us. During the week of November 8 - 14, Maryville College will participate in the national "Into the Streets" campaign. We need people who are willing to give a bit of their time to work for social justice. We're not asking you to commit for a year; just join us once during the week in November. Come be a part of a movement and part of the fun! For information, contact Stephen Nickle (x8298) or John Cox (x8014).

Campus committees report to Senate

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

The first official meeting of the Maryville College Student Senate was held on October 8, 1992, in room 233 of Sutton Science Building. Approximately 20 people, including Senate's president, David King, were in attendance at this meeting, which was called to hear the reports of various committees on campus. The committees reporting are as follows: Publications Committee, Judicial Committee, Student Programming, Election Committee, and the Intramural and Club Sports Committee.

Brad Connatser, Publications Advisor, reported that some content and design changes were being made in the Echo: the purchase of service and equipment from an Associated Press hook-up and some graphic software, the introduction of a campus calendar, and a student-created crossword puzzle. Connatser also stated that the Echo was terribly understaffed, as is the staff of Impressions, the literary magazine. As for the shortage of yearbooks, those copies set aside for last year's seniors not claimed will be given to current students on the waiting list. For the next yearbook edition, plans are underway to have students reserve their copy, so there will be a better gauge of how many to order.

Marcia Gibson reported in behalf of the Judicial Committees. She stated that the Disciplinary Review Board had met once as of October 8, 1992. Eight cases were reviewed. Gibson expressed that she was "really impressed" with the members of the board and how they emphasize "education rather than discipline." She went on to say that the judicial board had not met yet—a training session was scheduled for October 13th. Dr. Harry Howard was elected unanimously as the advisor to the judicial board by senate.

Cathy Pounders, the advisor to the Student Programming Board, brought senate members up to date as to what activities had already been sponsored and what activities were still being planned. She informed senate that the Harper Place Complex in downtown Maryville had been reserved for the October 31st homecoming dance. Pounders also guessed that approximately $5,000 to $6,000 had been spent on activities for students thus far. A master calendar put out by the board should result in uniform planning across campus, Pounders also stated.

Sophomore Jenny Cummings spoke on behalf of the Election Committee. She reported that all offices and other positions had been filled. The next election would involve nominating homecoming candidates.

The Carnegie Committee was also represented by Cummings. In a meeting the following week, members would discuss pricing for the rooms, requirements for living there, and the purchase of furniture. Jane Overbey, a director of alumni affairs, who was also at the senate meeting, reported that more pledges of money would have to be secured before Carnegie could undergo the Phase III of renovation, a 2.5 million dollar project. Overbey hopes to find student volunteers to participate in a phone-a-thon specifically held for raising money for this residence hall.

The Intramural and Club Sports Committee, headed by Ted Belflower, reported that there seemed to be some problems in the communication between students and the director of intramural activities, Dean Walsh. Senior Jack Scott stated that he felt it was "a lack of signs, not a lack of interest."

In other business, junior Landon Harris was elected to fill the vice-president position. Senior Jessica Roitman and junior Jenny McCafferty were elected to the Presidential Advisory Committee by senate members.

Due to an increase in enrollment, King stated that there would be an excess of funds allocated to senate. This substantial amount of money could be petitioned for by any organization on campus. King suggested that the senate should look into the purchase of a computer for senate and student programming use. Student programming had agreed to pay 1/3 of the estimated $1,400 purchase.

SENATE CORNER

Student Senate Meetings are open to the public and input from the student body is permitted and desired during those meetings. Senate meetings will be held at 12:30 in Sutton 233 on the following Thursdays: November 5, November 19, and December 2. The subjects covered in these meetings will include several areas from preparations for the opening of Carnegie Hall to the functioning of the new judicial system. If you have a subject, problem, or resolution you would like to bring to the attention of the Senate, contact David King (Box 2455), Landon Harris (2397) or Chris Rapp (2610).

LANGUAGES

Brad Connatser is a new faculty member in the English department here at Maryville College. He is involved with advising student publications; supervising the Anderson computer lab; and teaching a creative writing class, a journalism class, and two English composition classes.

Mr. Connatser grew up in the local area. He attended Bearden High School in Knoxville, but was not interested in academics at the time. "I was more interested in cars and motorcycles than school," stated Connatser.

Connatser entered Pellissippi Technical Community College. His goal was to major in electrical engineering, and to become a technician. In 1984 Connatser graduated and got a job as a service technician.

Only a year later, Connatser started his own business. He was involved in electronic sales, video production and electronic maintenance. He soon came up with an idea for a "department store type electronics store" with many types of electronic specialties. While developing his idea, Connatser was advised to go back to school for some business experience. He enrolled at the University of Tennessee and began taking core courses. One of these was freshman English, and it was here that he discovered a passion for writing.

The business idea had lost momentum, and Connatser decided to major in English. He earned a Master of Arts in English: Creative Writing from Temple University.

Brad Connatser

Connatser wanted to stay in his "home territory," and so he came to Maryville after graduating. The college has combined his expertise in publications, computers and writing into his current job. Connatser says that once a smooth system is worked out for all the things he is doing, that he will have time to study part time for his Ph.D.

Connatser has other goals besides earning a Ph.D. He plans on finishing the novel he has been working on for the last couple of years. He plans to "continue to develop (his) aesthetic, including learning from my students." Connatser would also like to "do more research in restructuring of Christian mythology." Mr. Connatser seems to enjoy his field and wants to learn more about it all the time.

Gibson. She is very optimistic about the process and the members. "I think they're doing a really good job thus far. They're putting a lot of thought into this. For volunteers, they're taking on a lot of responsibility for their fellow students," she elaborated.

Once a case is heard by the Disciplinary Review Board (DRB), it can be referred to the Student Judicial (J) Board for ruling, given an administrative option, or totally dismissed.

The judicial board "determines the guilt or innocence of the accused ... and in cases resulting in suspension, expulsion, or campus restriction, may recommend the sanction to the Vice President for Student Development for final action. In formal judicial hearings, any student may be assisted by an advocate from the College community" (quoted from the 1992-1993 Student Handbook).

If found guilty, the student may make an appeal to the Campus Appeals Board who has the option of upholding the Judicial Board decision, or disagreeing, and sending it back to the J board for further recommendations.

So what is so great about this process? This process was outlined in the handbook last year, right? The difference this year is that in every level of the judicial process, the student accused will be judged by his or her peers. Those reviewing his or her case will not know the identity of the student, only the circumstances surrounding his infraction. Judicial board member Jason Ezell welcomes the change in policy. "I'm really glad that they're starting to put students in charge of judicial power. But that means that we have to take responsibility with the power. If we want to govern ourselves, then we're going to have to start participating in judicial events," he stated.

Participating in judicial events is what students were doing by electing members to the respective boards. The DRB members were directly elected by students. Members of the J board were nominated by students, but senate was responsible for selecting the final members. Twenty members constitute the J Board, even though only 12 will be chosen by the accused to hear a case. Dr. Harry Howard has agreed to be the advisor to the J board. A student administrator from the DRB will be present to "assure that hearing procedures are followed consistently, generate proper records, and facilitate the work of the Judicial Board."

"It looks like we have a good cross-representation from the general campus at large. The students' opinion of who and how they wanted the process to work was regarded very highly," Gibson said of the election results. Both Jason Ezell and DRB member Alene Day agreed with this observation. Said Day: "We've only had two meetings, but I already see six very different members who have managed to maintain a fair, open-minded, and objective point-of-view."

Because this is a new process, Gibson does have a role in cases. Other than creating the "blind files" for the DRB, she meets with the chairperson to "help them understand policy and procedure as it relates to individual cases," until the process becomes clear. Although her role is limited, she stated that eventually, she hopes to "step out of this process completely, and allow students to carry out the duties that (she is) currently responsible for such as: documentation; interviewing the accused, victims, witnesses; and the advisement for individual cases." Basically, she sees it as a move in the right direction for the covenant model where "students are entirely responsible for all aspects of policies as they relate to the safety, security, health, and rights of students."

Alene Day takes this covenant idea one step further—"Right now, we have to follow what the handbook says. We have to live by those rules. If people don't agree with these rules, then they need to get on the stick and change the handbook. We may be making the decisions, but not the rules."

survey include Boston University, Harvard, Indiana University, San Diego State, Southern Illinois, Stanford, and several schools in the University of California system.

The schools were rated on their academic program, extracurricular programs, special vacation courses available, programs for specific purposes, and environment and support services. The Maryville College program received highest ranking in all but the availability of special programs. Franklin commented that Maryville College has not attempted to provide such programs.

The publication often cites the individual attention and care given students in the Maryville College program, both in and out of the classroom. Classes average six to seven students at Maryville. The national average, usual in many schools, is 15-20. Extra activities and programs arranged by the CELL staff also received top rankings. The safety and beauty of the Maryville College campus and the surrounding area were also favorably mentioned.

Lloyd welcomes new resident director

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

In addition to the "new faces" of students and teachers, many returning MC students are seeing some "new faces" in their residence halls—new resident directors. This summer, the Office of Student Development had to act quickly to fill two resident director positions. Annabel Henley, the RD of Davis, resigned in late June, and Leigh Anne Cofer of Lloyd left in mid-September. Brad Sharp was hired soon after to fill the RD position in Lloyd and to assume Henley's responsibilities of housing director in the student development office.

Brad Sharp

A native of Clinton, Tenn., Sharp graduated from the University of Tennessee at Martin. While studying in the fields of biology and psychology, he worked in the housing program for two years, serving for some period as an assistant hall director. When asked about his new responsibilities on campus, Sharp stated: "It is a challenge, but I hope to incorporate my past experience in housing at Martin to improve the program here."

When asked about how he viewed living in Lloyd, an upperclassman residence hall, Sharp laughed and said, "I like my backyard and I enjoy grilling out," but added, "Seriously, what I like about Lloyd is that it's not institutionalized—the residents seem comfortable here, and they seem to enjoy the freedoms of an upper-class hall. I hope to make it a living and learning environment, while also making each resident feel a part of the community."

This "community" of which he spoke is one of the reasons a job at MC looked so attractive to Sharp. "Other than having the opportunity to get back into student development and the college atmosphere, this particular atmosphere impressed me. I like the size of the College, and the opportunity that the students have to be involved and have input in the policies on campus," he stated.

Defining the issues in a candidate-centered race

by Dr. Harry Howard
Special to the Echo

Previously it was noted that Clinton and Bush hold similar positions on a number of issues under debate this fall. Yet on a few major issues, there are notable differences between the republican and democratic candidates. Among the more important of these are health care, the national debt, and the economy.

On health care, neither Bush nor Clinton proposes radical changes in the direction of nationalized programs such as those found in other industrial democracies. The issue is that some 36 million Americans lack health insurance coverage. Bush's position is a combination of health care vouchers for the poor and tax credits for the middle class to purchase private insurance. Estimates are, however, that 5 million would still not be covered, assuming that the other 31 million bought insurance with vouchers and tax credits.

Clinton is more aggressive in his approach. Employees would be insured through employer-purchased insurance, while the poor and unemployed would be covered by a government insurance program.

Concerning health care costs, Clinton proposes a central role for government to determine and to control health care costs. Bush proposes little to control costs.

Perot has said little about what he would do with health care.

The issues of annual deficits and the national debt have been forced on Bush and Clinton by the public and the candidacy of Ross Perot. Clinton's answer to the deficit is economic growth spurred by job training, public works jobs, small business investment incentives, middle class tax breaks, etc. The resultant economic growth will generate the tax revenues necessary to finally eliminate the deficit.

Bush, on the other hand, proposes a $110 billion per year in government spending cuts and $75 billion in tax cuts for small businesses and entrepreneurs. The cut in spending and the increased economic activity from the tax cuts presumably will cut the annual deficit.

Neither Bush nor Clinton seriously addresses the national debt. Ross Perot, however, does, but with a package of taxes that would be hard for Congress to swallow.

Issue stands aside, there are two additional considerations that might guide one's thinking about the election this year. The first is the role of government. In general, Bill Clinton sees an expanded role for the national government in addressing the issues important to voters this year. Irrespective of his specific policy positions, a more active national government will be the tool of action. Interestingly, it was precisely a growing disillusionment with the ability of government to solve an array of social and economic problems that elected Ronald Reagan to two terms as president. But now the public, especially the Reagan Democrats, seems ready to try government once again.

Bush, on the other hand, continues to hold the traditional republican philosophy that is agnostic about the ability of government to solve these problems (or, as George Will puts it, "government is a blunt instrument that lacks the capacity to render fairness and justice in a society of complex nuances"). Instead, the private sector and market forces are regarded as more effective responses.

The second is leadership and political skills. Irrespective of the issues (for there will be a whole host of issues with which the national government will have to deal in the next four years which have not yet emerged), which candidate is best equipped to provide executive leadership?

On the one hand, it is arguable that Bush's long-standing connection with Washington better equips him to deal with the intricate issues of foreign and domestic policy, that he knows how to get things done. Yet this is precisely one of the major criticisms of Bush, that he has not achieved much as president. And with almost certain democratic control of Congress for at least the next two years, can Bush be expected to do any better?

Bill Clinton, it might be argued on the other hand, is a democrat and would be able to work with a democratic Congress and deal effectively with a number of the issues about which the public is concerned. Yet, recall that Democratic Jimmy Carter, a Washington outsider, had an abysmal legislative record working with a democratic Congress. Would Bill Clinton, a Washington outsider, have the same problems as Carter?

Probably one of the most remarkable observations to be made this year about the presidential campaigns is that we are burdened with the reality of a latter day politics which puts tremendous emphasis on the candidate, who is mediated to us, the public, through the inherent limitations of print and electronic media (all of which are for-profit operations with a constant eye to entertainment value, audience size, and advertising revenue) to the exclusion of party and issues. Even the upstart candidacy of Ross Perot is one which centers on the person, despite his disclaimers.

Candidate-centered politics is new within the last 30 years. The political system has yet to adapt to this reality. Until it does, we will continue to struggle with political expectations dashed to the ground by sound bites and spin doctors.

MC polls predict win for Clinton

It seems that Ross Perot is not the only late-comer to the presidential race; Mickey Mouse and Bill the Cat together received as many votes as Perot in the Echo's mock presidential election. Of the 150 ballots cast, Clinton received 70, putting him in first place. George Bush came in a not-so-close second with 46 votes.

The election was conducted on October 13-14 in the lobbies of Copeland, Davis, Lloyd and Pearsons Halls. Student RA's and SA's collected ballots from interested students. The 26 students who refused to choose the least of three evils wrote in votes ranging from Plato to David Duke. Other write-ins included votes for: Benny Hill, Flipper, Ronald McDonald, Bob Krystal and Russ Troll. Two students held out for the Year of the Woman with a vote each for Hillary Clinton and Barbara Bush. Several students voted for fellow classmates. Only one student was undecided.

Clinton also received the most votes in a poll conducted by Dr. Susan Ambler's 101 Sociology class. The sociology project involved asking seven questions in 224 interviews with students, faculty and staff. In answer to the question "who do you plan to vote for?" 86 chose Clinton, 61 Bush and 23 Perot. Twenty-seven participants were undecided, and 27 others responded that they will not vote in the upcoming election. If MC polls represent America's mindset, Clinton will be the next president. But the polls also predict possible upsets in the future. President Mickey Mouse? It's only a grassroots campaign away . . .

The Echo Poll indicates Clinton has a sizable lead over the other candidates.

The Sociology 101 Poll indicates a closer race for the presidency.

Lady Scots anticipate national tournament bid

by Briana Brugner and Julie Nemec
Staff Writers

Both the men's and women's soccer teams have been able to pull through in some of their greatest challenges so far this season.

Though the men's record is 6-8-1, the team has been showing improvement. With an impressive 1-0 victory over Emory, which is ranked seventh nationally, and a narrow 1-2, overtime defeat at the hands of Depaw, ranked eighteenth nationally, the men's team shows definite promise for a strong finish this year.

Though the men's soccer team is young, several freshmen are stepping forward as strong players. Both sweeper Kevin Ernsberger and forward Todd Anderson are displaying maturity in their adjustment to the college game. Also, substitute Brad Sterling has been able to come into games and play well. In addition to the new players, the returning members of the men's team are helping to move their season towards a positive finish.

The men will play their final home game on Homecoming, October 31 at 11:00 a.m.

The Fighting Lady Scots have had an impressive season. The women's record is 12-3. The team has had its best season ever this year with major wins against Methodist (1-0) ranked seventeenth nationally, rival Emory College (3-1), and Wooster (1-0) ranked tenth nationally. Each of the Lady Scots' three losses have been by a one goal margin, including the near loss of 1-0 to North Carolina Wesleyan College ranked number five in the nation.

Presently, the women's team is ranked fifth in the south. The offense is led by leading scorers Julie Dingels, with seventeen goals, and Dria Arenth, with fourteen goals, while the strength of the defense is held by sweeper Nicole Schmucker and goalkeeper Lara Sibold, who allowed only nine goals to be scored in fifteen games.

As long as the women's team is able to win their remaining games, they will receive a bid to the national tournament, a first in the history of the Maryville College Women's soccer team.

The women's final game in the regular season will be a home game against TWC on Thursday, October 29 at 3:00 p.m.

Youth signifies transition, rebuilding for MC volleyball

by Briana Brugner and Julie Nemec
Staff Writers

So far this year, the women's volleyball team has had a roller coaster season. With a record of 17-7, the volleyball team has had many positive wins, including coming in second in the Greensboro Invitational and third in the Washington and Lee Invitational.

With only one senior, Michelle Snyder, the team is controlled by a lot of younger players. The new freshman contributing to the team this year include Sheila Pirl, Sarah Hull, Jackie Roszell, Kasi Ault, and Kelly Sanson. Thus, both this season and the next will be transitional.

The girls have been showing promise for the future with a growing maturity this season. As Coach Kandis Schram said, "The girls have a hunger to learn and are enthusiastic about what they are doing."

The Lady Scots' final game will be played on October 31, Homecoming, at 10:00 a.m.

Scots' leadership challenged early on

by Matt Osborne
Sports Columnist

Coming into the 1992 football season, MC head football coach Phil Wilks expected to improve on last year, when the Scots finished 7-3. But two opening losses, 17-0 to Tennessee Wesleyan and 14-10 at Mercyhurst, resulted from changes in leadership.

"Our senior class had some very dominant leaders, and it must be hard for (the juniors) to step up and assume the roles they were used to having others fill," said Wilks.

One example of the leadership lost is at quarterback. John Barry Cox, a sophomore from Forsyth, GA, replaces Kelly Moore, who was an effective leader. Cox admits that he still feels "like an underclassman," but he has met the offensive challenge with 464 yards and two touchdowns passing.

The Scots got their first win at Centre college, in a 21-17 second-half thriller.

"When we needed to do something, we did it. In the first two ball games, there were things we had opportunities to do and just didn't."

Coach Wilks was hoping to carry that momentum into the next game at home versus Sewanee. The MC defense came on strong in the first quarter, blocking a field goal attempt and forcing punts, but four Maryville fumbles let Sewanee put twelve points on the board before Maryville answered. Sewanee led 18-7 at halftime. In the second half the Scots scored a touchdown on a Ron Silver run and got a two-point conversion from Thomas Stephens to pull within a field goal, but with 52 seconds left Maryville failed to convert on fourth and two at the Sewanee 27 yard line, losing 18-15.

In their next contest, against Clinch Valley, the tone was set by freshman Justin Buckles' withering second-quarter block during a punt return that left a Clinch Valley player unconscious for several minutes. As Coach Pavao said, "that's just one of those hits that everybody wants to give once in their lifetime and nobody wants to get."

However, the technical climax came in the third quarter when Thomas Stephens quick-kicked on third down to put Clinch Valley back on their own 19 yard-line. The MC defense then forced Clinch to punt, and the offense went on to score and win the game 29-19.

Maryville finally evened its record at 3-3 with a 23-21 win over Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tennessee. "Cumberland, for some reason, seems to want to beat us more than anyone else on their schedule," said Wilks. It did turn out to be a tough challenge, but MC's ground game finally had a complete victory as Thomas Stephens ran twice on a fourth-quarter drive that took three plays to move 47 yards.

Coach Wilks was happy to finally have an even record. "At least now we're not struggling; we have a chance to be on the winning side."

MUSIC BOX

Jeffrey Gaines offers intensity, reflection

by Don Evon
Co-Editor

I can't even remember now which song it was that I listened to Jeffrey Gaines sing that morning on "Regis and Kathy Lee" this past summer (yeah, "Regis and Kathy Lee," but give me a break, I hadn't found a job yet), but I remember that I liked it.

Now I am not a musician (although I did take guitar for about three weeks when I was seven), and I won't claim to have some deep understanding of the mechanics of music, because I don't (yes, I did take Fine Arts, but I passed on the music section).

By the way, I heartily invite people who do know something about rhythm and melody and other good musical stuff like that (or even if you just think you do) to share their expertise (legitimate or supposed) by joining us here at the Echo as a guest, or permanent, columnist.

Perhaps my attraction to Gaines' self-titled debut album is superficial. After all, I don't really know what else to say about it other than I really like the words, and I really like the music. If I was on "American Bandstand," I guess I'd have to say, "Well Dick, it's got a good beat and you can dance to it, so I give it a ten;" but you probably couldn't dance to it. That's O.K.. I still give it a 10. I'm not much of a dancer anyway.

Although I've been listening to this album religiously (2-3 times a week) for the past two months, I still haven't gotten tired of it, and since nobody that I've talked to really seems to have heard too much about Jeffrey Gaines, or his music, I thought I'd try to turn you guys on to something you might enjoy.

Inspired by the likes of Elvis Costello and John Lennon, Gaines seems to draw much of his material from what must be a deep pool of personal experience.

The semi-acoustic production lends itself perfectly to the intensely emotional and passionate real-life sketches portrayed in each of the album's 12 soulful tracks. Soulful, that is, in the introspective, soul-searching sense; not necessarily the R & B sense.

Wearing his social conscience on his sleeve, Gaines comments on a myriad of issues ranging from abortion to alcoholism.

In "Hero in Me," the album's first track, Gaines examines the unhappy effects of a life without spontaneity and fervor. Similarly, "Scares Me More" concentrates on the sorrowful results of missed opportunities and passiveness.

"Didn't Wanna Be Daddy," as the title implies, describes the emotions of a man unprepared to take on the responsibility of fatherhood, whereas "Choices," which Gaines surprisingly approaches from the female point of view, undoubtedly summarizes his response to pro-life reasoning.

In "Why," Gaines simply, yet effectively, examines the senselessness of violence, and "Sorry The Very Next Day" surveys the devastation Gaines must have felt growing up in a household with an alcoholic father.

Finally, Gaines proves that he is unafraid to attack the stereotypical themes of love and heartache as well. And the careful listener will quickly realize that Gaines has no reason to be afraid, as he tackles these subjects with the passion and inventiveness that is necessary to make such songs work.

"Love Disappears" is a touching ballad that focuses on the loneliness and pain endured during times of separation, while "A Dark Love Song," "What It Is," and "No, I Don't Think So" reflect on the emotions elicited by being in love and losing love.

The album contains two more tracks, "Fear" and "Headmasters Of Mine," which I haven't even mentioned, simply because neither falls neatly into any of the categories that I have already discussed.

Gaines presents his listeners with the type of music that, given just the right state of mind, has the ability to produce goosebumps. So if you're really into experiencing the music that you listen to, lend Jeffrey Gaines an ear, and let me know what you think.

MARYVILLE COLLEGE

MC still seeks funding as renovation begins on Carnegie

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

During Homecoming '92, the population and excitement on the Maryville College campus swelled to new heights, as the offices in Willard House packaged alumni and parents weekends into one, coupled with homecoming festivities and a crafts fair—all drawing people here for many different reasons.

Next year, Maryville College hopes to have another reason for alumni and other friends to venture back to the foothills of the Smoky Mountains, more specifically, to the corner of Court and Lamar Streets, and those majestic steps of a completely renovated Carnegie Hall.

Home to the majority of male students between the years of 1910 and 1980, Carnegie is, as of now, the primary campaign of Vision '94. Total restoration and renovation will cost roughly $3.5 million. Although a huge price tag, a good portion of the funding has been met. As of Nov. 6, 1992, nearly $3 million has been raised. One of the largest contributions, a challenge grant from the Kresge Foundation, promises $300,000 with one stipulation: the College must raise the remaining funds by Dec. 31, 1992.

Ellie Morrow, Director of Development and the Executive Director of the Vision '94 Campaign is very excited about the Carnegie project and students' enthusiasm for living there. "We are determined to renovate it, and to keep the pressure on possible contributors," she said. At the time Kresge pledged in May of this year, finding the "remaining funds" meant raising close to $1 million. The offices at Willard House have launched several fund raising campaigns since that time, in response to the challenge.

Workers at Willard House first reached friends and alumni of the College through Focus, a quarterly publication sent to people outside of the campus community. The cover of the publication had an artist's drawing of the architect's interpretation of proposed suites in Carnegie. A center pull-out gave the specifics of the Carnegie campaign and ended with a request for donations.

Since then, two separate mailings have been made. One specific mailing has raised approximately $85,000, as of November 6. These pledges are for the "Carnegie Commemorative Walk." An alumnus can, for example, "buy a brick" by pledging $250 and have his name and graduating year inscribed on its surface. All bricks will be placed in the sidewalk leading to the main entrance of Carnegie. Obviously, the idea is popular among more than just alumni. Morrow explained: "We do have alumni buying them, but we also have seen faculty members buying them in memory of other faculty mem-

Carnegie Committee seeks responsible occupants

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

The Kresge Foundation issued a challenge to Maryville College which, practically, must be met before the Carnegie Hall renovation is to become a reality: they will provide $300,000 if Maryville comes up with the remaining renovation monies by Dec. 31, 1992. Once Carnegie is a reality for residents, another challenge will be issued to Maryville College—the responsibility to maintain the building in the most efficient, most economical, and most aesthetic ways possible.

Andy McCall, Physical Plant Director, has had to anticipate those type of challenges—problems Carnegie may pose in relation to maintenance, housekeeping, grounds keeping and security.

"There will have to be an increase in the budget that requires more maintenance dollars for general upkeep," McCall stated, anticipating an increase in the staffing within housekeeping and maintenance.

"Initially, the building should be maintenance-free, just like any new building," McCall said, "but as it starts to wear and tear,

Dale Allen family faces adversity

Last spring, Dale and Lisa Allen, both former Maryville College students, were anxiously awaiting the delivery of their first child. Today, six months after Chelsea's birth, their apprehension has only intensified.

Born prematurely, Chelsea was in a coma for 10 days. Originally, it was believed that she had suffered a stroke, but doctors later discovered that her brain had hemorrhaged, resulting in extensive swelling and an undetermined amount of damage.

"Right now," Lisa said, "what we are focusing on is the damage. They said she has hardly any brain cells left."

On Oct. 26, the Allens travelled to Boston Children's Hospital where Chelsea was examined by one of the nation's top neurologists.

"The toughest part of this," Lisa said, "is having the doctors tell you there is no hope and that my baby is going to die."

According to Lisa, the family's medical bills are already in the "hundreds of thousands of dollars," and although friends and neighbors of the Allens in Coral Springs, Fla. have offered their help, the money is dwindling swiftly.

If you would like to help, contact Sash Edwards at (305) 341-4190, Tom Carroll at (305) 356-7520 or the Allens at (305) 344-3720 or (305) 753-6808.

The Allens also wished to thank everyone in the Maryville College community "for all of their support during the most difficult time of our lives. Everyone was great," Lisa said.

I'm writing concerning a somewhat obvious problem that, as far as I can tell, the administration is turning a blind eye and a deaf ear to. Last year, while I was home for Thanksgiving break, I had some stuff stolen from my room on the second floor of Copeland dorm. Let me tell you what I mean by "some stuff"—an IBM personal computer, a Hewlett-Packard ink jet printer, a Sony cordless phone, a Tumi carry-on bag, a 14-carat gold nugget ring and 40 compact discs. All together, it was $4,200 worth of personal possessions which I had accumulated over six years of saving. The unkindest cut of all was that my room was not broken into—whoever was responsible had a key. A key to my room. College security and the Maryville police were notified, and I eventually got about a third of the money back from my insurance company.

The question I was most often asked during the ordeal, particularly by my fellow students, was "what is the school going to do about it?" The answer—not much. As a matter of fact, I never even received an apology. The last I heard, they were "looking into it." That was a year ago.

Sometime during the last two weeks I had some more "stuff" stolen from storage in Copeland. I had a stack of milk crates in the second floor storage room, behind the door, full of stuff that I hadn't yet moved to my new room. My crates were stolen, the stuff in them was rummaged through, and selected goods were stolen. Several computer programs and two lacrosse sticks, together worth about $250, were taken. Once again, the unkindest cut of all was that the person responsible had a damn key. He had time to rummage through my possessions and take what he wanted. I told the staff member on the quad, who I can only assume will tell the Resident Director, who I can only assume will tell Student Development and Security, who I can only assume will "look into it."

Twice now, my personal possessions have been violated. And trust me, I am not the only one. I have heard many many stories of other people who had had their stuff stolen from inside and outside of the dorms. As I'm sure any member of the administration will tell you, it says in the student handbook that the college is not financially responsible for items stolen from storage or elsewhere. Frankly, I don't care whether or not they legally have to reimburse me for my losses, they cannot possibly deny that they are responsible. On two separate occasions, someone gained access to my property with a key. The college is responsible for who gets a key, and either (A) through the college's inefficiency and lack of care, someone lost track of a key, or (B) someone who legitimately had access to a key chose to steal that which he was supposed to safeguard, a reflection of a character flaw that those who are trusted with keys are not supposed to have. I would think that the college would have some sort of knowledge of a person's character before they essentially entrust him with thousands of dollars worth of other's people's belongings.

Either way, it is the college's responsibility. However, it appears that, since they are in no financial risk, the college is content to let an obviously faulty security system remain unchanged. So, I am issuing a warning to my fellow students: if you plan to leave the college grounds for an extended period of time, take your valuables with you. Regardless, make sure everything valuable is listed on the insurance policies. There are people out there with access to your personal possessions who have no qualms about relieving you of them. And there is an administration out there with no qualms about letting them.

Dear Editor,

I was terribly disappointed by the column "Dave's World" in The Highland Echo of October 26, for I had been led to believe that Dave's work was both controversial and oppositional. "He's not afraid to piss people off," I heard from several sources. I naively held such comments to mean that Dave was a voice of some sort of progressive movement on campus. The column showed that I was wrong.

Each of the three candidates is caricatured and dismissed. Clinton "wears a facade" and makes Dave want to puke, so don't vote for Clinton. Bush would be acceptable, but he "has remained blithely ignorant of the fact that the American people want and need a philosophical explanation for their leader's actions." (What? The American people want decent jobs, decent educations, and a decent environment in which to live, not ridiculous justifications as to why the government jumps at the chance to go to war or why the top income bracket needs yet one more tax cut, even though the tax rate for the most wealthy has dropped from 91% to 35% in the past 20 years.) Perot is sincere but not worth the risk. (Is it really that simple to tell after a couple of television appearances that Clinton is insincere but that Bush ("a good guy") and Perot are sincere? Please tell me your secret.) In none of these descriptions is there any serious analysis of the candidates' positions.

Perhaps I was especially bothered by Dave's column because I had been led to believe it would be something different. Maybe in the past, and when dealing with more localized issues, it has been, but I for one found this discussion of the political process and the candidates sorely lacking.

Sincerely,
John D. Cox

Well, it's a done deal. Bought and paid for. There's no going back now, America, so eat your peas, drink lots of milk, and hope for the best. Bill is on the loose. The Democrats now control the executive and legislative branches of our government, and in a matter of years, they will control the judicial branch as well. Not only did Bill Clinton win the presidency, but all the fat cat Democrats in Congress are back, joined by multitudes of new Democrats, all frothing at the mouth to spend our money.

All right, kids, I promise this is the last column that I'm going to write on politics. The whole nasty race is mercifully over, so we can all go back to our blissful state of ignorance about our government (until four years from now, when everyone will suddenly start acting like concerned, thoughtful citizens again). I am, however, left with several thoughts on this election year, some good and some bad, that need to be aired.

• A thought: this election saw a record turnout of voters, which is supposedly a good thing. The massive turnout resulted, at least in some part, from huge public campaigns by MTV, the media, several special interest groups, and the politicians themselves. Everywhere you turned, someone was telling you to vote. The one thing that everyone seemed to be able to agree on is that voting is good, and everyone should do it. Eventually, the whole thing began to get on my nerves. I'm sorry, call me what you will, but I just don't agree that voting is a good thing in and of itself. In my opinion, the focus of these huge "choose or lose" campaigns is in the wrong place. It ought to be called "learn or lose." If Becky is going to vote for Clinton because he looks sooooo cool playing the saxophone on Arsenio, or Billy Bob is going to vote for Bush because he "kicked that Saddam Hoosane guy's ass," then I would rather they not vote. If there is a huge body of people out there who don't know a damn thing about what's going on outside their own neighborhood, then don't tell them to vote, tell them to learn. To find out. To think. I don't want some ignorant jerk having a say in how our country is run, at least not until he becomes an educated jerk.

• In that same vein: I have often thought that if there is one thing more harmful to a democracy than an ignorant voter, it is a one-issue voter. A country full of one-issue voters is begging to be manipulated by slick political button-pushers. The most common one issue for one-issue voters is abortion. It would take a whole column to deal with abortion, but suffice to say, it is not an issue that should eclipse all other issues when looking at a political candidate. (By the way, if a woman is legally allowed control over her own body to the point of killing her fetus, then why is she not legally free to become a prostitute, or smoke marijuana, or commit suicide? That's her body and her choice, isn't it?)

• On the good side: at least our government is no longer impotent. Gridlock is gone. For better or for worse, something is going to happen. We have a young president with some conviction, some new ideas, and some fire in his belly. The country is completely in the hands of the Democrats, so we'll see once and for all whether or not their ideas work. The Republicans can spend the next four years getting their heads straight and deciding what they want to stand for (hint: family values didn't work, guys).

• An interesting idea: if Perot did one thing, he proved that a three-way race is possible, and indeed that a third party is possible. I am willing to predict that, if the new administration proves equally inept at dealing with the nation's serious, long-term economic problems, a viable new party will rise to challenge it either in 1996 or 2000. I am also willing to predict the nature of that party: conservative in their economic policy and liberal in their social policy. The far right has committed suicide by repulsing the electorate with their pro-God, anti-gay, anti-single mother, anti-woman, anti-everything-but-white-upper-class-married-Christian-uptight-self-righteous-blowhard rhetoric. In the end, all the Republicans had going for them was that they would cut taxes and cut government spending, i.e. leave more money in the hands of those who use it wisely: the people. Clinton, however, won big with his message of unity and tolerance. He said, rightly, that there isn't a person to waste. Where he stumbled was the electorate's fear of more taxes. So, I predict a new party - a party with compassion for all people, regardless of race, gender, age, or sexual orientation. However, it will be a party that measures compassion not by how many people receive money from the government, but by how many people don't need money from the government.

• A warning: Clinton campaigned as a moderate, a "new breed" of Democrat. And, throughout the race, the old breed of Democrat (congressional leaders, radical feminists, Jesse Jackson, militant gay rights groups, etc.) remained extremely quiet, having already proved their lack of connection with the American people. Don't think for a second, though, that they are going to remain quiet now that he is in office. Clinton is going to face tremendous pressure from the left to move his policies in that direction. Wait, and watch.

O.K., kids, enough politics. Next issue, I'll move on to more pressing and important problems, such as why this campus is so completely lifeless and devoid of any type of partying this year. Have we been completely squashed? If I'd wanted to live a monk's life, I would have moved to a monastery! See ya.

By the way, my box number is 2650. Write with your thoughts.

Life in the real world

by John Parham
Special to the Echo

I should have known something was wrong on registration day. I could sense it, but I really couldn't place my finger on it—that is, until I wandered over to the table marked: "Vehicle Registration."

Yeah, I knew the routine: fill out the forms, ask the oh-so-subtle "About how many digits are there supposed to be in the vehicle identification number?" (which of course is followed by the inward dilemma of whether to press my luck by asking if there should be any letters in that), get the sticker, skip the picture taking, and be on my merry way. But this time was different, and my unfortunate realization dawned on me with about the same amount of subtlety as Madonna's venture into literature.

I really didn't need a parking sticker. I examined my schedule card and, yep, right there under "hours" was the ever frightening "6." Six hours. That's part-time. Not only that, but I also wasn't even going to be spending any of those six hours on the college's campus. Gadzooks; I'm old.

I guess I should have been prepared for this turn of events; I mean, I've already gone through graduation exercises and gotten my faux diploma (a blank sheet of paper with my name written on it to distinguish it from the other blank sheets of paper in the box), and I had a summer to contemplate my semi-post-college existence. But I guess you can fall back on that prefix "semi" a little too often.

Maybe a bit more explanation is due here. I am currently spending my time in a middle school doing my student teaching. That leaves me with quite an identity crisis. Life used to be very simple: I was "College Man," with my all-powerful: "No, I don't have a work number. I am ... a ... STUDENT." Now, when I write a check, I'm left with the universal conundrum: "Who am I?" Am I a student? Am I a teacher, out in the real world and coping with problems like interest rates, coupon clipping and canker sores?

When I'm on campus, I don't really know if I belong anymore. While most of my friends talk of high, grandiose ideas such as the struggle of illusion versus reality, I am stuck trying to interest them in the fact that an eighth grader blew chunks in the cafeteria. I've already been I.D.ed in the college library ("Well, It's just that I've never seen you around"), and I love swapping that back-and-forth witty banter such as: OTHER: "Hey man, I thought you were out of here." ME: "I am, but I can't find my car." Ho, ho, a man should not have such merriment. Even as I write this article, I am torn as to what my title should be: am I a reporter? a correspondent? or maybe just a guy who needs to quit hanging on to school titles and simply get a life?

day, trying to wade through the raging hormone pool and make learning an exciting experience. I've made the adjustment from "John" to "Mr. Parham," and I've even gotten to eat in the mystical teacher's lounge. You remember, back in school, you never really knew what went on there, you just knew they had a coke machine. Now, I stand in the doorway, sip knowingly and say: "Hey kids, know why I'm doing this? Because I can."

But I still don't think that I've actually learned about the real world. For one, I'm not getting paid. I'm still living in that college fantasy world of "suffering for my education" on an adjusted salary of $6.83 a week and some stolen napkins from Burger King. I look at the others who walked through the line with me and wonder if I, too, am going to find that the real world involves holding a sign with "Stop" on one side and "Slow" on the other or using the phrase "You want fries with that?" in standard conversation. So where does a strapping young lad of 22 turn these days for answers concerning "life?" Well, as usual, I turned to television and my old friend MTV.

You know MTV, don't you? The old standard panderer to the under-25 crowd. The one who first told you to fight the system, rock the vote and love Pauly Shore as you love yourself. Yes indeed, right there in the television listings was MTV's answer to my problem: "The Real World." Uh huh, right.

Let me fill you in about this show if you haven't seen it. We are supposed to believe that the people that the network has assembled are representatives of real life. Here's the line-up: A male model, a female rapper, a college teaching assistant, a bisexual artist, an aspiring dancer (yes, folks, these are their jobs!), a struggling band member, and a woman who ... no one really knows what the hell she does—basically, it's the same as the Village People. And here's what they do all day: they either a) fight; b) get along; or c) discuss why they're not getting along. I may not know much about the real world, but I know that that's not it. It's not even close. And the soundtrack isn't half as good. In the real world as I know it, Pearl Jam isn't always playing in the background—sometimes, Porter Waggoner is all that life allows.

I guess that basically I'm just scared as hell. It happens. Television has helped a little, though. I suppose the best analysis I've heard came from the program "Flying Blind." While contemplating his existence, Neal wonders: "Four years of college, six Dean's Lists, and I find myself facing the same future as the guy with half a face that sweeps up at the cat hospital." Oh, if only life were that simple. But then again, I guess it wouldn't be "real," now would it?

"I'VE NEVER BEEN KNOWN FOR MY PATIENCE."

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .

The majority cast a ballot for Bill Clinton to make him our next president. Those citizens will breath a sigh of relief at the close of Bush's tenure which proved economically costly, politically conservative to the extreme and mired in an archaic cold-war mentality.

Bush's report card is anything but stellar. While thousands lost their jobs and the homeless filled the streets, Bush championed capital gains tax cuts. Similarly, Vice President Dan Quayle revived a committee which helps businesses bypass environmental restrictions. Meanwhile, a hole in the ozone grew ever wider.

Led by Bush, America went to war for reasons still unclear. The goal of the "successful" war has yet to be realized.

Riots erupted in L.A. over a court verdict epitomizing the racial injustice still plaguing the U.S.—a problem Bush never acknowledged. He had previously vetoed a civil rights bill, hiding behind the majority's fear of quotas.

With Bush as president, a female professor came forward after years of silence to report sexual harassment. Though she seemed to have no personal motives, she was dismissed by a predominantly male committee and sent home like an overly sensitive schoolgirl.

The hearings resulted in the appointment of Clarence Thomas, to many the embodiment of conservative intolerance, to the highest court in the land.

Under Bush, Roe v. Wade narrowly survived a near reversal and was soberly modified. The majority of the justices had seemingly decided that they were humans before politicians, and one, Sandra Day O'Connor, a woman before a Republican.

The campaign and debates were Bush's final chance to appease those dismayed by his performance. But instead of making a case for himself, he lashed out at his opponents. He attempted to portray them as a leftist group with the nerve to protest against the U.S. in other countries and burn American flags—immoral single parents, homosexuals, peaceniks and radical feminists hungry for higher taxes to support their nasty habits. He condescendingly referred to these people as "act-up groups" in one debate and boasted that his administration had ignored them.

But, as was the case with most issues, George Bush's view of the platform of his opponents was unrealistic. Those he condemned were beginning to outnumber the "moral majority." Not all voters had grown up white, middle class Christians with two parents at home and braces on their teeth. By refusing to recognize this new majority, Bush isolated himself, burying his head in the sand just as he had in response to the nation's serious economic problems.

But when a voter pointedly asked him about her job security, Bush aptly summed up his own greatest fault by answering that he didn't "get it." Most voters apparently agreed with him.

Many may have voted against Bush's brand of narrow politics rather than for Clinton. But in doing so, they chose a candidate who wants to make health care available to all Americans, keep abortion safe and legal and create jobs. Clinton wants to ensure the transition from defense industries to domestic production, and he seriously addresses the our economic crisis.

On the surface, at least, President-elect Clinton seems to "get it." Though his plans are incredibly ambitious, maybe impractical, he has effectively articulated the major problems confronting the U.S. in the 1990s.

That alone puts him light years ahead of the current president.

COFFEE

mime" type atmosphere.

Starting off the show were Kye Chung and Keith Garrett doing dual guitar songs with everything from Journey to bluegrass. The two are a talented pair, and they showed this off well.

Next was Shellette Johnson with a mime and dance act. After this, Matt Osborne played a couple of original songs. The first, he said, "was written in a language that is not human," and the second, "a creative takeoff on a Christian gospel song."

An alumna of the class of 1983, Jean Plant-Moeller, showed off her singing talents next with a couple of songs. She seemed to enjoy being back at Maryville and performing for the students.

For a bit of contrast, Rodger Russel played some heavy metal electric guitar. After this, Amy Lee sang a song which Chung accompanied on guitar. After getting off to a good start by knocking over a microphone stand, the two did an extremely impressive performance.

Next it was Jay Clark and Keith Garrett doing two songs. The second song, Jay said, "they had decided to do at 2 a.m., and didn't know the words yet" (which we never would have known). Despite this, however, they played with style, and Jay showed off his great voice. Speaking of voices, Scott Hitch, with a spontaneous decision to sing solo, got up after that and sang a love serenade with a deep voice. Scott, who is a bass in concert choir, seemed to get the loudest response of the evening from the female part of the audience.

Lance Klosterman and Bill McClellan, with great care free attitudes, then sang a song with Chung on guitar. The two did a fine job, but kept cracking up, and ended up running off stage clutching their hair when the song was over. They were followed by Ellen Forman, a former Maryville student, singing a song by herself. The barefoot Ellen, I thought, would make a great blues singer. Lastly, Will Richardson and a prospective student from his hometown, sang a song which was written by the Alabama band of which Will is a member.

All in all, Coffee House was a success. The performances were good; many people showed up, and no one seemed to mind sitting on the floor to listen.

Forum addresses changes in African culture since Columbus

By Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

Community Forum for the fall of 1992 entitled "Old Worlds, New Worlds," has been "A commemoration of the quincentennial of the extraordinary voyage of Christopher Columbus." The meeting on Nov. 5 was on "The Age of Columbus and its Subsequent Impact on the Cultures of African Peoples," by Paul Fuller, assistant professor of history and sociology at Knoxville College.

"Since our pasts are always with us, Columbus's voyage had a far-reaching impact, and we are still experiencing that impact today," said Fuller. The voyage not only changed the American Indian's life but also the life of the native African. Not all the blame for the enslaving of Africa should be placed on Europe and America. Arabs were the first outsiders to enslave Africans. Africans, themselves, participated in the slave trade, also.

The changes effected the family structure, values, religion and language of the captured Africans.

Fuller said that because so many families were torn apart when the slaves-to-be were captured in Africa, many African Americans will never know exactly what group of Africans they come from. In Africa, each child was given a name with a specific meaning and he/she usually had to grow into that name. The child knew and understood the meaning. As slaves, they were given new names according to who enslaved them. This caused a breakdown in family connections, said Fuller.

The slaves were treated less than live stock. If someone killed a cow or a horse, that person received the death penalty. If someone killed a slave, he/she only had to pay a fine. This increased the negative self-image which has become a way of life for African Americans, said Fuller, and was another reason for the breakdown of the family.

In Africa, the family used a patriarchal system. A strong male was the head and priest even though the family was matriarchally centered. Fuller said that since the 1960s, the family structure has changed from a male-dominated home to a single-mother home.

As the family changed, the values of African Americans changed: from spiritual to material, from community centered to individual centered, from respect of authority to disrespect. The values that were taught in the strong family structure were changed as the structure broke down.

Fuller said another consequence of Columbus's voyage was the breakdown of the African religion. Africans worshiped their ancestors. When Christianity forgave them of their sins, African Americans did not have to worry about their ancestors coming to get them for their sins/misbehavior.

As slaves, Africans had to learn a new language. The slaves were viewed as stupid because they found it difficult to express themselves in a language different from their native tongue, said Fuller. This reinforced the negative self-image they were being drilled with.

As a result of all these changes brought about by Columbus's voyage, African Americans are very different from their ancestors, said Fuller.

Reduce, reuse, recycle

Tips for students concerned about the earth

By Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

The cities of Alcoa and Maryville began a program on Nov. 9 which encourages citizens to separate glass beverage and food containers, No. 1 and No. 2 plastics, and newspaper and aluminum beverage cans from their trash and take them to a drop-off center for recycling.

Why should this be of any concern to a MC student? If you are a part of this world, you should be concerned about the piles of garbage being buried where you live. Do you know what happens to your trash once it leaves your hands?

How much trash do you make each day? According to statistics in Blount County, you generate approximately 21 pounds of garbage each day. That's about 7,665 pounds each year and 287 tons in your lifetime.

What can you do to help the environment? Live the motto: "Reduce, Reuse, Recycle."

Reduce the amount of trash needed to go out of your hands. You do not need a bag at the store if you only buy one item. Shop for products that do not come in extra wrappings which are not absolutely necessary. When buying shampoo or deodorant, do you really need to buy a box that contains the bottle of shampoo or deodorant? According to statistics, for every $10 spent in a store, $1 goes to pay for the packaging.

Another way to reduce waste is to shop for products that are made from post-consumer recycled products or that come in post-consumer recycled packaging. "Post-consumer recycled" means that it would have gone to the landfill if it had not been recycled.

For each item you are going to throw away, stop and think "Is there some way I can use this again? Or can someone else use this?" Computer printouts can be used to take notes on, to leave notes to friends on their doors, to mark places in books. Disposable pencils can be refilled; many pens can be, too. Try to buy only products that have more than one use. Folders and manila envelopes can be reused many times. Use both sides of a piece of new notebook paper when taking notes. Clothes that are still in good condition but that you don't want can be traded with another student your size or can be taken to Goodwill or the Salvation Army. Reusing products helps the environment and saves you money.

If what you are about to throw out can be recycled, save it. Find a place to take it and let someone benefit from your thoughtfulness. The Environmental Concerns Committee is collecting aluminum cans, white paper, newspaper and cardboard.

Newspaper can be recycled. This paper is made from at least 50% post-consumer waste paper. So, don't throw it on the floor of the post office. Put it in the recycling bins provided and show that you care about your school and your environment.

The aluminum can you drank your last beverage from can be made into one you will drink from next month, if you recycle it. Ninety percent of the aluminum for beverage cans is recycled. There are blue plastic and white cardboard containers all over campus in which to place your cans. Do your part.

Ralston offers internships in Europe

Students interested in participating in one of two summer internships in France and Switzerland are invited to send letters of application to Dr. Martha Craig. Maryville College students will have the opportunity to work as interns at Ralston Energy Systems Europe (RESE), a company which manufactures miniature and standard alkaline batteries under the brand name UCAR (known in the U.S. as Eveready). The internships were established two years ago by Mr. Dan Greaser, a Maryville College alumnus and current member of the Board of Directors, and are being offered again this year to Maryville College students. Current students, Michael Hatcher and Terri Vichich, participated last summer and reported positive experiences. One plant is in LaChaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, located approximately 90 miles from Geneva. The other is in Caudebec, France.

During their internship, students will assist with statistical studies in the quality control division, or other projects depending on the recipient's interest and abilities. Other activities might involve teaching some English or serving as an engineering assistant.

The company will provide appropriate training for these responsibilities. Dates for the internships are flexible, but students must work a minimum of 10 weeks. The company provides a work permit, lodging, and local transportation. Breakfast is included in the lodging and a subsidized hot lunch is available at the plant on work days. All other meals are the student's responsibility. In addition to lodging, the positions provide for a monthly salary of 2,000 Swiss francs (approximately $1,500). Travel to and from France and Switzerland is the student's responsibility. Weekends will be free to travel in Europe.

Requirements are such that students must be in good academic standing and have some ability to speak French. Completion of Math 120 or comparable work in statistics is required. Students from any major are encouraged to apply. Preference will be given to rising juniors and seniors. Students may elect to register for course credit for the experience.

Letters of application should be typed and sent to Dr. Craig by the end of the semester and include the names of two faculty who can act as references. Applicants will be interviewed with a selection made by the end of January.

FUNDING

ers, families buying them in memory of former presidents, and even parents buying in honor of students who are at Maryville college right now. . . We are astounded at the response for this particular campaign."

Selling Carnegie is no problem. The Alumni offices are selling the residence hall from two perspectives: first, Carnegie will be a necessity to meet the demand for residential living on campus with the expected growth in the upcoming freshmen classes and second, Carnegie will be, as Morrow explained, "a wonderful gathering place in that corner of the campus." The parlor in the lobby will be furnished nicely for receptions, small music recitals, and seminars. The plans also include a catering kitchen, a guest suite for special events of the College, and a landscaped courtyard in front.

Time is marching on, and the renovation contractors have already indicated that if the building is to be completed by the fall of next year, construction needs to begin as soon as possible. When asked if an opening was really possible next fall, Morrow was optimistic. "They are removing asbestos this week [Nov. 2-6]. Construction should begin the next week. . . The Board has authorized us to spend money to begin Phase II of the project. If there are enough pledges, then there will be no halt in construction between Phases II and III." Of course, the intensity of the project and the nearing deadline is felt in Willard House, but it is also a concern of students, particularly rising seniors, who may not be able to reside there if Carnegie is not completely funded and renovated. When asked what students could do to help raise funds, Morrow suggested two ways. "Students can either encourage their parents to donate money, or students might like to buy a brick. If someone buys a brick, that person can put the expected graduating date on it, or the graduating date of the freshmen he came in with," Morrow explained, also emphasizing that "the important thing to remember is that these pledges need to be paid by Oct. 1994. A student will have two years to pay for the $250 pledge, or any pledge that he makes." When asked if there were plans to hold a Carnegie phone-a-thon, Morrow was doubtful. "As it is now, I don't think we'll need to do it, but if something should change by Dec. 1, we'll pull the phone-a-thon together. That's really what we do for the annual fund during the last two weeks in February."

More than just another "pretty face" building on campus, once it is completed, Carnegie Hall will become a symbol to those involved in Vision '94. "If we finish it, then people will be more likely to support us in funding the Student Center and Fayerweather renovation projects," Morrow predicted.

Anyone wishing to buy a brick or donate any funds toward Carnegie Hall is encouraged to visit Willard House for brochures or pledge forms. Dec. 31 is approaching quickly.

OCCUPANTS

it will be a harder building to maintain." Some challenges he and his staff will be facing have to do with providing apartment-style living while still maintaining the building's original character.

The walls will be made of sheet-rock, and not of the "indestructible" cinder blocks found in Davis, Gamble, and Copeland. Because the plans include more individual kitchens and bathrooms, it is likely that there will be more leakage and plumbing problems that may, in time, surface. McCall cited other problems that some might people may overlook—"There are little things, like cleaning the gutters. Pearsons has gutters, but few surrounding trees. There are a lot around Carnegie. . . The elevator will be a high-maintenance fixture."

McCall does not meet all of these challenges with anxiety. The heating and cooling system will be "first-rate," powered by steam, and like Pearsons, individuals will have the option of running either the heat or air-conditioning, regardless of season. Unlike the electric units of Pearsons, these will be more efficient.

Parking will be located in the back of Carnegie, as well as on the side, between the residence hall and chapel complex.

As Jenny Cummings of the Carnegie Committee stated, it could be that not every floor in Carnegie will be opened to residents. "It looks like, right now, seniors will have the first choice. Then, maybe juniors.

We just aren't going to have that many people 21 and older to make it exclusively a senior dorm. And even at that, we wouldn't fill it to capacity—137 beds," she said.

McCall does not want to sound like the building will not be worth the problems the College may incur down the road. He went on to say: "I'm very excited about Carnegie. I think the building will be a real asset to the community. I think that the residents there will enjoy the real beauty and character of the building." What he hopes for—far and above quality plumbing fixtures, trouble-free heating units, and the strongest sheet-rock available—are students who will be "responsible stewards to the housing agreement. For instance, there will be fourteen doors leading into the ground floor and basement of Carnegie. Some of these open into mechanical rooms, but more open into public places and private quarters. We are going to need responsible people to make sure that the security of the building isn't threatened when people come and go through these doors."

Cummings also sees the need for responsible people living there. Many of the policies for residence in Carnegie have not yet been adopted, but will be debated at the Dec. 3 senate meeting. "Anyone interested is welcome to come," she emphasized.

MC introduces humanities honors seminar in spring

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

Rumor has it that there is a new Humanities 390 course offered this year. Ask Dr. Harry Howard if it is true, and this will be his response: "Yes and no."

Although Dr. Howard will be teaching his regular course load which includes the humanities class, the one he'll be teaching this spring will be a little different.

Howard's course will be the first such "honors seminar"—a new component to the Honors Program offered here at Maryville College. Adopted by the faculty and introduced in the new catalog, these seminars will be taught once a year by "distinguished teachers" (probably those given the Faculty Member of the Year award), who will cover topics in their particular fields of interest.

The seminar differs from the regular course in two ways: how the course is taught, and the teacher's expectations of the students. Howard elaborated: "The class will be in a seminar format—only fifteen students will be enrolled. These fifteen must have a grade point average of 3.25 or better. Textbooks will probably not be used—instead, the students will be required to study primary readings and then make written and oral presentations. Overall, the standard for the course will be higher."

Specifically, Howard's Humanities 390 Honors Seminar will not have a single focus, which may prove to be characteristic of the seminars. "Instead of just one topic, mine will be a multi-topical section. We'll look at euthanasia, abortion, war, capital punishment, human rights, and equality, for example, as well as ethical theories."

Dr. Howard is excited about the new 390 course. "I'm looking forward to doing some things that I haven't been able to do in the regular 390 class. There are still some spaces available in the class. Only one is offered per year, and anyone taking it would be meeting a general education requirement. Plus, it looks good if a student has this on their transcript."

The seminar will be offered this spring on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 8:00 a.m. All questions regarding the class should be addressed to Dr. Howard or the registrar.

Women's soccer team denied national tournament bid

by Matt Osborne
Sports Columnist

Who says that soccer hasn't caught on in America? Just like everything else we love, soccer seems to have become a political issue instead of a game.

Witness the Maryville College Lady Scots. This is the second year in a row that they have been passed over for an NCAA division III National Tournament bid, and this time it has been especially painful since the team was 15-3 and had what was possibly the toughest schedule in the nation.

Coach Pepe Fernandez tried to explain to me just how the NCAA makes the decisions about who goes to this tournament, and I must say I was astounded. Each region has a representative—yes, a representative—that goes to a national conference and helps to place as many teams as possible from their region's top five in the tourney. It seems like it doesn't matter what your record is; it matters who your representative is. "I talked to the guy on the South Committee," said Fernandez, "and when he talked to the National Committee, he couldn't get a just answer why we didn't go. Apparently, (our representative) didn't do too good of a job, because not only did the South get only three teams in the tournament, but all the rest had four; the New York region had six."

In fact, the South representative seems to have done a pitiful job. The number one seed from the South region, NC Wesleyan, was the only number one or two seed that had to play in the first round of the tournament and did not get the home field advantage.

When I asked Fernandez for a phone number I could call to get comments from the NCAA, he shook his head and informed me that the selection committees are held in secret. Therefore, the NCAA was "unavailable for comment."

And what sort of teams did the Committee select from the rest of the country? Wofford College, which lost to Maryville and dropped their last six in a row; Mary Washington, which finished 9-5.

Fernandez doesn't want to keep winning but several questions have to be posed about the process, and the players have been devastated by their failure to get into the tournament. Senior striker Julie Dingels put it this way: "I feel that it's all political, and we deserve some sort of explanation for this that we earned the right to play there."

Yes, soccer has caught on in America, but it has its own controversies now.

Lambert predicts challenging season for MC basketball team

by Matt Osborne
Sports Columnist

While pre-season polls have ranked Maryville College 19th in the nation, coach Randy Lambert isn't so optimistic.

The MC men's basketball team had their best season ever last year, finishing 24-5 and advancing to the second round of the NCAA division III National Tournament. But changes in the lineup have taken their toll. "We've basically lost five of our top seven players," Lambert said. Three have graduated or used up their eligibility; another, Glenn Cullop, signed a baseball contract with the Cincinnati Reds over the summer. Most upsetting was the loss of center Kenyon Lacey, who died suddenly over the summer. "It's devastated our inside game," said Lambert.

Lambert predicted that the season will be "very interesting. We may adjust our style of play; we've always tried to play a fast-paced game, but we've been sort of inside-oriented, whereas this year we may depend on our outside game a lot more." Wingmen Kelvin Richardson (a pre-season all-American choice), Ramier Rodriguez, and Rodney Lane have returned. "All three of those players have made serious contributions to the program over the last three years, so our team will be built around them."

What makes the season most difficult, however, is the schedule. "It is one of the toughest since I've been here," said Lambert. In fact, it will be difficult from the start. "We've got Rhodes College coming into our open tournament, and they were picked to finish eighth. Centre College was picked to finish in the top twenty, and we play them twice, and we're going to the Otterbein Tournament, and last year they were 13th in the country. Then we play Salisbury State, and they were second in the country last year."

Lambert said that "the challenge is to see whether or not we will respond, only time will tell."

Scots finish season 5-5

by Matt Osborne
Sports Columnist

The Scots fell to Tusculum 26-19 last Saturday, making last year's landmark 7-3 record impossible to equal this season.

Tusculum's field had been the site of six soccer matches and very bad weather for several days, rendering it grassless and muddy. Coach Phil Wilks called them "the worst field conditions [he had] ever seen." MC outgained Tusculum 370 yards to 245, but once again they were defeated by turnovers and failure to convert opportunities. Tusculum, on the other hand, used three fourth-down situations at the MC goal line to keep the lead throughout the game. They also kept the ball for twelve minutes in the second quarter, leaving MC with just a few seconds to hurry down the field and answer with a field goal to cut the lead, 13-12.

However, the second half went all in MC's way as they took two MC fumbles for touchdowns and gambled against the Scots' option attack, forcing quarterback J.B. Cox to throw. Maryville drove to the Tusculum 20 twice but could not score. Cox led the day with 11 completions on 23 attempts, earning 189 yards. MC's Thomas Stephens ran for a season-low 72 yards on 13 carries.

The loss to Tusculum ended the Scots' four-game winning streak that began with wins over Clinch Valley, 29-19, and at Cumberland, 23-21. They came home for an 11-24 contest with Rhodes College, who are expected to avenge their 14-7 defeat from last year. Rhodes scored in the first quarter, but MC answered with fourteen points to take the lead. The score at the half stood at 28-14 with the Scots leading.

In the second half, MC outmatched Rhodes completely, scoring on a 21-yard Ron Silver run in the early third quarter. Rhodes tried to respond, driving to the Maryville 10, when Jay Teague recovered a bouncing fumble in Rhodes' backfield and scrambled 80 yards untouched to make the score 42-14.

Rhodes scored twice more, but it was too little too late. Maryville led 42-27 in the closing seconds as Ron Silver capped the victory with a 2-yard run to make the score 49-27. Tailback Thomas Stephens finished with 175 yards on 22 carries, while J.B. Cox ended the day with 87 yards passing on five completions out of ten attempts. MC finished the day with a grand total of 438 yards of offense.

The last game of the winning streak was in the 1992 Homecoming matchup as Methodist, 0-7 on the year, came into Maryville and lost 34-6 in a lackluster game. MC earned 378 yards of offense to Methodist's 213, but the two teams combined for fourteen penalties for 133 yards. Phil Wilks was not satisfied with his team's productivity. "This is kind of a letdown week, the week after a big win, and you always have to be careful when you're playing a winless team in a situation like that," he said. "You want to avoid feeling overconfident."

Thomas Stephens led the offense once again with 141 yards on 20 carries, while J.B. Cox completed seven passes on nine attempts for 130 yards and two touchdowns.

MC Theatre performs dreamy 'Fantasticks'

by Jennifer Danner
Staff Writer

MC Theatre opened its four-show run of "The Fantasticks" at 8 p.m. Thursday, Nov. 5.

It all began with Luisa dreaming . . . of "a boy; a girl; two fathers; and a wall." Of two lovers, who dream of being together despite their fathers' seeming displeasure. Of the two fathers, who dream of their children's union but are afraid that without a little reverse psychology they won't unite. And of El Gallo and his players, who beneath twinkling lights readily craft the illusion the fathers desire: it's easy for them, too easy.

El Gallo knows that though the wall has fallen, the facade of harmony isn't real and won't last. Indeed by Act II, the twinkling lights are off, the "tinsel sky" has given way to broad daylight, and the blooming new family has ripened into rottenness. However, El Gallo, the narrator in Luisa's dream, assisted by Mortimer, Henry, and the Mute—is capable of a more sophisticated, more real production. So El Gallo sends Mortimer and Henry to acquaint Matt with the cruel world; he leaves the Mute to rebuild the wall and make the fathers regret their feuding separation; and he himself shows Luisa a world that she can stand only as an illusion through a mask. Again he and his crew are successful: father befriends father a second time; Matt and Luisa reunite gratefully, wholeheartedly; and the twinkling lights flicker overhead once more. But this time El Gallo insists that they leave the wall. Because the complete fruition of union is too much? Because without it there can be no dreaming? No fantasticks? No union?

All this in the mind of dreaming Luisa. Or was the illusion just as much the audiences'? Certainly there was a fine parade to troupe through a viewer's mind.

Jill Bergeron skillfully directed layer and layer of illusion into this production of "The Fantasticks" and made it the kind of production one can imagine playing for years.

Sarah Sawyer amazingly reverted to seventeen to play a swooning, romantic, slightly silly (if not soulful) Luisa, and Michael Hatcher convincingly portrayed Matt as an esoteric, ambitious young scholar who takes himself quite seriously. Sam Waycaster and Darrien

Last Issue's Answer

Thomson played two of the most embarrassing fathers visited upon a seventeen-year-old girl and twenty-year-old as if their absurd outfits and preposterous horticultural obsessions were not enough, their ridiculous dances seemed calculated to make teenage blood freeze in horror. Brian cleverly played the knowing narrator, El Gallo, with world-wise panache, and he got help from Robert Hutchens, who played the tattered actor, Henry, and from Chris Lance, who played Henry's sidekick, Mortimer, a hoot—literally. The Mute played by Dayna Tournon, who embodied the illusion and the wall, the rain, the fire and the snow.

The set (constructed under Alan Reihl) was simply yet successfully begged for the viewer's imagination. The illusion punctuated by a significant and well-orchestrated light sequence (led by Laura Connelly). Music (from Paula Archer Alan Wyatt) drifted in and out of the story and occasionally bloomed into a song—found only in movies, shows, or dreams. And the characters looked their parts thanks to costumes (headed by Julie Walker): in particular Hucklebee—Matt's father—was a walking pantaloons. Where did they find the pants?

Exactly whose dream was this? The program didn't say it was charming, . . . yes, fantastic.

Frank Lloyd Wright turns over in his grave

A Maryville College Student claims Frank Lloyd Wright appeared to her in a dream and gave her ideas to improve the design of the Fine Arts Center (FAC). The student, Wilma Kay Byers (an art major), says that he gave her several ingenious ideas—so brilliant that she woke up in a cold sweat, then immediately started writing and drawing the ideas he had described to her. “One of the main problems,” Byers said, “is that the ceiling leaks.” Even though the roof has recently been redone, one can still see plastic containers and buckets placed around to catch the drips of water that freely flow through the ceiling when it rains. Wilma said that Mr. Wright described to her a triangular-shaped roof while she was dreaming. With this type of roof, the water would run off onto the ground (See diagram 1). “This will not allow the water to settle in one area for a long period of time,” Byers claimed Wright told her, “which allows it to seep through the ceiling.”

Another point Byers talked about was the heating and air system. Either it is too hot upstairs or it is too cold downstairs, and there is no happy medium. The upstairs is designed with wonderful windows that are compositionally placed to give a true feeling of movement, openness, and fresh air, but there exists a secret technique that allows you to open the windows—a secret only art students instinctively know. Byers says that Wright told her that “art students are special.” In time, he hopes to appear to all students to tell them the secret. There is a connection between us artists. Wright wanted to make sure that there would be something to separate us from the rest of the campus population.

We ended our interview with Wilma describing the wooden floors that have not been refinished since the building was built. Byers said, “The floors really need to be redone, and color needs to be added to the walls. Frank said to make it look more ‘happening’—it needs something to give it a better visual appearance. He had some really cool ideas.”

Wilma now has a dream class, called “My Dream with Frankie” that meets every Monday at 6:00 in the FAC. This class will allow her to help other students that may be having similar experiences to understand why they were chosen and what they should do about it. She also has a dream hotline: 1-555-Wilma.

STUDENT WARNS Tortured soul lives under campus

Maryville College students who have always been tempted to explore the campus’ underground tunnels have always done so at the forbiddance of college officials, but never before have students been forbidden by another student daredevil. Not until now.

“I would really hate for another student to experience what I did,” said Sophomore Vance Owens. “Heck, I would hate for any human being—any animal to experience what I did. It was the most haunting night of my life.”

Owens will not freely discuss what happened several weeks ago in the tunnels, but did agree to talk to reporters of Blague because he wants to prevent what happened to him from happening to any one else. Another reason Owens is slow to mention it is that he does not want to be regarded as “crazy” or “senile.”

“What happened was real. It was not a figment of my imagination. True, I have no other witnesses to back up my story, but I went to the tunnels on a bet—truth or dare—and the guys said I had to go alone. I suppose it’s an ironic twist—no one thinks I’m telling the truth now, anyway. I guess I should have just bared my soul during that stupid game.”

Owens is a history major, so there is yet another ironic twist in his story. On the night of October 14, 1992, he experienced a little history, first-hand. He guessed that he entered the tunnels through a duct between Sutton and Anderson around 1:30 a.m. A few friends stood over the duct to make sure that he was entering the underground passage-

There was a chaotic murmur—like people were upset. Then I heard screams. I swear that one sounded like a man screaming “They’re after us. We gotta go!”

way. The dare stipulated that he had to remain in the tunnels for 30 minutes, walking from there to the duct closest to the CCM. There, the same friends would meet him and help him up to the surface.

“I really wasn’t that scared going down into the tunnels. I had heard that a lot of people did it, so I really wasn’t that scared. I took a flashlight and a small camera for later proof that I had been down there,” Owens explained. “Only the picture doesn’t tell the whole story.”

The tight squeeze of the tunnels allowed for limited mobility. “Basically, I was doing a duck walk,” remembered Owens. Hitting his head on the brick above, and cutting his knees on the rocks below, the student still thought he was making a good distance in good time.

Owens speculated that he was somewhere in the middle of the distance between Sutton and the CCM when he saw the ghost. “I’ve seen ghosts before—like in the movies, and on TV. The people who make those ghosts up are pretty accurate. The ghost I saw was transparent-like. He floated—so he was much quicker than me,” Owens remembered.

At first, the nineteen-year-old heard voices. “There was a chaotic murmur—like people were upset. Then I heard screams. I swear that one sounded like a man screaming ‘They’re after us. We’ve gotta go!’ Well, of course, I thought they were coming from some students caught by security. Then I saw the ghost way up in front of me. It was an old Afro-American man, dressed in rags. He looked like a slave—a runaway slave. I finally remembered the story about the underground railroad and these tunnels. I blinked my eyes to make sure that I wasn’t imagining things. Opening my eyes and lifting my camera, I hurried to take a picture. By the time it flashed, the ghost was right at me—his hand reaching from above. He was yelling ‘Help! Help!’ I crawled as quickly as I could back to where I climbed in. I guess my adrenaline was going so hard that I didn’t need to be lifted out. I practically jumped out. I’ll never go back again,” Owens promised.

Allegedly, the tunnels that run underneath the Maryville College campus were built for and used by people working with the Underground Railroad, a system of passages run-away slaves from the south used to escape to the north during the 1860’s. Fact or fiction? Only Owens—and whoever else was down there on that night of October 14—knows for sure.

“I strip—therefore I am,” says student —Journal reveals all!!!

Day 1: 11-5-92

Today I went by this seedy little club on Alcoa Highway. I won't give the real name. . . just call it the “Cat's Paw.” It was raining like hell and I was afraid that I was going to wreck the borrowed car that I was driving. At 3:15 P.M. I pulled into the deserted parking lot thinking: A. “What the hell am I doing trying to get a job as a stripper?” and B. “What the hell were people going to think seeing my friend's car parked at such a sinful establishment?” 3:30 P.M.—A blue van pulls up and this older man with pepper-gray hair steps out. He nods at me and heads toward the front door of the building. I walk up to him as he unlocks it and tell him that I'm here for a job as a dancer. He glances at me for about three seconds and says, “You're hired.” DAMN! So much for my resume!

He tells me to take a look around the place. . . it's dimly lit and fairly large. The stage is set in the middle and sort of looks like a mini ice-hockey rink. What catches my eye, though, is the shiny brass pole standing in the middle of it. Instantly, images of Motley Crue's “Girls, Girls, Girls” video run across my mind. My daydream is shattered by the man's return—Do I have an I.D. saying I'm at least 18? I hand him my college I.D., and he ushers me into the dressing room so we can talk shop. A thin, pale blue-eyed blonde bounces in. “Hey, Dan!” She says to the man, “What the f—do you mean calling me in on my f—day off?!! Don't I even get a f—vacation? Sh—, I don't believe this bullshit—!!”(and this is the edited version!) The man just laughs and tells me to sit down. The room is typical of the show-biz life. . . bulb-framed mirrors, lockers with names like “Candy,” B.J., “Dixie,” etc. taped on them. . . it feels like being backstage on Bourbon Street. The girl plops down beside me and opens up her huge make-up kit. Dan takes my I.D. and starts jotting down info. I glance over at the girl and I am shocked to see that she's pulled her sweater off. . . bare-breasted! She gives me a nonchalant look and starts applying some white junk on her nipples. Dan doesn't even notice any of this which is comforting. . . maybe he's not a perverted old man after all! He hands me a copy of the “House Rules” which basically tells the dancers to keep clean and sober while performing( a commonly broken rule as I later learn), be polite to customers, pay the bar fee, be on time, etc. The one that really catches my eye though is rule # 7: “Absolutely no touching allowed.” Whew! Dan steps out to answer a phone call so I figure this is my chance to get the real story on this kind of life.

The girl looks over at me and asks if I've ever danced before. Sure I have, I lie to her. She tells me her name is B.J. Instead of giving her mine, I ask her if she makes good money dancing.

“Depends,” she says, lighting up a cigarette. “Weekends I make big money. . . weekdays I just get by. But it's different for each girl.”

“Honey, you don't talk money with each other. . . especially when the manager's here. O.K? Look do you understand how the dancing works?” I feel like a dumb ass but I shake my head anyway.

“O.k. here's the deal. Floor dances are five bucks—you just stand in front of them and shake your butt. Table dances are ten bucks, but on a really slow night you can take five. Try to get one of the big tables if you can cause you'll bust your a— on the little ones. And then Red Hots are at least fifteen. . . no less.” Red Hots? I ask what they are and she gives me this sly little smirk. “Basically, you just pretend like you're @*#$@* on top of the table.” “My Lord in heaven,” I think.

Dan comes back in with a contract for me to sign. I'm still in a daze over the Red Hot thing so I just go ahead and sign my name . . . my real name. He tells me that I'm a free agent and that by paying a 10$ bar fee every night, I'm theoretically “renting” the place to dance in. Everything I make will come from customer's tips—no hourly wages for anybody. Handing him the paper, I feel like I've just signed my soul away.

“Now you need a stage name so what's gonna be?” My mind starts racing—Sheila? Lacey?—then it hits me . . .

“Belle.”

“Belle? Like ring a bell?”

“Yeah, but with an ‘e.’” He smiles and says he likes it.

“Alright then, Belle. . . welcome to our club.”

CAMPUS SIDEWALKS OUR UNSOLVED MYSTERY

Students and faculty alike have been baffled by the strange formations that have been popping up on the campus grounds lately. Everyday a new, gray, stone-like formation mysteriously appears on the grounds. Each day the pattern becomes more intricate—first a gray slab of sediment, and then a winding path surrounded by strange and colorful shrubbery. At the end of last year there were just a few paths between Thaw and Anderson, since then the number has doubled—maybe even tripled! Barb Hall says “it's almost eerie, and yet it's beautiful. All of those geometric wonders surrounded by such spectacular flora . . . I can only wonder what divine being is responsible for this!”

An investigative crew has been set up in the belvedere of Anderson Hall to study the formations and the meaning behind them. Many have noticed that all of the paths seem to be leading to Thaw.

“Isn't it obvious ?? These formations had to be created by aliens—or the Green Lantern. No human could create such detailed works. They're trying to tell us that the path of life must lead to an increase in knowledge in order for the human race to survive. That's why there are so many plants, and that's why everything leads to Thaw—it has a library you know. Thaw's the campus cradle of civilization,” says the supernaturally apt Jason Ezell.

“Aliens my -ss ! This is obviously the work of supermodel Cyndi Crawford, of some similar supermodel,” argues expert Darien Thompson. This may very well be. So far, there seems to be no evidence as to who, or what, is responsible for these formations. Sadly, man may never learn the message behind the beautiful patterns.

LOVE—MC STYLE

They say love is an ocean with many swelling ups and downs. If so, this couple is making some waves! Take a peek inside the private lives of MC's most dynamic duo. This time the price of love is definitely right. . . . Bob and Stephanie, come on down!!

Who wears the pants in the relationship?

Stephanie: I do.

Bob: I do, of course.

Who decides where you go when you go out?

Stephanie: Since he can't think of anything to do or make a decision, I have to.

Bob: She does because if she doesn't get her way she pouts and becomes hard to get along with.

If your partner lost both arms and legs, would you still love them?

Stephanie: Yes, because he could then become rich and famous by appearing on the Krystals commercials with the other Bob. Instead of "heading" to Krystals, they would be "Bob-Bob" bobbing along.

Bob: Yes, because all I would have to do is stick her in a corner and leave her.

If you knew you would be poor the rest of your life would you stay together?

Stephanie: Well, with the money I'm saving up that his parents give to me to date him, I don't think we would have anything to worry about.

Bob: Yes, because I'm poor already, and it doesn't make a difference.

How did you meet?

Stephanie: I heard he wanted to go out with me real bad, and since he seemed real pathetic, I felt sorry for him and went out with him.

Bob: She sent me a note that said, "Will you go out with me? Check one of the boxes: YES, NO, or MAYBE."

When did you first know you had them wrapped?

Stephanie: When he asks for my permission just to go to the bathroom.

Bob: When she wouldn't leave me alone for five minutes.

What do you when you catch each other looking at other people?

Stephanie: He's too busy going "ga-ga" over me to look at anyone else.

Bob: Go up to the guy and ask him if he wants to take my girlfriend out.

Do you at other people when you are not around each other?

Stephanie: Yes, I've got to see what I'm missing. There's nothing wrong with enjoying the "scenery" while you're on a "hike."

Bob: Of course- you can look at the menu as long as you eat at home.

What do you tell other people about your relationship?

Stephanie: My mom always introduces him as my "friend", I tell her that she is being too forward about it.

Bob: We are having a lot of fun now, but it will never last.

If you get in to a fight, who wins? What do you do to make up?

Stephanie: I do. I let him feel bad and squirm for a little while, till he apologizes.

Bob: I do, of course, because he never knows what she is talking about. I wait for her to apologize and to kiss up to me.

Dangerous Combinations:

- Drinking and driving,
- chlorine bleach and amonia,
- Sinead O'conner and Pope John Paul II
- Ever think of eggs and laxatives? You should.

British researchers compiling case histories of strange deaths found that spontaneous human combustion can occur when one eats eggs and laxatives, which are alcohol-based medicines. Their research also revealed that the elderly and the overweight are most at risk for spontaneous combustion.

STARSCOPE

Aries (March 21-Apr.19) A new person in your life may spark your desire for a romantic adventure. This might be the relationship you've been looking for, but you must curb your tendency to constantly look for a fight. Fighting a war will only make both of you lose.

Cancer (June 22-July 22) A needy co-worker inspires your maternal instincts-but be careful, your interference could make both of you crabby!

Libra (Sept. 23- Oct. 23). Your observe a situation at work which needs correcting. If you think about it, the scales are already tipped towards one solution, so trust your intuition in this case.

Capricorn (Dec. 22- Jan. 19) Your persistence will allow you to solve a problem nobody else has found a solution to. Don't be too gentle when you are dealing with other people. Today it is important to be assertive.

Taurus (Apr. 20-May 20) A new work or school related activity may present itself. Listen to the people who care about you when deciding what to do. Consider the consequences of your actions. Don't be bull headed.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) A new project allows you to take center stage. Be sure to tame the wild beast in you, so as not to hurt someone you care about.

Scorpio (Oct. 24- Nov. 21) Walk carefully today- your need for revenge could sting someone you really care about.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) This week you feel like you're in over your head with personal problems. Try to handle one crises at a time. You'll soon float to the top again.

Gemini (May 21-June 21) A new friend is on your horizon. He or she seems like the sibling you never had. Don't rush. He or she may not be ready for a close relationship.

Virgo (Aug. 23- Sept. 22) A new romantic interest fills your mind and dreams. Relax- a display of spontaneity this week might just make him or her sit up and take notice.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22- Dec. 21) Your piercing intelligence has penetrated the armor of someone you'd like to know better. Be careful that you don't shoot down a good thing before it begins!

Pisces (Feb. 19- March 20) You may feel like a fish out of water at a social event. Don't worry. Give yourself a break. There will be another opportunity to shine in the public spotlight. You'll be in the swim of things in no time.

Dear Hope

Dear Hope,
Help! I am going to visit my boyfriend's parents over the Christmas break. My boyfriend and I have been dating for almost three months now, and I really don't know much about his parents, except what he has told me. All I get from him is that he has had his "differences" with them in the past, but things are "better." All of this makes me very anxious.
Do you have any suggestions? Would it be better for me to not ask questions and remain quiet during my stay? How should I address them? What should I wear? Help!

Anxious Visitor

Dear Anxious,
First of all, congratulations. Obviously, this guy likes you, otherwise, he would not be inviting you to his home. If you are looking to please someone, please him. Remember that the first things first— what to wear. What is your boyfriend's favorite outfit? Does he like you in leather, lace, or lycra? Ask him, then act accordingly. As for the family secrets— if it really eats at you, then corner his mother the night when your boyfriend is not around and ask her. What he does not know, cannot hurt him, right? How should you address her and her husband? Call them by their first names, of course. You're bound to get familiar sooner or later. It may catch them off guard at first, but they'll have to accept it. Take another piece of advice— enjoy this visit. It's your vacation, too.

Dear Hope,
I have always been attracted to older men, but I never pursued one who was not "in my league" and who didn't express an interest in me first. Lately I find myself interested in a man who is definitely off limits—he is married and he is my professor. He has been my teacher for several classes since I became a student here, and although I don't find him terribly attractive, I am very drawn to his intellect. We "hit it off" perfectly. I have reason to believe that he is interested, too, but I don't want to be part of a campus scandal. He has expressed some desire for the two of us to meet off campus, and is pressuring me for an answer.
I am a conscientious student, and I have a very good g.p.a. With finals approaching, I am afraid that if I turn him down, I will not be awarded the grade that I deserve.
What should I do?

Student with a Crush

Dear Student with a Crush,
This is a sticky situation, indeed. The best advice that I can give you (and it will sound cheesy), is to go with your heart. His marriage sounds like it is on the rocks, so make sure that his feelings are sincere, and that he is not just sexually frustrated. It does sound like your feelings are sincere, and if you turn down his offers, you could be left with the "what if" doubts. Meeting him off campus does sound a little risky, but, that does not mean that you have to go to a public place. I would suggest that the two of you go to a nice, secluded restaurant out of town. This "date" could answer a lot of questions for you. Plus, it could not hurt your grade, whereas giving him the run-around might jeopardize your final grade. There must be some age difference between the two of you—if that does not bother you, then do not worry about what other people may think. It is your life, after all.

Dear Hope,
A few days ago, I was in the College bookstore buying my books. I greeted a friend of mine who is in a few of my classes this semester. She was looking over the books for her classes next semester. When I asked her if they were expensive, she just looked at me as if I were stupid and said, "Of course they are. I don't know if I'll be able to afford them this time." I went to another part of the bookstore, and when I turned around to tell her something, I noticed that she was slipping one small book under her jacket. She walked out the door. I turned away, and didn't say a word.

I know this person fairly well. She is an older student—married, and a mother of three. I know that her husband was in an accident this semester and wasn't able to work, and I know that she held some part-time job to fall back on when their savings ran out.
Although I have sympathy for the problems that she is facing, I am also angered at anyone who steals. Stealing is one reason some items are so expensive in the first place. I want to do something, but I don't know what.

Witness to a Crime
Dear Witness to a Crime,
Yes, you do have reason to be angry, but being a tattle-tail is not going to make you feel better, nor is it going to benefit her. You are right when you say that theft is the cause of some inflated prices. With that in mind, I have only one suggestion to alleviate your distress. If you find that she is in your class next semester, ask to borrow her book. Keep it for several days, and when she asks you to return it, tell her that you are sorry—you lost it, and are up to your eyeballs in debt. Likely, she will understand. This might be totally out of character for you, but keep this in mind: because she took the book without paying for it in the first place, you will, sooner or later, pay for it in the long run.

Dear Hope,
I think that I may have that "not so fresh feeling." What are the symptoms, and how should I treat it?

Unpopular

Dear Unpopular,
It is natural that we all get those "not so fresh" feelings, particularly we women. Personal hygiene is a serious subject, and should not be taken lightly. PHEW (People for the Hygienic Ethics of Women) outlines the following as symptoms of what they call "NSFF" (not so fresh feeling): compulsive showering; tendency to indulge in perfume; avoidance of warm, crowded spaces; panty hose anxiety; and a loss in sex drive.
Treatment can be handled in a number of ways. Most people wait for it to pass naturally, but if you really cannot face life, there are a number of feminine hygiene products on the market that may help. A less expensive approach might be the same your grandmother used.

CCM visited by St. John and Gregory

Anyone who thinks there is nothing left to discover at Maryville College should talk to the Biblical scholars who visited our campus last week.

Peter St. John and Paul Gregory, leading biblical experts working at a prominent university, visited our campus last week to complete their tour of East Tennessee. They are writing a book on how our ancestors showed their faith with the word of God through the architecture they built.

When they first examined the Center for Campus Ministry, they did not see anything special. Then they decided to look at the roof. While climbing a ladder, St. John looked through the window.

"There they were, intertwined with the supports of the building. They are the most beautifully elegant and simple letters. They're a message of some kind from the past to us. We're just not sure what the message is yet," St. John said.

The pair say that the letters do not seem to form a complete pattern and serve no apparent purpose for the function of the building today.

Possible meanings for the letters include a prophecy from our ancestors or a coded message from heavenly beings to us. "We believe that the generations which lived before us were very spiritual people. It is quite possible that they were directly in contact with and influenced by the Holy Spirit in a way that the people of today are not. They might have left a message for our generation, to let us know how God enriched their lives. We also believe that God sends heavenly or spiritual beings to look after humans and impart wisdom and knowledge to them. They could have left a message for us. We really don't know which answer is right in this case. All we're sure of is that the letters are a sign that Maryville College has been blessed by beings on a higher plane than our own."

Our Diet! A success story!

Scooter Hogg did not think that it could ever be done. "I knew that it'd be hard.

Kind of like one of those things that you keep putting off until 'later'." "Later" came sooner than Scooter Hogg thought. He dropped 40 pounds in less than a month on a diet Blague published in their Spring issue. The success stories keep pouring in.

Hogg was one of the more enthusiastic dieters to write us. The editors thought that with the holidays approaching, it would be a good idea to reprint the guidelines to our Miracle Diet.

It is as easy as picking your favorite food and eating as much of it as you want. Hopefully, your favorite food is asparagus. That is all the diet allows.

Asparagus and water.

"I knew that I wouldn't be able to stick to a diet where I had to count calories and fat grams or weigh portions in ounces and liters. On this diet, I know—if it ain't asparagus and water, it ain't for me," Hogg elaborated.

Doctors have often recommended that dieters eat lots of fruits and vegetables while on diets because of their high nutritional value and low fat content. It was not until recently that a team of doctors from the Institute of Portly Research (IPR) found that people could exist on asparagus and water for long periods of time without putting their health in jeopardy. They do not advise that a person live solely on asparagus and water for more than six months, but neither do they believe that six months is needed for even the most obese people to lose a significant amount of weight.

"Before I tried the Miracle Diet, my life had no direction or social value... but all that's changed now! I'm no longer Jabba-the-Hut like I used to be... I'm a brand new me! It's so easy! And, I didn't mention this before, but there's no sweating, heavy breathing, or physical exertion required. Thanks IPR," Hogg added.

Peter Jones thought it would be just another ordinary day when he woke last Monday morning. After a long day's work at a local office, he stopped by Kroger's on his way home.

As he came out the door he was stopped short by what he saw. A giant turtle seemingly came out of nowhere and began moving into the path of an oncoming car! "I could see the driver trying to swerve, but there just wasn't enough time to react."

Man saves turtle and finds true love!

The driver of the Chevy Celebrity, Pamela Brantly, told her story. "Suddenly there was this big creature in my way. I tried to move, but there wasn't time. I hit it, and my car just died there. I couldn't budge it."

When Peter saw the trapped turtle, he ran to its aid. "I'm an animal lover. I can't stand to see any living thing hurt. So I just went to see if I could help."

But Peter didn't know his own strength. According to witnesses, when he reached the car, he began to push and actually lifted the car off the turtle, letting it crawl away from danger.

Pamela was so impressed by Peter's bravery that she suggested that they go out for coffee. One thing has led to another, and the couple is now planning for a January wedding. "I never thought I'd find the girl of my dreams in Kroger's parking lot," Peter said. "He's everything I've always wanted in my life companion," Pamela said.

What was the fate of the turtle? The story also has a happy ending. Now the animal control officers the pair contacted suggested had any idea where the turtle came from or how he ended up in the parking lot. No one had any objection to the pair adopting the now charming creature. Pamela said, "After running over the poor thing, I guess he crawled out from under the car and into my heart. There's no way we could turn him away."

Satanic swarm surrounds students!

On an early September day two unsuspecting MC students, Kevyn Smith and Krista Ross-Mull, were taking a peace-walk in the campus woods and were savagely attacked by a group of killer bees. The Baalistic bees began to buzz demonically when the two approached a thicket just beyond the Amphitheater, and they then hovered above the two in an inverted cross formation. "It was as if all of Satan's furies had been unleashed at once," says Kevyn, a Libra. "It was the most horrifying thing I've ever experienced!" The Satanic swarm surrounded the two and began to sting them unmercifully. The swarm chased them through the woods, stinging them, and didn't stop until the two reached their car—which was mysteriously started with the radio playing Elvis' smash hit "Love Me Tender." The hideous hoard halted and headed back to their hellacious hide-away. We asked Krista, a pet owner, to comment on her experience, but she could only give a wide-eyed look of horror and reply, "Thank God the King is still TCB."

Maryville College welcomes its 10th president

Gibson cites quality education as priority

Dr. Gerald W. Gibson, vice president and dean of Roanoke College in Salem, Va., has been selected to be Maryville College's 10th president.

According to Dick Ragsdale, chairman of the board of directors, Gibson was offered the position after a unanimous vote by the board January 29. He will assume his duties in Maryville July 1. Dr. Mark Ebersole is currently serving as interim president.

The selection of Gibson marks the end of a search for a new president following the resignation of Dr. Richard I. Ferrin in April 1992. The Presidential Search Committee, chaired by Dr. Tutt Bradford, with membership representing the board, faculty, staff, students and alumni, presented Dr. Gibson's name to the board.

In a telephone interview with the Echo, Gibson said that he and his family are "extremely eager to come and begin work at Maryville College and are delighted at the prospect of joining the community."

Gibson explained why he was initially attracted to Maryville College: "It is the kind of college where I think I fit—historical, liberal arts, church-related—and the kind that gives the best education."

After meeting with the Search Committee and later visiting the campus, Gibson said he was impressed by "the mutual respect between people across all constituency lines and the high quality of people at Maryville" as well as "the keen sense of momentum and keen sense of continuing that momentum."

Gibson cited improving the quality of education at Maryville as his first priority as president: "I want students to feel that they are becoming stronger and the faculty to feel that they will continue to be supported. I want to push for the highest quality in every area."

Quality education was also Gibson's priority at Roanoke where he worked with the faculty on a new general education curriculum which has gained national notice. During his 9-year tenure at Roanoke the faculty was expanded by 36 percent, the student-faculty ratio decreased from 17-1 to 14-1, and faculty salaries were brought above the national average for the first time.

With Gibson as dean, Freshman retention at Roanoke increased by 10 points, and over

Academic Life Council revises absentee policy

by Jennifer Tucker
Staff Writer

Student and faculty debate concerning a standard attendance policy has resulted in a revision by the Academic Life Council (ALC) of the existing policy.

The current policy, which is located in the "Maryville College Handbook," says, "Students are expected to attend class regularly and are responsible to the faculty member concerned for class attendance and participation. Students seeking to be excused from class and (sic) responsible for providing the faculty member verification of the excuse."

The policy is defined differently in the MC catalog, which states, "... If absences for these reasons exceed five, the student should explain the problem to the instructor, or the instructor may initiate such discussion ..."

Other than what is stated in the catalog and the handbook, the implementation of the policy is left up to the discretion of the teacher. The new policy would affect all departments in the same way.

During the January faculty meeting, Dr. Dean Boldon, academic vice president, introduced student concerns, and faculty discussed the consistency of the policy within the college's schedule. Their concerns were mainly focused on the inconsistency of the policy distinguishing between the Monday/Wednesday/Friday (MWF) classes and the Tuesday/Thursday (TR) classes. The catalog specifies five as a maximum number of hours to be missed, but five class periods can mean five hours or it can mean fifteen hours. Five classes equals one-third of the January term. To miss a TR class is more threatening than to miss a MWF class.

After much discussion, the members decided to change the current policy so it will be more adaptable to the course curriculum.

The ALC then proposed a new wording to ### Actors dramatize Luther's dream

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

"Life of a King," a dramatic interpretation of historical moments in the 1960s civil rights movement, was presented to the MC community as the beginning of this spring's Community Forum Program, "Individual Responsibility in an Irresponsible World."

Georgia Senator Arthur Langford, Jr. and actress Betty Vaughn gave a chronological oratorical compilation of events that happened over twenty years ago. Langford, as a student who was involved in the marches with King, decided after King's assassination to orchestrate his "Life of a King" presentation to continue King's message. Langford has studied and rehearsed Martin Luther King, Jr.'s oratorical style and famous orations which turned a nation towards a path towards equal rights for all men.

Vaughn, who has appeared in over 50 major roles in stage productions, including the mother in the music video "Parent's Just Don't Understand" and a nurse on "As the World Turns," has been involved with the "Life of a King" semi-documentary for 22 years. Vaughn portrays women of the civil rights era in their happiness, pain and sorrow. On the FAC stage, she portrayed Rosa Parks, the Black woman who on December 1, 1955, refused to give up her bus seat to a White person when such an action was illegal. Vaughn later portrayed a young Black girl and her mother before, during and after the little girl was killed in a church bombing on September 15, 1963. Vaughn, ending with King's funeral, said, "You can kill the dreamer, but you cannot kill the dream."

Langford said of the performance that it's "not just a celebration for Black people, but for all God's children."

He said that King "taught peace, nonviolence and love; and we have to do it

*From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .Editorial

Last semester the Echo issued a plea for help. We had been working with a skeleton staff throughout the term and anticipated the loss of an editor and several writers. Finally, a few interested souls were recruited. In addition, the Student Senate has recently allotted $1400 to publications to purchase new equipment. Our fears that the Echo might "die" have been allayed for the present.

But there is a nagging fear among staff members that the Echo will never be completely "alive." It seems that in order for the paper to be truly vital, it will need more than state-of-the-art equipment and enthusiastic bodies willing to work. We need campus support—something intangible and understood. We need students, staff, faculty and administration to take a genuine interest in the paper.

Too often, members of the college community are guarded and even contemptuous toward Echo staff members who request information or interviews. This is, in part, understandable. The media, because of its very nature, will always be regarded with a certain amount of distrust. It is expected, and almost excusable that certain constituencies would disregard the Echo.

But when students grudgingly allow their own voice to continue to be heard, it is inexplicable and completely disheartening. Few students seem to recall that this year's student-run judicial process resulted from issues debated in the Echo last year. It seems unlikely that the administration would have publicized those confrontations and the resulting student unrest. It seems equally unlikely that the Student Senate would have been so zealous about changing the judicial process this year if the Echo had not made the debate public last year. In fact, most senators passed up the opportunity to help write the 1991-92 student handbook. Debate concerning the judicial process was usually placed after debate about parking and food service problems at Student Senate meetings last year. Only in the Echo did students, staff, administration and even the president openly debate issues concerning student involvement in campus governance.

The debates which occur within our pages result in awareness and change. The Echo is not a commercial and independent entity; it belongs to the student body and thrives on student opinion. Sometimes, however, getting students to express themselves is more easily said than done. Sadly, if we reserved one page in every issue for student opinion (excepting ours and Dave's), that page would go to the printer blank. The silence results not so much from a lack of opinion as from a hesitancy to voice angst. Student fear of censorship by administrators, staff, faculty or even other students makes an open exchange of ideas nearly impossible. Silence implies agreement, and a misleading picture of an undisturbed status quo emerges. Differences are only apparent when views are expressed and allowed to clash openly. Those differences inspire the debate which leads to change. College may be the last time that students enjoy that sort of forum for open debate, a freedom which unfortunately does not exist in the real world.

A college paper should guarantee that freedom. In the past, Maryville College's student newspaper has been what it could and should be, and the potential is still there. Taking advantage of the opportunity the Echo provides it is simply a matter of embracing it and making it your own—a task, surprisingly, as easily done as said.

Hey, kids. What's up? Long time no see. Did you get what you wanted for Christmas? What did you give? How was interim? How's the semester going? Are you putting off everything until the last minute? The important question, though, is are you looking forward to spring break? Personally, I can't wait to get my pale white butt on the road to sunny Florida. I can't wait for that fifteen hour ride in a hot car with six other people in it. I can't wait to sleep spread-eagle because I'm so sunburnt. I can't wait to feel the sand grate around my crotch in that little white underwear thingy they put in guys' bathing suits. I can't wait to be jostled around in bars by people who are much larger, much louder, much tanner, and much drunker than me. I can't wait to wake up with a pounding hangover and feel all those shrimp and scallops squiggling around in my churning stomach. I can't wait for a good old-fashioned beer and Wheaties breakfast. I can't wait to see the muscle-bound numbskulls that always swarm to Florida on spring break beat each other up, puke on each others' shoes, and pound each others' backs in alcohol-inspired male bonding. I can't wait to get out of the shower and have to dry myself off with the same towel I used on the beach the day before because somebody used my other one to clean up beer spills. I can't wait for that stingy sensations of salt water going up your nose and leaving a gross taste in your mouth all day. I can't wait for the strap burn you get when you walk around too much in wet, sandy flip-flops. I can't wait to talk about getting laid all the way down there, ogle at the girls while I'm there, and then talk about how close I came all the way back.

In short: at this point, anything is better than Maryville (pronounce mur-vul), Tennessee.

This place puts ants in my pants, for two principle reasons:

1. They don't tell you this when you are getting guided tours and rousing testimonials in the application process, but until you are a senior you must live in a dorm on campus. If they do tell you that, they don't tell you that you have to be quiet after 9:00 p.m., you can't drink alcohol in your room no matter what your age, and members of the opposite sex must be out of your room by midnight (1:00 on weekends, ooooh).

2. When people find out about these rules, nobody seems to make much of a fuss. Nobody says, "I'm twenty years old and I can't have a conversation with a girl in my room after midnight? What? Turn my stereo down at 9:00? What? I thought I left my mom back home." Why is nobody bitching?

Despite this amazing acquiescence on the part of the student body, positive steps are being taken. Somebody somewhere realizes the absurdity of it all. The Student Senate is struggling toward a covenant system, the first floors of the various dorms will be wet soon, Carnegie will open next year and be largely co-ed with 24 hour visitation, and there have even been some good parties lately that haven't been shut down within the first hour. Positive steps, I think.

(Last semester, someone wrote a letter to the editor in response to one of my columns. He exclaimed that he was disappointed by it because he had assumed that I was the voice of some "progressive movement" on campus. In other words, he expected liberal, politically correct whining (every college must have some, right?). Let me be clear: Dave's World is the official patron of one movement and one movement only—SADA, the Society for the Advancement of Dave's Amusement. SADA's one goal is that I be allowed to spout off whenever and about whatever I so desire. What I'm saying is that the opinions expressed herein are solely a reflection of me. I most certainly am not the voice of a progressive movement, although it could be argued that I speak for an excessive one.)

When I complain about the rules here and consider their loosening a good sign, it is not because I am a hedonist and want this school to become a haven for drinkers, fornicators, and other licentious types. Not at all (not that I am opposed to the concept, mind you . . .). I just happen to think that the extent of a school's trust in its own students is a good measure of the school's quality. The whole idea of higher education is to encourage development—and development never occurs in a neat, straight line, especially not a line painted by some administrative department. Some students abuse their freedom at first, and some do so throughout their career at school, but for the first time they are free to abuse it as much as their own judgement dictates. It is only through continuous use of this individual judgement that students learn to use it well; each student must learn his own limits, his own style. The more restrictive and prescriptive the rules of a college are, the more indication there is of an urge on the part of the administration to guide students' development and repress choices with which they do not agree (for moral, religious, cultural, or whatever reasons). It is my deepest belief that he who finds his own truths is he who best tends them. Those who need to live in the ordered fashion that the college endorses will learn so through experience, and those who function better with more risk and a bigger dose of chaos should not be ignored or reviled (or suspended).

Thus, I am excited and optimistic about our new president, Dr. Gibson. He has proven himself extremely capable of bringing about the changes that Maryville College desperately needs—higher standards of admission, more focus on liberal arts academics, a greater reputation among peers and the public, and most of all, an ever-increasing body of distinguished, loyal alumni. In recent years, MC seems to have forgotten those goals in its obsession with fund raising. What I think our new leader realizes is that the horse must come before the cart—where greater quality leads, money follows. Money is helpful in the quest for excellence, but it is neither insurance of it nor a fuel for it. The fuel is a dedicated faculty and an exemplary student body, and there is no substitute.

Maybe, when these changes occur, there will be no more need to require students to buy three cafeteria meals a day whether they eat them or not. Or a need to require all students to live on campus despite the fact that some would obviously function better outside its confines. Or a desire to impose onto students the conditions under which they must live together and interact instead of letting those conditions be settled by the students themselves.

Maybe, when these changes occur, students won't feel like their primary function at the college is a source of money, a source which must be guided, cubbyholed, and excreted after four years. Until then, though, this place still puts ants in my pants—so sunny Florida, here I come! I can't wait.

President Clinton's first month in office

Students rate Clinton's economic plan and stance on gays in the military

Survey conducted by Mary Rose Slaughter

1) What is your opinion of Clinton's economic plan so far?

◆ I like his ideas. I think the American people should get over the fact they are going to pay to get this country on its feet again. This is not the "ME" generation of the '80s. And if we want to make America great again, we all need to work together to make this the "US" generation. Krista Ross-Mull, Sr

◆ He's not living up to what he said. But maybe if he's given a chance, he can do something. Gevin Simpson, Fr

◆ I think it will never work. He's got too many hopes to fill. Tasha Valentine, Fr

◆ I'll give him a thumbs up. Sarah Sawyer, Sr

◆ I support him. He's doing something where Bush never did. Mary Steger, Jr

◆ I think he's made progress in setting up a plan and sticking to what he said so far. He has done a good job in laying out his plan. Sarah Hull, Fr

◆ I think some of his ideas are more of a socialist idea than democratic. I don't like increased taxes. Darin McGowan, Fr

◆ My own personal feeling is that it is going to help the country. Peggy Wood, special student

◆ From what I heard I don't like it. I don't like the fact that he backed out on his promises. Michelle Simpson, Jr

◆ So far he hasn't done anything but he has a lot of good ideas. Jeanine Ford, Fr

2) What is your opinion of Clinton's lift of the ban on gays in the military?

◆ I think it's a wonderful idea because if we are not supposed to discriminate because of skin color, then tell me why it should be a law for others to discriminate because of something as private as their sexual preference. Krista Ross-Mull, Sr

◆ I think one good thing that has come out of it is that they have stopped asking sexual preference questions. Chris Roach, So

◆ They are already there, so why not let them admit they are gay? Stephanie Manning, Sr

◆ I think it is wrong to tell a man he cannot fight for his country. I think it is better to know than not. Gevin Simpson, Fr

◆ I don't think they should be in the military and will downgrade him (Clinton) in the end. Tasha Valentine, Fr

◆ Think it's OK. I mean, they've always been there. It's just that they can voice their opinion now. Tonya Dewitt, Sr

◆ I think that they should be let in because if they are over there fighting, I don't think they'll be trying anything. Mary Steger, Jr

◆ I figure they're entitled to be in the military. They should be allowed to serve being citizens of the US. Sarah Hull, Fr

◆ I don't agree. I don't think they should be in the military. It disrupts the life in the military. Darin McGowan, Fr

◆ I think he's stirring up a hornet's nest. They have always been in the military so why pull it to the forefront? Peggy Wood, special student

◆ I don't think they should be admitted because I think it could cause inter-strife within the military. Michelle Simpson, Jr

◆ I don't think there's anything wrong with it. They have just as many rights. Jeanine Ford, Fr

House debates gays in military

by Gary Karr
AP Writer

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — It may mean nothing, but state House members want to go on record opposing any move to lift the military's ban on homosexuals.

The House on Wednesday vote endorsed a resolution asking Congress to resist changing the military's policy of prohibiting homosexuals from service.

Keeping gays out "maintains morale and the discipline necessary to keep this country's armed forces fully prepared for their work and clearly focused on their purpose," the resolution says.

The measure, which has no legal effect, now will be sent to leading members of Congress as well as Joint Chiefs Chairman Colin Powell and all of South Carolina's congressional delegation.

The state, with about 3.5 million people, has three air force bases, a naval base and an Army basic training center.

Some lawmakers voiced objections, though at one point the debate was hardly serious.

"I don't think any of you believe that I'm a lesbian," said Rep. Don Holt, D-North Charleston. The House exploded in laughter.

Holt said the resolution, authored by three Republicans and one Democrat, was an attempt to embarrass President Clinton, who pledged to lift the ban.

"The only people really for this are a small group of Baptists in Greenville," Holt said.

Rep. Joe Brown, D-Columbia, argued that gays have a right to participate in the armed services. "I haven't been able to come up with any justifiable reason why they shouldn't have the same opportunities as anyone else," he said.

Most of the measure's supporters kept quiet, apparently knowing they would win. Rep. Heyward Hutson, R-Summerville, said the resolution did not criticize homosexuals.

"It's just saying that's it's not appropriate" to have them in the military, he said.

Blount County considers anti-homosexual resolution

The Associated Press

MARYVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—The Blount County Commission will be asked Tuesday to consider a resolution condemning homosexuality as an "immoral and unacceptable lifestyle."

The resolution, prepared by Commissioner Tom Hatcher, asks U.S. Sens. Jim Sasser and Harlan Matthews and U.S. Rep. John J. Duncan Jr. to "actively oppose legislation to include homosexuals or bisexuals in the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

The commission's next meeting is Tuesday.

The resolution says that giving homosexuals or bisexuals the "same legal status as minority citizens is morally offensive to the citizens presently protected by the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

The above story was taken from the Echo AP wire service on Feb. 14. The resolution was quickly passed by the Blount County Commission on Feb. 16.

Top eleven reasons the Echo needs money

10. "Have-you-hugged-your-reporter-today?" buttons to be distributed campus wide
9. Hot wax for paste-up and various other unmentionable uses (The superglue we've been using is dangerous.)
8. Coverage of the National Polka Conference to be held in NYC
7. Bunk beds in Anderson Lab—Face it. We live there.
6. Salary for an advice columnist, "Dear Scotty"—She's asking a pretty penny.
5. Money to support Dave's World (He can't work without caffeine, BP slawdogs and beer.)
4. Bribe funds for sources (How do you think we got that story on faculty members who moonlight as strippers?)
3. Tranquillity Disruption Fund (You pay the dues; we'll get you news): Payment for national bomb threats, poison scares and gossip machines.
2. More memory—for computers and editors—we're losing ours all the time.

Untouchables bring half-time shows to MC basketball games

by Julie Nachman
Staff Writer

The Untouchables—Maryville's exciting new dance team—as many of us have seen at the basketball games, is a stimulating, spiritual part of campus athletic events.

"The Untouchables are a group of girls who have joined together to do something which they all enjoy," said Tera Smith.

They have been working hard to make a name for themselves and to keep up school spirit.

Elaine Durden came up with the idea to start the dance team which is sponsored by Kandis Schram. The team currently does not have any funding for costumes, but they are doing the best with what they have.

"Since we don't have a coach, we make up the dances on our own and practice until we get it right," said Levetta Buggs.

Though the team had some outside instruction, they create their own dances. Three of the members, Durden, Letitia Hall, and Stacey Williamson, create the basic dance, of which parts are adjusted to suit every member on the team. When they begin to learn the dances as a whole, it takes about a week to learn.

It is very time consuming, but each member has chosen to come to the practices and is giving her 100%. They currently are performing only for the basketball games' half-times, but they hope to be able to dance during the halftime slot at the home football games also.

The team members did not have to tryout for the team this season due to it being the first and were selected on a desire and ability basis. There was a small group of dedicated individuals who showed up.

There currently are nine people on the team. The dancers are: "Nikki" Daffron, Noupay Thepsary, Levetta Buggs, Letitia Hall, Elaine Durden, Kesha Snoddy, Tera Smith, Kari Young, Stacey Williamson, and Toyoko "Jazzy" Yamada.

Durden noted that the girls have developed friendships through the dance team as a result of the camaraderie which is needed to put on a performance.

"Remember to come out and support the 'Untouchables.' Let them know that they are doing a great job," Durden said.

Resourcefulness makes more than just a lot of sense

by Dr. Robert Greeney
Special to the Echo

Over the past year I have tried to write this article many times. It always emerges flat, lifeless, and sterile.

Today, I realized the reason. My approach was to try to reach readers by addressing the issues from a monetary or economic perspective. I reasoned that people would listen to a dollars and cents analysis and ignore arguments stemming from idealism or philosophy.

This morning I decided to scrap the economic approach because it's not the way I think, it's not what I consider to be important, and I never seemed to get to the "heart" of the issue and the "spirit" of the matter.

When I saw Jennifer Danner one afternoon turn out the lights in SSC 231 before she left the building, I was shocked. She was not even using the room, and it is rare to see anyone turning off unused unneeded lighting. I'm quite sure she did not realize that when she closed those two switches she shut off forty-eight 40-watt fluorescent bulbs.

That is correct. I counted them—forty-eight 40-watt fluorescent bulbs. I also calculated the cost. To my surprise it turns out to be ten cents an hour. It has to be more than just a matter of economics.

Likewise, I suspect that Terry Bunde has never counted how many bulbs go off when he flips the one switch in the hall on his way home in the evening. In this case the count is eighty-eight. Eighty-eight 40-watt fluorescent bulbs can be turned off with one switch.

That still leaves twenty-four bulbs on and plenty of light for people to get around. Yet, you can often find all corridor lights on, upstairs and down, late at night, weekends, summertime, etc. That means one hundred and seventy six 40-watt bulbs are burning for no reason. Once again I computed the cost—thirty-five cents an hour.

You can argue that after a while those small numbers add up to a significant sum, but it has to be more than just a matter of economics.

Less than a year ago I undertook the project of collecting computer paper from the computer lab for recycling. White computer paper is readily marketable and draws a good price, (relative to newspaper, cardboard, etc.) about $3.00 for every hundred pounds.

It should be a simple job. Once a week empty the recycling containers, and place all the paper in boxes. Physical plant picks up the boxes once a month.

It has turned out to be a big job. Partly because people throw trash in the containers which has to be separated from the paper, but mostly because I just cannot stomach throwing good paper away even if it is to be recycled.

A job that should take ten to fifteen minutes takes me one to two hours. Many times I have tried to close my eyes and just "do it," but I always end up peeking.

I have now almost filled a box with salvaged paper. When filled that will be 5000 sheets, and most of it is totally unused. What would it cost to buy that much paper? The cost would be about $25.

How many hours did I spend sorting the unused paper from the used and tearing off the edges? I do not want to know. To me it is more than just a matter of economics.

Since I now have enough paper to last my family for at least ten years, I am issuing a call for assistance. There is lots of "good" paper in the recycling containers. If only a few of you using the computer lab tap this free resource of high quality paper, my job will be much easier.

Yet, I know that the only people who will take advantage of this resource are those who also feel it is more than just a matter of economics.

all student retention has increased 13 points. Additionally, full-time enrollment has grown 26 percent, almost completely through improved retention.

Gibson also has extensive experience in institutional financial matters, especially in the areas of securing grants and aiding fund development.

Gibson holds a bachelor's degree in chemistry from Wofford College, where he graduated with highest honors in 1959. He received his PhD in organic chemistry from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville in 1963. In the summer of 1983, he was enrolled in the Institute for Educational Management at Harvard University. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, national honor society, and won the nomination for the Frederic W. Ness Book Award in 1992.

An amateur poet, he has won recognition for his poetry. Gibson enrolled in a writing residency at the Institute for Education Management at Harvard University in the summer of 1990.

He has worked as an information chemist for the U.S. Army Chemical Research and Development Laboratories and has served as Professor of Chemistry at the College of Charleston.

Gibson is a native of South Carolina. His wife is the former Rachel Plummer of Clarksville, Tenn. They have three children. Gibson is a member of College Lutheran Church in Salem, Va.

He is author of Good Start: A Guidebook for New Faculty in Liberal Arts Colleges, published last year, and has published a number of articles on college administration as well as numerous books and articles in his academic field of organic chemistry.

Contact offers listening service

by Jon Peters
Staff Writer

Good at listening? Contact may be the community service option for you. Contact is a phone service organization developed to help people by giving them someone to talk to. This is helpful for people who are lonely, or who have problems they cannot talk about with their family or friends.

Contact is not, however, to be confused with a suicide hotline. A Contact employee (who must remain anonymous) said that she receives only about four suicide calls per year. The rest, she said, are usually people who call every day otherwise known as "repeat callers." These people are usually lonely, unstable or on drugs for mental disorders, and talking with them sometimes helps.

One important aspect of Contact is anonymity. The volunteers must not be known to anyone in order to protect both them and the callers. Making a connection with a caller in any way other than through the phone service is not allowed. Occasionally, however, callers have been successful in tracking down volunteers, although this might result in the volunteers' dismissals.

To become a Contact worker, volunteers must complete a three month long training program. This consists of lectures given by ministers and people who are experts in dealing with people who have various problems.

The point of the training session is to teach people how to listen to the problems of other people without giving them advice. Contact is, more than anything else, a free, twenty-four hour listening service.

One especially helpful program provided by Contact is the reassurance program. Through the reassurance program, select elderly people are called each day if family and friends are not available to check on them.

The typical day working at Contact takes place in the basement of an undisclosed building in Maryville. There are usually snack food and drinks. There is a T.V. and a couch that pulls out into a bed for late night shifts. It is typical for a volunteer to do a variety of other activities when the three phone lines are not all busy.

Contact work should not be mistaken as an easy job. One volunteer said that there is a need for a "Contact Worker's Support Group" to help people deal with the stress involved with listening to other people's problems all the time.

The required training session is to take place soon. If you are really interested in volunteering, you can get more information by calling Contact at Sandy Perry or June Parker at 984-7686.

Michael Jackson reveals troubled childhood, skin disorder in interview

By Jennifer Bowles
AP writer

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Missing slumber parties and just chumming around with friends has left pop superstar Michael Jackson with a burning desire to recapture a childhood lost to constant work and abuse.

Jackson made the revelation in a television interview seen Wednesday night by more than 19 million viewers who tuned in to get the scoop on the reclusive entertainer in his first solo interview in more than a decade.

In the 90-minute interview with Oprah Winfrey broadcast live by ABC-TV from his Neverland ranch near Santa Barbara, Jackson sought to dispel several rumors about his lifestyle, including that he bleached his skin and sleeps in a hyperbaric chamber. Some viewers believe he succeeded.

"I thought that he set the record straight about all the rumors, like about his house and his skin color," Marcus Alexander said Thursday while standing at a Hollywood newsstand. "I mean, he was telling the truth. Why would he lie?"

Winfrey said the 34-year-old entertainer set no ground rules for the interview, the latest sign he is emerging from his reclusiveness. His recent appearances include President Clinton's inauguration celebration, the NAACP Image Awards, the American Music Awards and the Super Bowl.

He also has become a more visible spokesman for charity. He recently announced a $1.25 million social service program for Los Angeles youths who were victims of last year's riot.

According to overnight Nielsen ratings representing 29 cities, the interview captured a 40.9 rating, meaning 19.3 million households tuned in to the show. Complete national rankings will be released Tuesday.

Jackson showed a wide range of emotions, appearing sad when talking about his childhood, embarrassed when asked if he is a virgin and proud when talking of his African-American heritage.

Perhaps most startling was his revelation that he has a disorder inherited from his father's side of the family that causes skin pigmentation to fade. The revelation came after Ms. Winfrey asked him about a rumor that he bleaches his skin.

"It's a problem for me, OK? I can't control it," he said, on the verge of tears. "... What of the millions of people who sit out in the sun and become darker than they are?"

He did not disclose the name of his condition. Dr. Lisa Oki, a Los Angeles dermatologist, said the medical name for such an abnormal skin coloration problem is vitiligo, a condition in which the body destroys cells that make pigments.

Jackson said he uses makeup to conceal blotches caused by the condition that began after the 1982 release of his "Thriller" album. He dismissed suggestions that he might be changing his appearance because he doesn't like who he is.

"I'm a black American," he said. "I'm proud of my race."

Estranged sister LaToya Jackson disputed that Jackson suffers from the disease during an interview aired Thursday night on the nationally syndicated TV magazine show "Inside Edition."

"As far as his coloration, I'm not familiar with the skin disease in our family. I've never heard of a skin disorder in our family whatsoever," she said.

Jackson told Ms. Winfrey that he hasn't read a book by his sister that portrays the Jackson family as dysfunctional, saying only that he loves his sister dearly.

Jackson admitting having a crush on singer Diana Ross and that he was currently dating actress Brooke Shields. But he dismissed a question about whether he was a virgin. "You can call me old-fashioned if you want," he said.

Like many child entertainers, including actress Elizabeth Taylor who appeared on the broadcast, Jackson said he lost his childhood to constant rehearsals, recordings and touring. He said his father also beat him.

Jackson said he missed out on "the simple things that they (children) so much take for granted—having friends, slumber parties, buddies and just hanging out. There was none of that for me."

He said he compensates for that by surrounding himself with children, and creating an elaborate fantasy world at his ranch, complete with an amusement park, a theater and a menagerie of animals including llamas, chimpanzees and a giraffe. Every three weeks, he hosts a gathering there of terminally ill children.

"People wonder why I always have children around. ... I find the thing that I never had through them," he said.

His collection of animals was not seen during the nighttime interview. Jackson said the animals come out during the day.

I find in animals the same thing that I find so wonderful in children," he said. "That purity, that honesty where they don't judge you, they don't want anything from you — just to be your friend, and I think that's so sweet."

solve the question of maximum absences. This new wording seems to give the instructors even more freedom in their attendance policies. If the new wording is adopted, the catalog will read, "... If absences for these reasons are excessive in terms of the stated policy for the class, the student should explain to the instructor. ..."

Boldon said, "The change clarifies the policy so it applies to each course in a much clearer way."

According to Brad Connatser, an English teacher for the MC Languages and Literature Department, "The class structure dictates the absentee policy." The presence of a student is essential in a discussion class; therefore, the policy should be emphasized more. However, in a lecture class, the policy could be more relaxed.

In Connatser's Creative Writing class last semester, the policy was plainly written in the syllabus, "Excessive absence or excessive tardiness will be reflected in your grade."

Out of Connatser's twelve Creative Writing students, there were eighty-nine unexcused absences and twenty excused absences. An excused absence was defined as simply making an effort to contact the instructor about the reason for missing class.

The only reason Connatser gave for the enormous number of absences was, "... students will try to do as much as they can get away with. ..."

In response to the current attendance policy, sophomore Tina Dykes suggested that a posi-

Men's and women's basketball teams surpass expectations

by Ahron Bobbin
Staff Writer

MC's basketball teams have overshot expectations for their '92-'93 season. With the Lady Scots' record at 17-2 and the Scots' record at 18-5, the tournament looks like an excellent possibility for both teams.

"If we can win our remaining 2 games, we will have the chance to make it," Coach Lambert of the men's team said.

The men's team had much to overcome this year as they rebuilt a team that lost 7 of last year's 9 team members. Under an adept coaching staff, however, this loss became an asset.

Ramier Rodriguez (#30) said, "the coaching team didn't give up, but challenged the team to become a better one."

The hard work of the team and the coaching staff has paid off: the men's team is now ranked 4th in the South and has excellent prospects for the National Tournament.

The Lady Scots have also had an impressive season. With a record of 17 wins and two losses, they are close to being unstoppable. The key to their success? Teamwork.

"When we play good as a team, we play the best," star player Lanai Ballard said.

Many players and observers of the team are very confident that they are going to the Final 4. The Lady Scot's coaching staff has done wonders to harness the awesome offensive and defensive capabilities of the team, and however the team does, their skill will be to the credit of the coaching staff and those who help out.

All in all, this has been a very impressive year for MC's basketball teams. Fans have filled the gym game after game to see the teams smash their opponent. If the teams sustain their momentum, the stands will be filled during play-offs.

Indoor soccer brings together varsity and recreational teams

by Josh Hogan
Staff Writer

It's a mid-winter's night in February and the sounds of soccer are in the air, or at least in the air around the Alumni Gym. What's that? Soccer? Yes. Soccer is alive and well this winter and making its home in the Alumni Gym behind Bartlett Hall.

The men's and women's outdoor soccer teams have divided themselves up to participate in several indoor soccer games and tournaments. In the most recent tournament, held last week, one of the Maryville men's teams led by seniors James Gomez and Ali Sohrabi captured the first place honors. The women's team also had a good showing by beating one of the men's teams.

Gomez was particularly impressed by the women's performance: "It was the most exciting game."

For the most part, MC's varsity soccer members play for the teams representing Maryville College, but one does not have to be on either of the soccer teams to play. The games are very informal and open to anyone interested. Tournaments also bring in similar teams from other colleges; UT soccer players competed at the most recent tournament. The International Club has also been very active in the indoor soccer games.

The two soccer teams participate mainly to "stay in shape and get ready for next year," said Yosef Addis. Gomez stressed that the tournament was a good development tool for players who may have not seen a lot of playing time during the regular season. Both agreed that fun is the best reason for participating in the indoor soccer games.

The fun is not over. There are plans for another indoor tournament to be held very soon. Gomez said crowd participation has been good but is down from previous years. He further urged everyone to come out and experience indoor soccer.

All games and practices are being held in Alumni Gym.

Alpha Psi Omega performs 'Vanities'

Comedy features student director, cast and crew

by Julie Nachman
Staff Writer

Alpha Psi Omega, Maryville College's drama honor society, will present the play "Vanities" at 8 p.m. February 25, 26 and 27.

The play, written by Jack Heifner in the 1970s, is directed by Senior Laura Connelly and is entirely student-run. Connelly is excited about the student cast and crew: "I couldn't have asked for a better group of people to work with."

"Vanities" is about three girls and their struggles with their own vanities as they approach adulthood. "Sometimes our characters are so shallow that it is almost sad," cast member Julie Walker said. Walker, who plays Kathy, is joined by Nancy Allen (Joann) and Julie Williams (Mary).

The play's story line begins about 1963 when the three girls are high school cheerleaders. In the second scene, which takes place around 1968, the girls are in the same college sorority.

The final scene of the play occurs about 1974 when the girls have reached early adulthood. As young adults, they begin to notice how different they really are from each other.

Throughout the show, the characters never leave the stage. All make-up and costume changes are done on stage while the audience watches.

Williams commented on the dual nature of the play: "The show is a light-hearted comedy, yet at the same time, has a serious character setting." Allen added that "everybody who comes to the show will find some aspect of one of the characters to connect with... a little bit of themselves."

In addition to the cast, the major crew positions are stage manager, Darrien Thompson; assistant stage manager, and under study, Heather Conaway; lighting, Brian Prather; sound, Rob Riehl; set construction, Rob Riehl, Mike Wilson, and Brian Prather; costumes, Sarah Sawyer, Kathy Jarrard, and Kristin Kant.

The show will be held in the theater, and is free for all Maryville College students with their I.D.

Humanities Club hosts year's first poetry slam

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

The recently formed Humanities Club held the first Poetry Slam of the year at Isaac's on Feb. 11.

A number of students participated in the event. Jennifer Danner, Jason Ezell, Robbie Patton, and Chris Ryland read original poetry. Students also read poems by T.S. Eliot and Maya Angelou. Themes were various and included the wonder of experiencing nature, curiosities of living life, admiration of beauty and a myriad of others. Expressions of fear, dreaming, anger and hilarity were shared with the small audience in the intimate surroundings.

*Poetry Slam*s are open forums for members of the college community to share original works and/or published works by other authors. The first Poetry Slam was hosted in the Fall semester of 1990 by the Creative Writing class specializing in Poetry taught by English Instructor David Powell. The class was inspired to hold their own poetry slam after reading a magazine article about a Slam taking place in another part of the United States. The event was held roughly every three to four weeks, once in Knoxville. Students from all majors and all levels as well as faculty and staff read the works of the centuries by Whitman, Thoreau, Eliot, Keats and many others. Original works were often presented, sometimes with musical accompaniment, sometimes with dance, sometimes with colorful drawings. The Poetry Slam is an outlet for all forms of poetic license, not just writing.

This year's revival of the Slam promises more expressions of poetic thought from the campus village. The Humanities Club invites everyone, including the community, to come and join in a sharing of poetry in all forms. Future Poetry Slams are planned for Thursday, Mar. 4 and Thursday, Mar. 25 in Isaac's, from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

FAC NEWS AND REVIEWS

'Unfettered' on display

This month in the Fine Arts Center Gallery, the photographic works of Christine P. Patterson, entitled "Unfettered" are being displayed.

Patterson's black and white photograph display ranges from pieces of childhood, entitled "Her Time" and "A Child's View" to slices of life in New Mexico to the haunting "A Lady's Transgression" a 12 part series of photographs depicting reincarnation.

Patterson frequently uses coloring techniques in green, pink, and orange hues to highlight her black and white works.

She also has used a variety of special techniques used on site and in the darkroom to create dream-like images carrying the viewer into Patterson's special world.

The display will stay in the FAC gallery until the end of February.

MC Art in March

Students wishing to join in the student art exhibit for March in the FAC gallery should have their works prepared for display by Feb. 26.

Career in Art Therapy—the Expression of Feeling Through Art, a special workshop, will be presented by Ann Eisenberg Freidlander in the FAC on Mar. 4. For further information contact the Fine Arts Center at 981-8150.

College lacks funding for handicapped accessibility

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

The lack of handicapped access to many buildings in the United States is a serious problem for people who are confined to wheelchairs or who have other physical limitations. Just getting through the door of some buildings is a struggle. Once inside, the obstacles to the physically disabled become no fewer. A lack of handicap access exists on the Maryville College campus. Even the casual observer will note the design of the buildings offers little assistance to the disabled individual who may want to use the facilities.

Thaw Hall and Willard House are the only two buildings on campus that are totally accessible to people who are confined to wheelchairs, according to Andy McCall, physical plant director at Maryville College. A person in a wheelchair can enter Wilson Chapel, the Fine Arts Center, and the bottom floor of the Sutton Science Building. The public attends performances in both Wilson Chapel and the FAC, but neither has restroom facilities that are accessible to the handicapped. This is true for all buildings on campus with the exception of Thaw Hall and Willard House. Carnegie, which is being restored and remodeled, will be fully accessible on completion.

The reason for the lack of accessibility to Maryville College campus buildings is existing financial problems. "We have the concern; we have the desire. But we don't have the money," McCall said. He pointed out that "there is always a problem with finance. Maryville College is a private institution and does not receive state funding. The college could raise tuition to help with the cost of renovating the buildings to make them accessible. But that would drive students away. We don't know how to raise the money right now."

This lack of funding could be a problem regarding the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990. This act specified that many buildings will require renovation to be in compliance with regard to providing access

Flu makes its regular visit to MC

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

During the cold winter months, the virus known as influenza, or the flu, spreads across America, giving its viral message to all healthy, non-immune Americans. Known in the old times as Grippe, the flu has again graced the nasal passages of Maryville Collegians. Each year, different sects of the flu family come and raise temperatures and lower spirits. Some Grippe are more pervasive than others and usually affect victims in different styles. The most common flu features are: the almighty sneeze; the wheeze;

the dams-are-a-breaking running nose; sinus' the size of baseballs; rake-my-vocal-cords-over-sandpaper coughs; whoops; and a fever that can be used as a heat source by others.

Some cases have gotten so out of control that some folks have had to visit the doctor and receive serious medication.

Not all folks suffer from this infamous American icon. The Kleenex company, as well as those nice its-just-like-cherry-syrup cough medicines, gain rather rosy profits.

This year's flu epidemic has not only seen

New process makes admission tougher

by Jennifer Tucker
Staff Writer

With the tightening of admission procedures, getting admitted to MC may be more difficult for '93 high school graduates than it was for graduates of previous years.

Donna F. Davis, vice-president of admissions and enrollment said, "there are no new policies, but there are new procedures." According to Davis, acceptance by MC is a strong implication that the individual can perform well within the academic curriculum.

Davis said that if the individual is not prepared for college level work, it is unethical for MC to admit that student.

"We [the college] want all students to be successful," Davis said.

And sometimes MC simply isn't the place to find success. Many students are academically prepared for college, but their personal maturity level has not been realized, according to the vice-president. Sometimes the best place for those students is a community college before admission to Maryville.

MC academic admission requirements include a 2.5 GPA on the MC academic scale, which is equivalent to 2.8 on the high school

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR . . .

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2806.

Dear Editor,

The other day I made a call to Crawford House to make an appointment with a counselor to discuss some of the normal tribulations facing any college student in the nineties; this was not an easy thing for me to do considering my distrust in any arena requiring confidentiality here at Maryville College. But I took a chance and did it anyway. Well, my chance was in vain. I was told by the person I had requested that she did not have the time to see me then, nor did she have the time to see me in the near future (or the far future for that matter). She was polite. But I declined her recommendation to call another staff member at Crawford House because, as I had told her, I was apprehensive and she was the one person that I thought I could talk to; then I hung up the phone. Then I started registering what had just happened, and I thought, "This is unbelievable! I could have been suicidal (which I wasn't, and a good thing too, otherwise I probably wouldn't be here today), and I've just called for help and virtually was told 'no.'" For me that was simply the straw that broke the camel's back. As far as I was concerned, any hope I had ever had regarding Crawford House had just been blasted out of the water.

Some of you may be wondering why I have chosen to write in the Echo about something so seemingly personal. Well, with encouragement from the Echo staff—in their letter to the college community in the previous issue pleading for an ounce or two of interest and feedback from the students regarding our school—and with the simple fact (that I know to be true) that I am not alone in my lack of confidence in the little house next to Copeland nor in an abundance of questions pertaining to it.

In regard to the counseling services that are provided, I know few people who feel completely comfortable asking for help from anyone and even fewer who would ask Crawford House for help. There is a distinct air of distrust among the student body when it comes to confidentiality issues here at MC. You can believe that this is not just my own point of view; I have had lengthy conversations that support what I am saying. There is also undoubtedly a reluctance to seek help for someone else. Many people whom I have talked to feel that voicing concerns about a friend will most likely be more hassle than help. Crawford House's solutions appear to be surveillance, disciplinary action, or placing the worried party in the uncomfortable position of having to "observe" and report back on said friend's actions.

And there is nothing worse than making such a personal call and having a fellow student answer the phone.

I would like to take this moment to say that when I talk about Crawford House I know that I am guilty of a blatant generalization of all the people who work over there, but this letter is going to go on long enough without my being specific. I would also like to say now that there is a part of me that does feel bad about sitting here dogging a bunch of people whom I know work very hard, but the rest of me does not feel bad enough to ignore the fact that all the bases are simply not being covered here at MC. Specifically, there is nothing resembling a program or means of helping the women of this school. Most colleges have some sort of women's services somewhere within the college community. If we want to pretend that sexual harassment, date rape, pregnancy, abuse, and just plain confusion does not occur here, we are all kidding ourselves. And if we want to believe that a woman is going to dial the same number for one of these reasons that she is going to dial for time management assistance, again we are kidding ourselves. (I am not discounting a man's need for advice, but someone else can write that letter.)

In regards to the Mountain Challenge branch of Crawford House, I would just like to say that one of the biggest reasons that I came to MC was because of its Mountain Challenge program. After having had two and a half years of solid experience in a similar organization, this was something that I wanted to do for the rest of my life. I am still a firm believer in the positive force of outdoor recreation as a means of education and therapy (but only if by choice), yet I find it amazing that here I am, a junior, and I virtually have nothing to do with Mountain Challenge, which partly is still a mystery to me and partly my own decision after failed attempts to try to get involved.

Right about now I imagine that you all are wondering where this is all leading; what is the point to this letter that is really beginning to sound like some personal vendetta? Well, mainly I just wanted to publicly voice my opinion because (1) I can, and (2) more of us need to do so. It seems like a lot of us will talk and complain but rarely to the people who need to hear it. (I know, because I do it too.) If nothing changes over at Crawford House, it's no skin off my back—I'll rock climb with someone else; I'll seek advice from my friends; and I'll do graphics for someone who has faith in me. But at least they now know (and now so does everyone else) my discontent. And if something does change, that would be great for the people after me at Maryville and great for the people who work at Crawford House as well. They basically are trying to do too much out of one small unit of people. We need full-time, dedicated professionals who can really devote themselves and their time to each area at Crawford House.

I know that I probably sound bitter. To a certain extent I am. But in all honesty I truly see this as a problem that goes beyond the personal; it goes campus-wide. There would be no reason for the services provided at Crawford House to be the butt of so many jokes and the source of so much disdain if there weren't such a sense of discord among the students.

Well, it's finally over. Thanks for reading this, and feel free to take it with a large grain of salt if you need to. Do think about what I've said, and speak up or speak back if you have the calling to as I did.

Alene Day

Dear Campus,

I have kept relatively quiet about my negative sentiments about this school, but lately I have been attacked by the narrow-mindedness prevalent here.

Getting right to the point, I do not agree with the Gamble and Davis sign-in policy. Now, I've had conversations with people who are both pro and con on this, but I really do not see the validity in restricting these dorms. It sure gives Lloyd and Copeland a sigh of relief to have escaped this extra rule. This is ludicrous that these two dorms now have the aura of a prep school in the 50's. It is 1993 and the times are a changin'!

And the Intervarsity Christian boards in Fayerweather lobby astound me. I am feeling extremely stifled by the "questions to ponder" on these weekly topic boards. Christianity, fundamentally presented, is being shoved down my throat. I am constantly propelled to respond in an almost atheistic manner as a means of expressing my resentment. Is a majority or a minority of our school so blind-faith?

Maybe I thought college was full of people who are questioners of logic, religion, and life—whose simple rules to live by are to love and respect one another.

While I'm on a roll about an open college campus, why are visitation hours even an issue? We are here on our own initiative, adding the responsibilities of coming out into the real world in four years (or longer at this school). It's the same old plea... "Come on, Dad, I'm 18; I think I can stay out late and still be responsible."

I like Maryville; I do. There are times when I think I need to be at a University at the beach, but I have only a simple suggestion: Lighten up on the plethora of rules, rules, rules. Don't make things so dang complicated! Let us live! How can we be responsible if we are not given responsibility? Students, we can push for this if we really want it. I know this is a Presbyterian affiliated school, but talk to any Rhodes or St. Andrews student and they will cry for you when you compare our rules to theirs. Those two schools are a lot more light-hearted and trusting of their students.

Own up to your actions, and respect one another. Change this tight atmosphere. I, for one, am asphyxiating.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial . . . Editorial

The Echo applauds those students who found their voice and decided to share it with the campus community. Never before have we seen such an immediate outpouring of questions from students interested in submitting letters to the editor, columns and other information. Some of those tentative inquiries led to actual letters submitted.

In short, we thank you. As we had suspected, our student body is not devoid of strong opinions or a healthy amount of angst. We would like to remind readers, however—lest we alienate those who are perpetually optimistic—that the Echo welcomes positive opinion as well as negative. Any problem or concern that you have is likely shared by at least one other reader. Our readership is varied and encompasses not only students but also faculty, staff, alumni and administrators. Again, we appreciate your contributions to the paper and hope that in the future we can count on a steady flow of opinion to vitalize the Echo.

Hola, niños. What's suup?!? How about that Clinton economic plan? How about those Middle East peace talks? How about that bomb in New York? How about that tornado in Lenoir City? How about that wacko in Waco? The news is just full of depressing crap, isn't it? Therefore, I have no choice but to disregard it all and talk about something more spiritually uplifting: music.

That's right, no heavy topics for me this week. That's assuming you don't consider music a heavy topic, which is probably a stupid thing to think. Music is an extremely powerful thing; it can unite people in ways that Jesse Jackson can only dream about. Besides, popular music is a political issue now anyway, since we have our first "rock-and-roll president." Isn't that hilarious? The goober-in-chief listens to Elvis and Kenny G, and the press acts like he is some sort of ultrahip, hot-blooded youth rebellion type. All I can say is: a real rock-and-roll president would have inhaled.

Anyway, what are you guys listening to these days? Here are some suggestions:

Dave's Top Five New Music Picks

1. Michael Bolton Does the Classics Even Louder
2. Kenny G - Music To Be In A Coma By
3. Def Leppard - Plagiarize
4. Mariah Carey - Breaking Glass
5. Kriss Kross - Puberty In the House

Just kidding, obviously. As you might be able to tell, I'm not much into pop music. What I plan to present here usually falls into the "alternative" category. Am I the only one who just wants to puke when he hears that? It is the curse that MTV has put on our generation's music—everything must fall into some neat little category so they know which thirty minute show to put it on. When the late 80s/early 90s explosion of fresh new sounds finally became so prominent that MTV couldn't ignore it, they created the label "alternative" and made a new thirty minute show. Now that the sound has been commercialized, sterilized, and canned, a whole batch of derivative poser bands have sprung up to capitalize on it. Ratty flannel shirts, originally worn by young people who were rejecting "fashion" and the conformity it represented, are now being designed by Ralph Lauren and priced at $300. Anti-fashion has become fashionable, anti-materialism has become profitable, musical integrity has become just another image. So what to do?

The answer is: don't worry about it. Youth, by its nature, rejects the confining stereotypes imposed upon it by the older generation. There will always be people out there who make truly original music for music's sake, not to be fashionable. Those are the bands to look for—the bands that can't be categorized, bands that are into their own music, bands who don't give a damn about how pretty their hair is, how popular their video is, or how many records they sell. Such bands are inherently hard to uncover, so if you all know of any good ones, please write and tell me about them. Here are just a few I recommend:

Fugazi - Clean, tight, innovative, intense punk that feels like a locomotive. These guys are a real band, all four of them (bass, 2 guitars, drums, 2 vocals) are equal parts of the sound. Eye-opening grooves like you have never heard anywhere else, delivered with passion and honesty that are all too rare these days; the guitars don't "duel" each other, they rage at each other. This is not fast stuff like Helmet, though, just strong stuff. Strangely enough, each of the four are clean-cut and pure, no alcohol or drugs, and they often stop playing if the crowd gets too violent. These guys are all about their music. Number one pick; Dave says check it out. (Warning: hardcore)

Ice Cube - As Flea of the Chili Peppers put it, "No better schooling to be had on the subject of pissed-off young black people in south central L.A." Ice Cube continues to stay on the cutting edge of rap with his latest album Predator, with funky anger that most "gangster rappers" can only parody. His verbal gymnastics are amazing, and his grooves are always inventive and infectious. Booty-shaking without fake posturing. (Warning: if you are white, Ice Cube doesn't like you much)

Primus - I don't even know how to begin describing Primus. On your first listen, you think "Jesus, this is weird!" By your fourth or fifth listen, you think "Jesus, this is really weird... but great!" The songs are proletarian fables about race car drivers, fishermen, alley cats, and blue collar everymen (definitely not your average rock band lyrical fare). But the bass, the bass is the thing. Les Claypool, the singer and one of the weirder individuals in the world, much less rock-and-roll, has a six string fretless bass and he just plain wails on it. He makes the bass sing like a voice, beat like a drum, and scream like a guitar. So funky it brings a tear to your eye. Check it out. (Warning: nothing like the hardcore you are used to, it takes a while to sink in)

Basehead - Mellow, mellow, mellow rap with an acoustic sound. Basehead (Michael Ivens) is smooth like butter, and his music flows and eddies like a country stream. His lyrics are wry, witty, honest, if a little pissed-off; you get the feeling that you would like this guy if you met him. If you like volume and in-your-face anger like Ice-T, look elsewhere. Basehead just talks about stuff, and he makes you grin rather than grimace. He takes rap where it has never been before, though, and proves that you don't have to be loud to be funky. (Warning: you can't dance to it, but you can't help bobbing your head and tapping your toe)

love it or hate it, you can't ignore it. If you are feeling rejection, alienation, anger at the opposite sex, or any other form of angst, listen to NIN and you will know that someone out there feels it worse. Still, it never hurts to bang your head, right? (Warning: extended listening could lead to homicidal tendencies)

Blind Melon - Somehow, this band manages to remind you of everything you've ever heard without actually sounding like anything you've ever heard. Like Fugazi, these guys are a real band. Their songs are organic—like they grew out of a lot of time spent together in a garage writing music, like they played a lot together before trying to get the big record deal. It's funky at times, mellow at times, lyrically beautiful at times, screamingly hard at times... jeez, I need a thesaurus. Imagine the Grateful Dead, Pearl Jam, Janis Joplin, the Allman Brothers, Simon & Garfunkel, and some heavy metal seasoning all thrown in a pot and stirred up... and you still don't have a decent description. Trust me: it's real, honest music. Check it out. (Warning: if you try to describe it to your friends, you will be equally incoherent) be beat for dirty, grungy heaviness. Try Cypress Hill or House of Pain for catchy, funky, belligerent rap. Try Widespread Panic or Blues Traveler (definitely Blues Traveler), the Birkenstock-wearers are into some seriously groovy stuff. Try Smashing Pumpkins or Soul Asylum for straightforward, but original and inventive, hard rock. Try Arrested Development or Dugable Planets for new and innovative directions in rap. Try Phish or Bela Flek and the Flektones, but only after you've ingested some form of psychedelic drug. And of course, if you don't already have a Jane's Addiction album, there's no hope for you anyway.

Obviously, I have only scratched the surface of new music. I know all of you are mad that I left one thing or another out. Please, though, write me and tell what bands you think are on the cutting edge of music. I'm always starved for good new music. Perhaps I could do a column on what Maryville listens to... what do you think? Put pen to paper, will ya'?

Send your jibes, your vibes, and your diatribes to box 2650. Later, brothers and sisters.

Dixon urges students to think

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

Eric Dixon joined Maryville College's language and literature department at the beginning of this year. He teaches both English and German.

Dixon is a UT graduate. As part of his education, he has visited Germany two different times. He said that he would like to help develop a major in German at Maryville.

He became a teacher because he feels that he has something unique to give to the students.

He added that opinions and ideas are important to him. He said he has strong opinions, especially about the environment and about social issues: "I feel like a college atmosphere is a laboratory for the students to try out new ideas. Students should get involved in politics, environmental issues, any issues."

Dixon said that he thinks that students should be on the cutting edge of change but that they cannot if they do not question the status quo. They should question and challenge everything; students have come to college to learn and to expand their minds. College is the time to develop an adult's inquisitive attitude and to practice different debate strategies, he said.

"I want to expose the students to some of what I have been exposed. I want them to become critical thinkers. To do this they must pound out the issues amongst themselves and the teachers," Dixon said. He said that he felt that he had been taught something that he wanted to give to students.

In his leisure time, Dixon likes to camp, fish, spend time with family, read and do wood carving. He is presently reading about natural medicine and healing herbs. He carves small animals, birds, and has tried carving trivetware (spoons). He also writes poetry.

Once constructed, it will loop around Anderson as the original did. Bricks from the old walkway will be used to edge the new path. The sidewalk renovation is part of a multi-stage process scheduled to be finished before the April board meetings. Future stages include: installation of additional street lamps and approximately 6 or 7 more benches.

Phish celebrates the bizarre in music

Progressive band fosters confusion; defies analysis

by Jon Peters
Staff Writer

Last summer I got the opportunity to see one of my favorite guitarists, Carlos Santana, in concert in Chicago. I started the trip to this concert completely unaware that the opening act was to be the most bizarre, talented and progressive bands I have heard of recently. The people hanging out outside the stadium before the show all said that they had come to see the opener, Phish, and not necessarily Santana. This display of dedication to a band I had never heard of really drew my curiosity.

Phish's set, as it turned out, was completely mind boggling. As far as I could tell, there were at least eight people on stage, all playing different instruments on which each musician was a complete master. The interesting thing was, however, that most of the time they were all playing to different beats, and in different keys. Each complex part, though separated in theory, seemed to be in some complex sort of organized consistency, as if they really were trying to create the sound that they were. The entire set was in fact an unrehearsed "jam," as they did not play any particular songs, but it seemed as if the sounds produced were planned and practiced.

At the time I could not quite comprehend some of the musical techniques they were using, and I was a good deal confused. This feeling followed me after the concert was over, so I decided to listen to one of their albums, "A Picture of Nectar," simply to try and figure it out. Interestingly enough, however, their album was just as confusing as their concert. Defining, or even putting sense into this album seems to be an impossible task and should not be attempted. There were hints of jazz and blues influences. On the whole, though, the album was unique and very strange.

In one particular song, "Guelah Papyrus," Phish went from one musical concept to another with a change in between that defied all laws of order. Everyone in the band was playing something separate and bizarre. The sound of the group as a whole during this transition was climatic and undecipherable. Suddenly they were all back together on the same rhythmic wavelength. I found myself asking, "What the f*!?", in frustration, yet at the same time I was thoroughly impressed at their display of talent.

The reason that "A Picture of Nectar" cannot be musically analyzed can be attributed to the fact that it was probably Phish's intent both to create an album that could not be analyzed, and to confuse the musician in all of us. Analysis aside, the album is funky, groovin' and weird—kind of like what the Grateful Dead would be if they were a little bit heavier, and a lot more talented. One fan compared hearing a Phish album to "listening to music under water."

Another noted that "the lyrics are equally obscure." For instance, Phish wrote in their compact disk cover that "The Mango Song," was about, "a day in the life of a waiter/addict with delusions of grandeur." Pretty strange stuff, to say the least.

Whether or not the album is liked, the band's twisted talent cannot be ignored. It is safe to say that Phish is definitely on the cutting edge of weird, progressive rock in the nineties, and if you enjoy listening to bizarre and talented musicians as much as I do, I suggest you at least listen to their new album. It may enlighten your views on music, and the infinite ways in which it can be distorted.

'Garbage crisis' calls for slowing the flow

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

In the U.S. every man, woman and child throws away four pounds of garbage each day. That's 1,460 pounds a year per person or 49 million tons of garbage each day for the entire population of the U.S.! Blount county residents alone are responsible for 350 tons of this daily garbage. This includes the garbage left at the movies and athletic events, the trash from restaurants and other institutions, as well as your everyday household trash.

What (for example) happens to this newspaper, which you will probably throw in the garbage can? Do you even care? You should, because if it goes to the landfill, it will still be existent and readable in 20 years. The more we throw away the quicker we run out of landfill space. Once all the space is filled, where will we live? On top of a landfill?

Archaeologist William Rathje began doing "digs" on landfill sites in 1987. Rathje has found recognizable hot dogs that were 15 years old, according to their package (those preservatives really do work!) and newspapers that were 40 years old still very much intact.

"I dig up landfills because America is in a widely proclaimed 'garbage crisis.' More than 70% of our trash is now being buried in 5,500 active landfills across the country; these landfills are reaching capacity, and few new ones have been approved. I'm afraid that we are wasting precious time, money, and emotion because we don't know much about what is really in our landfills or what is happening to it," Rathje said.

According to Rathje, the annual expenditure on trash in the U.S. is $15 billion and climbing. Our perceptions tell us that our trash decomposes rapidly in landfills and that we can just add to the top of the garbage heap forever.

Now for a little science. Question: What does it usually take for decomposition of matter? Answer: Decomposition requires light, air and moisture in varying amounts. What has that got to do with garbage? If you think that what you throw in a modern landfill just decomposes and disappears, you are sadly mistaken.

Modern landfill regulations do not allow liquids to be deposited in the landfill; that eliminates one of the three required elements for decomposition. Then, each night a layer of dirt—usually clay—is put on the compacted garbage that was brought in during the day, cutting off the light and air, the other two elements needed.

Landfills are just that—storage facilities that fill up the land. Our molehills are becoming mountains.

In some parts of the country golf courses, parks and wildlife preserves have been built on closed landfills. One closed landfill has been turned into a ski resort. The hill that is used for skiing is really a mountain of garbage.

But these are just the success stories; many landfills are never put to such successful or productive uses.

According to statistics, in 1978 there were 20,000 landfills in the U.S. Fourteen years later (1992) there are fewer than 6,000. The number of operating landfills in the U.S. is expected to drop to less than 2,200 by the year 2000. What are we going to do with our garbage then?

We may not be able to stop producing garbage to put in the landfill, but we can change our habits and slow the flow.

The new Environmental Club on campus is hoping to help change our habits.

"The club is a group of students interested in promoting environmental consciousness and responsibility on campus and beyond," said Robin Morris, chair of the club.

One activity geared toward this goal was the litter pick-up of Mar. 6. Twenty-one members of the campus community participated in the clean up along Court Street. Morris called it "a great success."

Other activities which we as concerned citizens will be able to participate in are aluminum can collections, "River Rescue" which is an annual event to clean up the Little River and the conduction of Beautiful Blount surveys at the recycling drop-off centers in Maryville and Alcoa.

For more information about "River Rescue" or other Environmental Club activities, contact Morris at #8324.

LITTER LITERACY

Test your knowledge

If the following items were left on the side of the road, how long would they take to decompose (days, weeks, months, years)?

- 6 pack rings
- orange peel
- glass
- plastic bag
- paper plate
- aluminum can
- Styrofoam cup
- newspaper

If you don't know how long, can you rank them in order of decomposition (1-fastest, 8-longest)?

Answers:

- 1) paper plate—1 year; (2) orange peel—2 years; (3) newspaper—5 years; (4) plastic bag—20 years; (5) 6 pack rings—100 years; (6) Styrofoam cup—250 years; (7) aluminum can—500 years; (8) glass—1,000,000 years

ADMISSIONS

scale, and an 18 on the ACT or 700 on the SAT.

Although a student may not have the basic requirements on paper, admission is still possible through a staff review. A student may be asked to write an essay stating reasons why MC is the place for their further educational opportunities. Letters of recommendation from a student's former teachers may also be requested.

For the freshman class of 1992, 17.7% of accepted applicants were required to go through the Admissions Committee Review Board which set the standards for acceptance.

Looking at the overall performance in high school is important to the Admissions Committee.

"We make an honest effort not to eliminate any student who could add to the college," said Davis.

Alicia Sprinkle, an admissions counselor, said there is a lot of legwork left up to the counselors. Personal contacts and follow up calls to all prospective students are expected.

After the student is accepted, counselors must see to it that all financial aid and scholarship applications are sent to the proper places.

Sprinkle tells all prospective students that the decision is up to them, because she just wants students to be happy.

"It is extra work, but they need to know we care," Sprinkle said. "Personal contacts from the college are valued by all perspective students," she added.

Michael Torres, associate professor of biology and chairperson of the admissions committee, commented on the faculty's role in admissions: "There is ample involvement by the faculty with the acceptance policies."

Torres said that he is in favor of all new procedures. "This allows us to be more upfront with prospective students about background information they should have [in order] to be successful, and it becomes more realistic," he explained.

The tightened policy helps the admissions committee "to pay attention to the ability to be more selective but not to restrict the diversity of the student body," Torres said.

Dismas fosters social transitions

by Jon Peters
Staff Writer

Prison life often leaves people unable to cope with freedom and the responsibilities of society when they are released. Aiding former inmates in the process of re-entering society is typically neglected, and parolees often end up back in prison. Dismas House is an organization designed to help with that transition so that ex-prisoners can once again become productive members of society.

Nine parolees who committed nonviolent crimes all live together in this home in Maryville. People there generally spend their time working, studying or relaxing. There is cable television and a pool table. Usually everyone gathers for dinner after work or school.

The purpose of Dismas House is to reconcile former prisoners to society. One of the ways parolees are eased back into society is by bringing them into contact with as many "normal" people as possible. These people are students who live in the house or volunteers. Volunteers are needed to cook meals, run errands, work on house projects, or just hang out.

In addition to bringing parolees into contact with society at home, the program requires each to get a job (which the director of Dismas House sometimes helps find) and pay rent. The philosophy is that this fosters economic and social skills, as well as responsibility. Getting ex-prisoners back into the work force is one of the best ways to ease them back into society.

More difficult to describe is the heart of Dismas House. The feeling is one of a community effort toward a common goal of helping and supporting everyone there.

"The feeling is one of a community effort toward a common goal of helping and supporting everyone there."

ing and supporting everyone there. People really seem to care about one another at Dismas House.

The religious affiliations of Dismas House seem to depend on who the director is at the time. The founder, Jack Hickey, was a Catholic priest. The current director, Mike Pierce said that he tries to instill a sense of religiousness into the parolees by example, rather than by "trying to force it down their throats."

If you are interested in volunteering to help Dismas House, you can call the director, Mike Pierce at 983-9272, or contact Kevyn Smith at extension 8371.

Davis makes the call for dollars

Davis Hall: Phonathon Champs!

MC students representing Davis Hall came out on top of the intramural phonathon competition. Volunteers from Davis Hall raised $14,590 from 218 donors and won in both the "Most dollars Raised" and "Most Pledges" categories. Davis Hall takes home cash prizes totaling $200.

Pearson's Hall came in second place with $11,410 from 151 donors. Student Programming was a close third with $11,405 from 176 donors. Other organizations represented at the 1993 Phonathon were Copeland Hall, FCA, Lloyd Hall, and the Bonner Scholars.

Beckie Heckler took an early lead in the competition for the individual prizes when she raised $4,000 from one donor on the first night of the phonathon. This was the largest single gift of the Phonathon. By the time the eight nights were over, Heckler had raised $10,142 from 92 donors putting her in first place in both the "Dollars" and "Pledges" categories.

Forty-seven students from seven organizations raised a total of $55,735 or 54% of the $103,106 raised during the eight nights of the Phonathon! Contributions from donors before the phonathon brought in an additional $14,705 for a GRAND TOTAL of $117,811.

The 1993 Phonathon was the most successful ever, raising $16,098 over last year's total of $101,713.

As this year's student chairpersons, Vance Grant and Alyson Neville contributed many hours in the weeks preceding the phonathon, attending meetings of various campus organizations and enlisting student volunteers.

The 1993 Phonathon was held in Willard House on Feb 15-18 and Feb 22-25. This annual event involves not only student volunteers but alumni and parents as well. While the money raised during the Phonathon supports a variety of programs, most of the contributions are to the College's Annual Fund. The Annual Fund supports the College's operating budget, with most of the money going to student financial aid, faculty salaries, and academic programs.

Each phonathon participant received a souvenir t-shirt designed by Heidi Jones, a sophomore art major.

Davis was supported by phonathon volunteers (clockwise from bottom) Heather Griffis, Kristi Kennedy, Sara Goelz, Laura Obuch and Lynn Frye.

DISABLED

to the handicapped. According to McCall, the college is in the process of determining what its responsibilities are in following the act. The act itself does not clearly state what arrangements different types of institutions are required to provide. It also does not state when the provisions must be put in place.

Disabled students are offered assistance at Maryville College. Marcia Gibson, director of campus life, said There is a fund in the budget for helping people with different disabilities including students with hearing losses, learning disabilities, or temporary or permanent mobility problems."

There are two rooms in Copeland designed for a resident who is hearing impaired. In addition, Student Development provides individuals with interpreters and notetakers as needed. The Learning Center on campus helps and tutors students with learning disabilities.

Students with mobility problems can receive help in a variety of ways. They may, for example, receive special equipment that will help them bathe more easily, or they may have their rooms located on the first floor of their dormitory. They may also request any class held in a second or third floor classroom be moved to a first-floor classroom.

Gibson stated that on average at least one student a year is involved in an accident that leaves the student with mobility problems. It is Maryville College's responsibility to provide these services. It is the student's responsibility to ask for help.

The Maryville College catalog states on page 4 that "Openness has always been one hallmark of Maryville's history; creative response has also been characteristic." The college has done well in living up to that standard. This is shown in its acceptance of people from different races and ethnic backgrounds, in the active student government, and the existence of the Student Development department. As McCall said: "The college should be morally driven to provide an open atmosphere for learning to all individuals." This encompasses all students and potential students, including those in wheelchairs action in the students' olfactory systems; it has also been rampant among the faculty and staff and their families. Dr. Scott Brunger, Professor in economics, noted, "It hit when students became exhausted. At their age with good health habits, it should not be much of a problem." Brunger also had a high number of absences in his classes and has a family member who suffered from it.

FLU

Mrs. Bianco, Professor of Art, noted that students do not spend enough time recovering—"They usually missed at least one week of classes and then came back too soon." She added, "it seems to be much harder to get rid of this year."

Other professors also noticed decreases in attendance and have had some sort of run-in with the flu. Mr. Powell, teacher of English, had no problems with the flu and had no students reporting their absences a result of influenza. He did note that last year's flu outbreak was much worse than this year's: "It was awful; it was the first time in years of teaching that I had to take off from sickness," Powell said.

The origin of this winter's flu is not known. It has not been given a flattering name, like the Hong Kong flu of a few years ago or the Vietnamese flu. No matter what nationality is attributed to a new strain of Grippe, it takes no prisoners. Japanese students, Thai students, Ethiopian students and other international students have felt the effects just as Americans. In some cases, the flu takes a transpacific, transatlantic or Pan-American plane flight aboard an international student to Tokyo, Bangkok, Addis Adaba, or other major metropolis.

If you would rather not spread or catch the flu, here are some precautions to take just in case your mother or father never told you:

When you sneeze, sneeze away from others if possible; if not, cup your hands around your nose at the moment of impact (incidentally, in Japan, people put what looks like a small surgical cup mask over the lower half of their faces and wear these protective masks all day while going about their daily business).

When touching things, try to keep your hands as clean as possible, especially when eating with others.

Stay away from the young, especially babies—they are not ready for such a shock to their very young systems.

If you feel like you are coughing up your vitals, don't think about it—GO TO THE DOCTOR.

Don't go to class or work unless you can handle it; a few days out may mean more to you than two or more weeks of hell.

As the flu makes its way through the last vestiges of the Maryville College campus, students, faculty, staff and their families breathe sighs of relief and get back to their life's work. What can be done to counter the next influenza revolution? Just wait.

MC basketball sees tournament

Lady Scots make third round

by John Morgan
Staff Writer

Lady Scots

Lady Scots' freshman, Jamie Parrott, scored 20 points in the final ten minutes of play as Maryville College advanced to the third round of the Division-three NCAA basketball tournament. The Lady Scots topped Roanoke College of Virginia 85-67 in a game that saw junior All-America candidate, Leah Onks, go down with an ankle injury midway through the second half.

Parrott picked up the slack, finishing with a season-high 36 points and seven rebounds to pace the Lady Scots. Onks had 16 points before leaving the game and Honey Brown had seven assists and nine points.

Maryville advances to the third round to play against Concordia and the College of St. Benedict in St. Cloud, Minn.

Scots

The Maryville College men's basketball team's season came to an end as the Scots fell to Emory & Henry 83-61 Saturday at Boydson Baird Gymnasium.

The Scots just could not get any type of momentum going as the Wasps' pesky defensive play kept Maryville from getting into synch.

The Scots were able to keep the game close despite being in early foul trouble as Chris Clark and Kelvin Richardson each picked up their third foul two-thirds of the way into the first half. The Wasps led by ten at the break.

Maryville was able to get a small spark early in the second half, cutting the lead to five behind the post play of Kelin Mark and Kendall Wallace but Emory & Henry pulled away aided by Maryville turnovers and the Wasps' unyielding defense.

Clark finished the game with 18 points and our hats are off to our Maryville seniors Kelvin Richard son, Ramier Rodriguez, Rodney Lane, Kelin Mark, and Kendall Wallace for all they have given to Maryville College basketball. —LACE!

Intramurals director credits decline to scheduling conflicts; poor communication

by Josh Hogan
Staff Writer

Intramural sports have always been an exciting part of Maryville College life, sometimes rivaling the excitement of the varsity sports teams. In recent years, however, it seems, to many people on campus, that intramural sports have experienced somewhat of a decline.

One of these people is intramural director, Mr. Dean Walsh. Walsh is a graduate of MC and has returned to become an assistant basketball coach and intramural director. He took on the daunting task of scheduling intramural competition. Scheduling is one of the problems associated with the decline of intramurals. It is very hard to schedule an event at a time that gives people the opportunity to participate. Walsh said that he is very interested in creating a set time block of one to two times a week that would be solely for intramural sports events. He feels this will create a better structure for intramural sports and will prevent confusion over what times events will take place. This could also ensure that certain facilities such as the pool or the Alumni Gym will be available for intramural events.

Walsh feels that the main problem intramural sports have been facing is difficulty in communication. He said there needs to be a better communication system and "more cohesion with student programming and intramurals."

An answer to the communication problem is the use of electronic message boards recently approved by the Student Senate. Ted Belflower, a member of the intramural committee, says that these boards can be used for intramural sports and any other event on campus.

Belflower, like Walsh, feels that intramurals should be much more involved with student programming. He said that one of the committee's ideas was to run intramurals in the same fashion as student programming.

Belflower was also concerned about inadequate communication: "We don't know what people want."

Despite all the obstacles to organizing intramural sports, Walsh is very optimistic about the upcoming basketball games. He expects around 80 participants playing for eight different teams. Basketball was just recently tipped off by a three-point shootout and a student/faculty game on Tues., Mar. 2.

Both Walsh and Belflower urge new ideas. They stressed that intramurals are for the students so students need to take the initiative to get the intramural events they want.

If anyone has a good idea for intramural sports feel free to contact Mr. Dean Walsh at #8288 or drop by his office in the P.E. building. Students can also contact Ted Belflower at #8314 or leave him a note at box 2042.

'Vanities' offers comedy with an edge

by Julie Nachman
Staff Writer

On Thurs., Feb. 25, Alpha Psi Omega opened their three-show run of "Vanities."

The play begins in a high school gymnasium. On stage, three cheerleaders are seen rehearsing the order in which they will perform the cheers at the football game that night.

Their discussion moves from upcoming senior-year social events to talk about their boyfriends, all of whom are football players, and a girl named Sarah, who is a majorette and "easy."

The girls are in charge of the decorations for the football dance and the prom. Kathy, played by Julie Walker, suggests making a rainbow out of chicken wire and colored Kleenex to go with the theme of Over the Rainbow. Walker skillfully portrayed Kathy as the "sensible" one who really has her head on her shoulders. She takes charge of and organizes everything the girls plan to do for the rest of their senior year.

Ironically, the organized Kathy is not so certain about her career plans; she thinks that she would like to pursue a career in P.E.

Julie Williams aptly characterized Mary as the aggressive, self-assured one of the trio who wants to study psychology. Nancy Allen was wonderful as Joann, who wants to go to college but says, "I sure don't want to learn anything."

When an announcement is made that the president has been shot, Joann thinks that it refers to the president of the student body, whom she has just seen in algebra class.

Scene two begins in Mary's dorm room. The three girls are now college seniors. Similar to their high school years, they are in charge of all Kappa Kappa Gamma activities. Mary begins gossiping and sings a racy song about the Pi Phi sorority and their ways. The song embarrasses Joann, who has become more "lady like" and is now engaged to be married to Ted, her steady boyfriend since high school.

During college, the girls begin to have different ways of looking at the world and what is ahead of them.

Kathy tries to talk with the girls about 'Rush' and the girls they probably will have to pledge into their sorority, but the others do not listen.

When Joann brings up the topic of her upcoming wedding, which she is extremely excited about, she learns that Mary and Kathy have not ordered their lime green bridesmaid dresses.

Dress colors are not all that the girls disagree about. While Joann plans her wedding, Mary is arranging to travel to Europe after graduation. At this point, Mary begins to be really sarcastic about the naivety of her friends.

The three girls are united, however, in their making fun of 'Fay Jean' and other girls who they think are just as bad and in their fears of leaving school and having to fend for themselves.

The final scene features Kathy standing alone in a New York garden apartment, drinking champagne and pacing nervously. When the door bell rings, Kathy checks over the room and answers the door to Joann.

They scream with happiness and return to the stage. They begin to talk about Joann's children and her husband Ted. The two of them seem very uneasy and uncomfortable talking and just sitting in the apartment.

When Kathy offers Joann tea or champagne, Joann takes a cup of tea, because she does not want to go home drunk.

After Mary comes late carrying two bulky bundles from her impulsive shopping spree that she has just finished, Joann asks if she can switch from tea to a glass of champagne. Mary starts to ask for a mixed drink, and then she remembers that she is at a tea party, not a bar. Instead, she takes a glass of champagne.

The girls talk a little about their current lives. They learn that Joann has three children, but wants four; Mary runs an art gallery of pornographic nature; Kathy no longer teaches and just sits around reading and looking at the stars.

After several glasses of champagne, Kathy gets angry over Mary's sarcastic remarks about her penchant for chicken wire. Joann feels that she must leave because things did not work out the way she thought that they were going to, and she sees what she wants to protect her children from, basically from growing up and learning about the world.

After Kathy gets Joann safely into a cab, Mary is asked why she slept with Ted. Mary says, "I guess it was the last act of sharing." Kathy asks if Mary was jealous that Joann got her fantasy from beginning to end. Mary says no, but then Kathy tells her that she used to be, but is no longer.

Mary suggests that they toast to their bygone days or, as Kathy says, "to forget them."

FAC NEWS AND REVIEWS

Student choir performs Homecoming concert

The Maryville College Concert Choir will perform a Homecoming Concert Fri., Mar. 26 at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall.

The public is cordially invited to attend.

The complete program includes a cappella and accompanied sacred and secular music. Part I features works from the full spectrum of music history by composers such as Victoria, Lotti, Gallus, Mendelssohn, Bruckner, Thompson, Rachmaninoff, Tchesnokoff, Clausen, Parker, Dickau and Cousins. Part II features spirituals by Thomas, Hairston and Dawson, as well as a medley of vocal jazz called "The Manhattan Transfer in Concert," Sondheim's "Send in the Clowns," a Welsh Lullaby, a madrigal by Morley and a Parody of this madrigal by P.D.Q. Bach. The program closes with the Peter Lutkin benediction, "The Lord Bless You and Keep You," a longstanding tradition in which all MC choir alumni are invited to participate. The particular pieces to be performed are selected in accordance with the local occasion.

The MC Concert Choir is directed by Dr. Daniel Taddie.

King awarded alumni honor

David King, a management major and a resident of Lafayette, GA, was named Maryville College's Outstanding Senior of the 1992-93 school year.

A member of Who's Who Among Students in American Colleges and Universities, King serves as president of the Student Senate and of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes. King is a member of the National Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society for Freshman and has recently been inducted into Alpha Gamma Sigma, MC's senior honor society.

King has been a wide receiver for the MC Scots' football team and has been listed on MC's athletic honor roll for four years. He has also been named to an Academic All-American football team and has received an NCAA Postgraduate Scholarship. King's involvement in athletics has led him to create a personal axiom: "Life imitates sports."

After graduation from MC King plans to attend law school at the University of Georgia.

The Outstanding Senior award was presented at the annual Awards Banquet and ceremony Saturday, April 24.

Also nominated for the award were Jamie

David King, '93 Outstanding Senior

Harrison, an economics major; Michelle Hall, writing/communications; Jessica Roitman, religion; Alyson Neville, sign language/interpreting and psychology; and Beth Stevenson, child development and learning.

Dr. Dean A. Boldon, Academic Vice President and Dean of the Faculty, announced the Outstanding Senior Award.

Keynote speaker, Dr. Mark C. Ebersole, interim president, read anecdotes about higher education.

Faculty and staff presented students with various departmental and service awards. Students named to Who's Who, Alpha Lambda Delta, and Alpha Gamma Sigma were recognized as were scholarship recipients.

Racism on campus stems from segregation; ignorance of others

Have you ever gone into the cafeteria during lunch or supper and noticed that whole tables or whole sections of the cafeteria were occupied by Blacks, Whites, orientals or hispanics and that, for the most part, none of these groups mixed with another?

Why is it that students separate themselves, and what does it mean? Most students seem to notice the segregation in the cafeteria but seem to be uncertain about what the segregation implies.

When asked if he noticed a pattern of grouping on campus, Tae-Jun Ahn, an MC junior from Korea, reported that he had, particularly in the cafeteria. "Everybody knows White people (sit together) and Asian people sit together, (but) I don't know if that is racism," Ahn said.

Jenny Cummings, an MC sophomore, expressed a similar view. "I think there are obvious groups on campus ... like in the cafeteria: CELL students sit together; Blacks are in one corner. Maybe that's not racism. Maybe it's just sitting where you want to sit," Cummings said.

Babatu Willingham, a senior history major, stated that the campus is "integrated" but commented on the seeming segregation in the cafeteria: "Few (African American students) are in class together; we don't have a student center.... Dinner, lunch, and breakfast is the only time we can get together.... It's not that we're segregated; we get energy from each other. We're just together. It's not tension at all."

Ramier Rodriguez, an MC senior, identifies his ethnic associations as Hispanic American. "If you really analyze it (the situation in the cafeteria), it's a matter of friends, people with things in common having lunch together. Go all the way around the cafeteria. People sit with people who have things in common with them—football players, students in ministry groups, upperclassmen, faculty, quadmates, dormmates. But if the rest of campus life is like that outside the cafeteria, then I'd say there is a problem: segregation," Rodriguez said.

This apparent self-segregation by students seems common enough at MC. Not only do students segregate themselves in the cafeteria, it also seems that one can see the outlines of racial groups at study tables in the library, in classroom seating, in Isaacs, at social events and in the dormitory. Although interaction

Please see RACISM p. 5

The number of books and book bags on the floor of Pearson's Lobby used to be a gauge of the number of students eating lunch. Not so anymore.

The lobby has been empty for several weeks—even during meal times. Signs warning students of the possibility of theft were posted on Mon., Apr. 19, and since that time, students have been encouraged to take their book bags into the cafeteria if they must bring them to meals.

The warning was posted after students reported over ten backpacks stolen from the Pearson's lobby during lunchtime. Items reported missing include textbooks, UT and MC library books, notebooks, calculators, computer disks, yearbook spreadsheets, cash, credit cards, keys, and a senior thesis draft. Although several students have posted rewards for the return of property, campus security projects that few, if any, of the book bags will be returned.

Security speculates that book bags are being stolen from local campuses for the textbooks which may be sold at college book stores.

MC campus security has been working on the case in conjunction with the Maryville police department and the UT campus police. Authorities have recently arrested suspects in connection with the thefts.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR . . .

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2806.

Dear Editor:

I am writing in response to your invitation for praise. Without extreme sap and smarm, let me extend my pen in praise of our Senior Class of 1993.

Yes, this is the voice of one moving with caution toward the precipice of that all-elusive Future, but it is not a voice tainted with nostalgia. Personally, hand me my jump-skis, I can make this one! There are so many things for us to do and see—a life I'm ready to begin as a "junior adult," full of newness and risk. All my education is before me, not behind.

At the same time, I know my future steps are already influenced by the steps that precede them, and I would like to pause and pay tribute to that guiding force. I have enjoyed my four years at Maryville College, and I have matured and learned every day. I give to the institution itself all due gratitude—thank you for the structure in my life. To the people that have surrounded me these four years, thank you for the Life in my life. It is you I will miss.

We as a class have weathered the first stages of major change at this institution, and the weathering has not always been easy. There is a mixture of regret and satisfaction that comprises the tone of our memory. I am here to offer congratulations to all those who were not content to float along, who grabbed an oar and, if nothing else, swung wildly at the fog of oppression and seemed determined to settle. I would in no way suggest that the destinations have been reached, but we must never, never think that we have not pushed forward in policy changes, administrative attention, etc. Ask anyone in administration, and they will tell you the profits of our persistence. Better yet, ask a Maryville College student a few years from now.

The downside of our achievements is that they are chiefly not possessions but contributions to a legacy to the students that follow us. Through our college lives we have dared to ride the cusp and not look back to what may float in the wake of our efforts. However, despite the constant feeling that the good things will always be behind us, we have the satisfaction that what is behind us is good.

Therefore—to the most intelligent, most creative, the wittiest, most innovative, who dared to build and ask for more, who leave the best for '94, who were, above all, and always will be, the finest class of '93—I salute you! I have gathered the fragments, the spurts of Life you have given me, and I have stored them away in my closet of inspiration. I can not tell you that you might see yourselves in my future pages—you will always be found there. Your wit stabs my brain, trickles in laughter over my heart, and pumps the ink through my pen, forever until the hands that embrace you can write no more. I love you all.

From the Echo Staff. . .

The Echo staff apologizes for using inappropriate language to describe persons with disabilities in the Mar. 25 story "College lacks funding for handicapped accessibility." The staff member who wrote the story volunteered for the assignment, because she considers herself a person with a disability. If a person with a disability uses outdated terms, then it is a reflection of society's refusal to abandon inappropriate language. As long as the general population continues to cling to outmoded language, persons with disabilities will be co-opted into adopting such language as well.

The media should take the lead in setting the standard of language usage. Because it is often difficult to find a balance between offensive, outdated language and overly euphemistic, equally offensive language, we are printing some suggestions for describing persons with disabilities.

The following was taken from a pamphlet entitled "Talking About Disability: A Guide to Using Appropriate Language," provided courtesy of Robert Ledman, member of the Coalition for Tennesseans with Disabilities.

Guidelines for talking About Disability:

1. Do not refer to a person's disability unless it is relevant.
2. Use "disability" rather than "handicap" to refer to a person's disability. It is acceptable to use "handicap" to describe accessibility accommodations, such as handicap parking; but it is better to use "accessible" in those instances. One may also say that a person is handicapped by obstacles, such as architectural barriers or the attitudes of ignorant or insensitive people. Never use "cripple/crippled" in any reference to disability.
3. When referring to a person's disability, try to use "people first" language. In other words, it is better to say "person with a disability" or "man who has autism" rather than "a disabled person" or "an autistic man," particularly in a first reference.
4. Avoid referring to people with disabilities as "the disabled, the deaf, epileptics, the

Dear Editor:

A year ago last April on Friday afternoon, while most city police departments were gearing up for the after-math of the Rodney-King trial, my father drove off the ranch and disappeared. Although we knew my father's memory was confused from all the years of heart medicine that had accumulated in his body from being among the first hear by-pass patients, my family and I were in shock. The search for my father was a low priority for those agencies who were in a position to help us the most.

The families' four college students and their friends networked, and by Monday the search had escalated from a ground to air search and from a rural Texas Panhandle town into five states; my father's picture was daily on the front page of hundreds of newspapers. Radio stations were asking people to look for his car, and television stations were showing his picture and giving updates on the search at the end of their news casts. Local, states and national trucking organizations, service businesses, rural route mail carriers, and county service repairmen had been contacted to look for his car. Hundreds of leads were coming in and by then hundreds of college students were helping us.

College students were the energy and creative cathexis for the search. They were the ones who kept feeding us with ideas on what to try and who to contact. They did their research and supplied us with names and addresses. The college students were the ones who knew how to use all the modern electronic communication gadgets and insisted a local bank with a newly installed fax machine stay open to send and receive the hundreds of faxes that were transmitted; students were also the ones who pressured to have rural phone company install call forwarding and call waiting at my parent's home so we could all keep in touch. Students got companies to donate roving air time for their cellular phones so they could stay in touch as they organized and coordinated community search parties and helped check out the hundreds of leads that were coming from all directions. Students pressured the local radios, tv stations and newspapers to continue the search publicity.

The college students networked with other college fraternities, sororities and service organization throughout the five states. They helped us spread the search, continued to help organize search parties, checked on leads, and had prayer chains. Students helped pressure state politicians to get the Civil Air Patrol searches started. The CAP searches in Texas and Oklahoma took hundreds of volunteers who were mostly college students. It was a Mission for them and each cadet had a precise job. Many hours of training had prepared them for the grueling hours they worked.

My father's car was finally found a week later on a remote ranch in Oklahoma near the New Mexico border by the Oklahoma Civil Air Patrol. Cowboyboys were sent in to identify the car and search dogs were air dropped to find his body.

Throughout the search and the following week, the M.C. art students were busy helping each other finish up the term the best they could. They, too, did an excellent job.

Sincerely,
Thelma Bianco

retarded, a quadriplegic," etc. Descriptive terms should be used as adjectives, not as nouns.

5. Avoid negative or sensational descriptions of a person's disability. Do not say "suffers from," "a victim of," or "afflicted with." Do not refer to people with disabilities as "patients" unless they are receiving treatment in a medical facility. Never say "invalid."

6. Do not portray people with disabilities as overly courageous, brave, special, or superhuman. This implies that it is unusual for people with disabilities to have talents or skills.

7. Do not use "normal" to describe people who do not have disabilities. It is better to say "people without disabilities" or "typical," if necessary to make comparisons.

8. Never say "wheelchair-bound" or "confined to a wheelchair." People who use mobility or adaptive equipment are, if anything, afforded freedom and access that otherwise would be denied them.

9. Never assume that a person with a communication disorder (speech impediment, hearing loss, motor impairment) also has a cognitive disability, such as mental retardation. On the other hand, people with mental retardation often speak well.

We welcome advice from our readers on how to communicate more effectively.

Tales from the Blizzard

by Josh Hogan
Staff Writer

You are in for a rare treat. You have the privilege of reading my own reflections on our spring break and the now legendary BLIZZARD OF '93.

Ah, spring break. What a lovely, snowy, rainy, gloomy, depressing, frostbitten time we who didn't get to go to Miami, Mexico, or any place with temperatures above 32 had this year. There is nothing I like better than being trapped in the house freezing my posterior off and listening to my younger sister incessantly ask for snow cream. Who needs Cancun or the Bahamas when you can play keen games like Olympic snow shoveling, finding the bathroom in the dark, and my personal favorite, whining about the lack of electricity? This may not sound like fun to you, but I assure you, it most certainly is! Why is it so fun? It's because snow makes everyone insane.

Now, I would like to offer some suggestions for the next big storm. These are based on my own experience of the storm. Use them as you see fit.

First of all, you never want to wear running shoes in 28 inches of snow. It's not good policy if you like walking around normally. Flip-flops, sandals, and slippers are also footwear to avoid. Remember this, and you will not have to make a trip to your friendly neighborhood dermatologist to take care of frostbite.

I implore you to store batteries. I don't think I need to elaborate on that point.

Whatever you do, install gas or kerosene heat in your home. If you don't, your house will be roughly the temperature of Barrow, Alaska in the middle of January if your electricity goes off. You may find yourself wearing every stitch of clothes you own and lying under several hundred layers of blankets. Avoid this tragic outcome at all costs.

Eat and eat plenty. You now have an excuse to eat like a big, old, flabby, greasy pig. "I'm only keeping up my energy so I won't freeze to death," is all you need to say to convince yourself and everyone else that the three bags of Doritos you just inhaled went to a worthy cause. This ploy, unfortunately, will not work in the middle of summer. Use it when you have the chance.

Another tragedy I so unfortunately had to endure was several days without cable television. After the electricity finally came back on, I found myself sitting in a chair with chapped feet and a head cold watching some movie I had seen roughly 37 times and wishing something or anything would come on T.V. I didn't care if I turned on the T.V. to someone saying, "Welcome to the Wonderful World of Wood. I'm your host Norm. Today's wonderfully wooden topic is Vice-President Al Gore's head." The guys that host those inane shows seem to be invariably named Norm. It must be an international law or something. Lack of cable television, my friends, constitutes the greatest calamity that can befall humankind.

I hope you find my suggestions and reflections helpful. No one should have to watch, "Me and My El Camino" brought to you by Frank's Carbs 'n' More with the new, all-you-can-eat hot bar. No, my friends, I cannot bear that insidious, sorry situation.

Dear Editor,

Well, it's almost here again. That horrible time that we all dread (or rather, our parents dread)—Maryville College tuition costs for the next year. It seems like we are supposed to be wells of money. "$14,000? No problem!" RIGHT!! I know that a very common question is: "Where does all that money go? What exactly does my money get spent on?" I don't have the answers to where all of it goes, but I can help you out with that oh-so-little fee of $150 for Student Activities. Out of that $150, Student Senate gets $90 to divvy up between the six different organizations that offer something to the campus as a whole. Those six organizations are: Intramurals, the Echo, the Chilhowean, Impressions, Senate and Student Programming.

This year Student Programming was awarded $22,000 for the entire year. Since this is such a huge sum of money to be responsible for, the members of the board decided that you deserve to know what your money is being used for. Here is a condensed version of our budget as of 3/93:

Bands & Dances.....$6125	Catering.....$1854	Chair Salary..... $600
Homecoming T-shirts.....$1553	Supplies.....$682	Phone.....$150
Buses (Boomsday & Football).....$1943	Printing..... $200
Entertainment (Dating Game, Carriages, Hypnotist, Comedian, etc.).....$2373

You might think that $6000 is an awful lot to spend on a "silly" band. But we have been able to host 9 different bands on that amount (that number includes the bands hired for Blister in the Sun and Spring Fling).

Remember that our meetings are always open for your suggestions (Tuesdays at 12:30 in the Student Activities Room upstairs in Fayerweather). We would love to have your input and we would much rather hear about complaints and disappointments directly from the source rather than through the good 'ole MC Grapevine! For an itemized budget, contact Chris Rapp (8345), Edward Levan (8312), or Cathy Pounders (8013). We would be happy to explain anything to you.

We hope this clears up any concerns.

Thanks,
Student Programming Board

Dear Editor,

I do not know how many people have heard about what happened the week of spring break, but I think that everyone should know what we as MC students are getting for our money.

As we all know, there was what has been called the "snow of the century" starting Friday and continuing all day Saturday. Many of us were unfortunate enough to still be in the area and found ourselves snowed in with no where to go but our dorm rooms. Even the whole choir had to be moved into Pearsons for the weekend because they could not get to Florida. Many of the roads were not passable—safely passable, that is—until Wednesday afternoon. Those of us who had nowhere to go, because we could not get home, stayed in our dorm rooms only to be told Monday that we had no choice but to vacate the premises.

I was in my room when an administrator and a man walked into my room using their master key without so much as knocking. I do not know what they call this, but I call it an invasion of my privacy. If they had only knocked, I gladly would have opened the door myself. The administration may own the rooms that we live in, but I have paid more than a sufficient amount of money to live in this room. I think I deserve at least the common courtesy of a knock, which takes very little time and energy, before they enter. Whether they thought the room was occupied or not is no excuse.

I was then told that I had a few minutes before I would have to leave. I tried to explain that I live 12 hours away, I-40 was closed, and my Camaro would not make it through the mountains anyway. This did not seem to matter; I was supposed to "find" somewhere to go. They explained that it was unsafe for me to stay in the dorm because there was no one here to watch over me and there were problems with people "walking in off the street." The doors to Pearsons, however, stay locked 24 hours a day. Unless someone had a key, there is no way anyone off the street could just walk in. I am 22 years old, and I do not think I have to have someone to "watch over" me.

I was given the option of staying in Davis for the night, or letting them try to find a family in the area that was willing to take people in. I feel like staying with strangers would have been a great imposition, especially when I had a perfectly good room that was empty. I was not the only one in this situation. Others who live as far away as I do and farther also had to miraculously come up with somewhere to stay. We have paid for our rooms and live here nine out of twelve months. The snow storm was definitely inconvenient, but it was not our fault, and it could not be helped. Students were inconvenienced; families were inconvenienced; heaven forbid that staff or administration had to be inconvenienced and allow students who had nowhere else to go to stay on campus. Instead it was much easier to say they did all they could when in reality they threw students out into the cold snow, literally! I find the way this situation was handled to be totally unacceptable. Given the number of students who were left on campus, there is no reason that the dorms should have been closed.

Dear campus,

Spring Break for me was horrible. I did not get to go to sunny Florida or anywhere nice. I had to stay in a shabby motel here in Maryville. This motel is located across the street from Kroger, and right next to Save-A-Lot. So at least I would be able to get food when I needed it.

That Friday night was the night it started to snow. Dave Letterman called this snow "Blizzardio Diablo." This was the worst storm of the century. It completely shut down the city of Maryville. Nothing was open, including Kroger and Save-A-Lot. My food supply was closed, and these stores remained closed the whole weekend.

My friend, Ray, was stuck in Maryville with me. We ended up getting very hungry on Saturday. So, I called Maryville College to see, if, by chance, they might be serving dinner that night. I talked to security, and he told me that they were serving dinner. So we commenced to walk through the deep snow in our heaviest winter gear up to Margaret Ware dining facility. On the way we saw two students on their way into town to find food, so I told them about the dinner being served. We all walked to the dining room and started getting food. All of a sudden I was approached by an RD. He asked me, "What the heck do you think you are doing?" I told him that I called security who told me about the dinner. He said they did not prepare enough food for my friends and I. They only prepared enough for the Chorus Tour that got snowed in. They even complained about my friend not being on the meal plan. So I told them that I would pay for his meal if I had to. After pleading and begging for 15 to 20 minutes they finally allowed us to eat. Thank God!

The first day back to school, I was talking to some other friends about my awful Spring Break. I was telling about our trip to Kroger the night it snowed so badly. The people in Kroger's would not let us in to get any food. While I was telling this story, the same RD that bitched at me for coming to dinner the Saturday of the blizzard overheard me say, "I was starving and they would not feed me and my friend." That RD stopped in his tracks and gave me the "EVIL EYE".

I might not be the best-liked student of Maryville College, but since they were feeding the other students that night, then they should not care to feed me. But, that was not the way it was. I get the feeling that Student Development does not even want me here. That they do not care about my development at all. Whether they like it or not, I am here to stay.

An unwanted student,

Postcards from the Edge

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

I travelled to Japan as an exchange student through Maryville College exchange relationship with Kansai Gaidai University of Foreign Studies near Osaka, Japan during the 1992 fall semester. Representing Maryville College along with April Millsaps, I have a lot of great memories along with bad memories from which I learned.

To begin, Japan is only known as Japan with one very big city, Tokyo. Most folks know karate and many martial arts have come from Japan. The Geisha girl and the yen are the other Japanese icons in the Western eye. However, like America, there are many more things in that oriental archipelago.

Kansai Gaidai, a shortened name generally used, is located in the Osaka prefecture, about a 30-minute train ride from Osaka, Japan's largest city and recognized cultural center. The city where Kansai Gaidai lies, Hirakata City, has an estimated population of 400,000. Knoxville's population is around 200,000. Hirakata, like all Japanese cities, however, takes up much less area than Knoxville or any other American city. Streets are wildly curved: "There are no straight roads in Japan," observed Hisae Kato, a Maryville College part-time student hailing from close to the Osaka area. On these roads, which are similar to the East Tennessee Appalachian hilly roads, Japanese drive aggressively, walk purposefully, motor-scoot and motorcycle superpersonally and bicycle vigorously. There are so many people that a day does not pass with an empty street for five minutes. I experienced culture shock and think I recovered fully after two months. I lived in a dorm with well-furnished, Japanese-style rooms. A large kitchen and a luxurious bathroom were located on both floors and a large television and video-cassette player lounge was located on the first floor. My general impression is that a homestay experience would be a lot more satisfying than living in the dorm because of the large preponderance of Americans and other Westerners who speak English most of the time. The Japanese at Maryville College have the same problem with the large Japanese population housed in few dorms on a small campus.

The Kansai Gaidai campus is large and enclosed. Foreign students' classes are given in the Center for International Studies in a building directly outside campus walls. Classes, except for Japanese speaking and Japanese writing, are taught in English by American or Japanese professors. Their expertise is valuable and most have lived in Japan for five to ten or more years. Their help is greatly appreciated by both students and the Center for International Studies staff in clearing up misunderstandings or questions. The professors also help orient the students to the culture.

I spent four months at Kansai Gaidai and one month travelling from Osaka to Tokyo by myself on train. I stayed with my Japanese friends during my stay, including recently graduated Etsuko Kato and many other alumni. Our friendships created at Maryville helped me in Japan. When I felt frustrated or lonely, I could call them or go visit them and visit any place. I did so many things, I cannot list them all in this article. If you want to know, come ask me.

There is so much to see and live with in Japan. It is heavily cited yet has national parks and other natural areas, of which I hiked and camped. The mass transportation system is out-of-this-world. You can go anywhere you want in the country by train or bus. One aspect which I think should be mentioned was the American attitude I witnessed in the first two months of living in the dorm. Compared with the Japanese customs and manners, most Americans there seemed rather obnoxious and rude. There was not much respect for the Japanese and the country hosting them. This really bothered me until about two months had passed. The Americans changed, showing much more respect and feeling much more at ease in the well-defined, mannered Japanese society. As a foreigner travelling alone, I attracted many stares. Everyone, for the most part, has a mostly homogeneous appearance in contrast to the varied skin and hair colors of the Americans.

American movies as well as McDonald's, Coca-Cola and Kentucky Fried Chicken are the biggest American icons in Japan. I believe the heavy violence in the American movies caused some Japanese to shy away from me. Japan outlaws all handguns, making it one of the safest countries in the world (statistically proven). This fear of me was one of the most frustrating things I was confronted with. I tried my best to give a more generous, kind appearance of the American, but there are a lot of others who do otherwise. Not all people are alike, even if they come from the same nationality.

When I arrived to the Tokyo gate for my airplane departure, I immediately felt a certain cautiousness being around so many Americans. When I returned to Tennessee 24 hours later, I could not believe the wide, green spaces around me! And on every street I wondered (and still do from time to time) where all the people were. My tongue misses the Japanese dish, the squid, the octopus, the sushi. I feel very lucky to be able to know the Japanese on campus. They have a lot to tell us, if we just have the patience to listen.

by Dave Roberts

Hey, kids. Whassup? This week's Dave's World is going to be really short because I am very, very sick. The disease that I'm suffering from (I hope you all are immune; I think it spreads like wildfire this time of year) is commonly known as "Oh My God My Spring Break Got Snowed Out And The Weather Still Sucks When Is The Damn Sun Going To Shine I'm So Incredibly Sick Of School And Tiny Bass-Ackwards Towns Nestled In The Foothills Of The Smoky Mountains That I'm Going To Develop A Heroin Habit If I Don't Get Out Of Here" disease.

You know, the funniest thing happens every spring break. Everyone takes off to various parts of the world thinking, "O.K., I'm going to party for a week, just take it easy and get school off my mind. Then, when I come back, I will have the partying out of my system and I will be ready to concentrate on my studies." Right? And monkeys will fly out of my butt. What actually happens is that people get back and think, "Wow, wasn't it nice to be completely free from responsibility? I kind of liked it. In fact, I really liked it. In fact, I would rather endure paper cuts between all my knuckles than study for that test I have tomorrow. I think I'll go get a six pack." Now, on top of this annual phenomenon, we have a whole college full of people who spent their spring breaks inside - cursing the clouds, cursing the snow, cursing the cold, and after about three days being stuck in the same room together, cursing each other. You would think it would be a volatile situation, all that energy stored up, waiting to be released somehow. You would think that everybody would just go crazy when they get back to campus, right? Sigh... maybe next year.

Anyway, how about all that snow? At least nature could have kissed us first. (Did anyone get that?) The biggest storm of the century! Good grief, a century has... (pause while the English major struggles with simple addition)... 5200 weeks! This storm could have happened on the week John Lennon got killed - then his killer couldn't have reached him. It could have happened the week JFK got killed - then his motorcade would have been rerouted. It could have happened on the week Martin Luther King, Jr. got killed - then he couldn't have gotten to the hotel where he was shot. It could have happened the week Eric Clapton's son died - then the Claptons would have had their hotel balcony door shut (and he wouldn't have written that cursed "Tears In Heaven" song that we hear 482 times a day on the radio). It could have prevented Buddy Holly's fatal plane trip and changed rock-and-roll, it could have prevented Stevie Ray Vaughn's fatal helicopter trip and changed the world of blues guitar, it could have prevented Sam Kinison's fatal car trip and... well, maybe he would have gotten funny. It could have prevented Richard Nixon's parents from meeting and saved America a lot of grief. It could have delayed the launch of the space shuttle Challenger and spared us a national tragedy. It could have canceled my third grade field trip to the zoo where I got lost and the bus left me and I had to call a cab and the taxi driver threatened to kill me if I didn't pay him when I was only nine years old. It could have inspired moving songs, meaningful poetry, exquisite sculptures, beautiful paintings. This storm had the power and potential to affect great historical change, to cause the spiritual liberation of untold numbers of troubled men and women, to change the very face of our nation and make the world a better place!

But nooooo... apparently God's highest priority is that I not get a tan.

But, when life gets me down, I just remember the wise words of my great-great-grandfather as he sat on his porch, rocking in his old chair, whittling contentedly, enjoying the calm peace of a quiet sunset, the wisdom of his long experience reflected in his aged eyes:

"A-humph, hack, hack, (sound of fossilized mucus being coughed up)... ptooie! Hot damn, boy, did you see that one? It almost cleared the sidewalk!"

Peace, love, and Ben & Jerry's Chocolate Chip Cookie Dough ice cream, y'all. Smell you next time.

Bonniers visit COOL conference

by Jon Peters
Staff Writer

Some Bonner scholars and several other Maryville College Students attended the ninth annual Cooperative Outreach Opportunity League (COOL) conference at the University of Illinois in Champaign Urbana the last weekend in March. COOL is an umbrella organization which helps activist and community service oriented organizations become more unified and effective.

The conference consisted of many workshops, speakers and activities which addressed a wide range of topics. The intent was to share leadership and organizational ideas on environmental, social, humanitarian and political student community service. The workshops presented significantly diverse ideas, but everyone was united in a common goal—solving today's problems. The excitement and dedication of the people there was the most striking thing about the conference. Briana Brugner described the mood of the conference by commenting that "passion was the key word."

The genuine enthusiasm of the people at the conference came as a shock to at least one MC student. He thought that the conference was going to be a WASP charity benefit, with the purpose of turning the "public eye" in their favor for selfish reasons. He expected to see futile things like bake sale fund raisers for starving children in Zambubu, or wherever, in order to get people to think them charitable. Instead he found a group of open-minded, passionately interested people who were actually working towards solving today's problems.

Many students, including Teyo Tyree, had a favorite speaker, Alexis Baptist. Teyo described her as, "a quiet, meek and tender looking black female." But rather than speaking about her experiences working with inner city children, like he expected, she got up and, "yelled, screamed, and bitched," about a program designed to involve young people in solving today's problems. Her speech was revolutionary, exciting, and to a certain extent, effective.

Another favorite was a presentation called "Address Unknown" by a group of homeless, traveling actors. They did skits about real life experiences performed from the perspective of the homeless. It seemed to be an emotional experience for the actors as well as the audience, as some of both cried during the performance. As a result of the dramatization, some MC students' perspectives on the homeless shifted from apathy to understanding.

Other things that the Maryville students experienced included an eye-opening child abuse workshop, an environmental office where workers joined to alleviate problems, and a Habitat for Humanity conference. Habitat for Humanity is an organization that builds low income housing for needy people.

Perhaps the most amusing part of the COOL conference was a community plunge expedition which was led by David Monk, an Australian who has devoted his life to saving prairie land. David Monk spends his life traveling around, trying to save prairies. One of the things he does to preserve prairie land is to burn them, which allows them to seed, and kills trees and other unwanted plants growing in the areas. David Monk also gives talks arguing that prairies can play a helpful role in agricultural and medical research. It was interesting to some MC students that this man knows and cares so much about the grass that grows next to interstates—something few others are even conscious of. But, then, raising awareness and doing something about it was the entire point of the COOL conference.

RACISM

does occur, it may seem more the exception than the rule.

What are the effects of these groupings on campus? Is the segregation all voluntary? Are there students who would like to cross the boundaries of segregation but who are unable to do so?

Lisa Hill, a senior engineering major, commented that there "probably are" segregated groups on campus which are particularly noticeable in the cafeteria, but she said that group boundaries are not difficult to cross with people she knows. Furthermore, Hill stated that she has not noticed racism in the classroom or the campus in general. "I'm sure there is (racism), but I haven't sensed it, encountered it," Hill said.

Hill did suggest, however, that the different groups do sometimes foster stereotypes. "Once," Hill said, "when we were watching music videos, the person (I was with) assumed I could dance like Janet Jackson."

Willingham seemed to notice a more extensive tendency to stereotype. When asked if he thought some groups developed stereotypes of other groups, Willingham, who plays basketball for the Scots, said, "Definitely, oh, yeah, definitely. ... of Black males, especially. People assume they're athletes. You don't hear professors or students asking them about academics or politics. ... It's 'how's the team' or 'good game.'"

"We (African Americans) don't feel that it's our responsibility to break those stereotypes; it's the other guy's. ... In defense of MC, there are people really trying to break those stereotypes—Marcia Gibson, Sue Wyatt," Willingham added.

Marcia Gibson of Student Development commented on stereotypes: "Many people have many assumptions about people who are different from them. When a person who happens to be white has never been friends with or been exposed to a person who's Black, they tend to base their knowledge on what they've seen in the media, on TV, or what they've heard from their families, friends, or peer group.

"Unfortunately, much of the time that information is inaccurate, and unless the individual attempts to learn about people on their own, they continue to foster those beliefs."

Does the existence of stereotypes and misconceptions mean that there is a racial problem on campus?

Representative voices of the campus community seem to think not, at least not in the same way that other communities have heated racial problems.

"Until all people are sensitive and open to relationships with people who are different from them, we'll continue to have racism, homophobia, sexism. ..."

—Marcia Gibson

Willingham commented that "MC is a microcosm," and just as there is a general problem with racism in America and the world, "there's racism on campus. ... (But) it's more concentrated. ... Everything that happens seems more intense."

"I don't want to give the college a bad name by giving specific examples," Willingham said, "but there have been incidents. ... (However), I've had some good times here. ... And for as many incidents that have given me a negative experience, there've been positive experiences."

Gibson said, "Last year we did have a few incidents which could be classified as racially based. This year, we haven't had any cases, to my knowledge, which have had a racial base to them. That doesn't mean it hasn't happened."

Cummings said, "There's tension between individuals. I don't feel that racism is a huge problem—like there's going to be a riot any minute. I don't feel that there are many people here who are racist. ... There are a few."

Rodriguez explained that isolated incidents can lead to general impressions of racism because of the group associations. "When there are some racist persons—people with racist attitudes—within the group, Anglo-Americans/Caucasian Americans as a group look racist, and the minority thinks they're all racist," Rodriguez said.

"There is a problem," Gibson said, "I'd be ignorant to say there's not a problem. Until all people are sensitive and open to relationships with people who are different from them, we'll continue to have racism, homophobia, sexism. ... What I'm talking about is fear, fear of the unknown. I see the whole thing tied to people believing and assuming what they've been taught to be true, rather than seeking out answers to their own questions. I'm pleased to say that at this time we don't have the level of problem other campuses do. I think we have a unique campus in terms of individuals being willing to participate with individuals different from themselves."

"From what I've heard of other schools," Willingham said, "we're one of the better. ... Hopefully we'll continue to reduce racism here on campus."

Rodriguez suggested how that is possible: "I think that it boils down to respect, to respecting the individual. I think for a long time—even until today—different cultures have not been respected. ... People identify with the group. There's strength in numbers and I respect that. I promote that. But don't put someone down because they're of a different group. And that goes beyond race. For instance, ... if one person's a Christian and the other's a Muslim or Buddhist, there should be a respect for each other's religion just as in race relations, if one person's an African American, another is a Hispanic American and yet the third is European American, there should be a mutual respect for each other's cultures."

MC develops student leaders

by Jennifer Tucker
Staff Writer

MC expects more of its presidential and dean scholars this academic year, according to David Powell, who coordinates the leadership program for presidential and dean scholars.

The change springs from the scholarship committee's realization that the presidential and dean scholars were leaving Maryville College with the exceptional GPAs but that it was questionable whether the graduates had actually achieved their full potential as leaders.

"Leadership Challenge began this year to help produce leaders on campus through Presidential and Dean scholars," Powell said.

"More people are becoming socially conscious and are becoming more involved to help others," Powell said.

Powell stated that he believes that greater community involvement is due to the increased awareness of social responsibility: "America has become aware that we are responsible for taking care of all the problems. Nothing can replace individual and local involvement."

Rev. Stephen Nickle explained that Maryville is for students to develop leadership skills. "We are not in a crisis situation for leadership at Maryville," Nickle said.

Nickle added that becoming a leader is easy if the desire is there. "People can make it happen. When there are perceived needs, leadership is taken," he said.

Chris Rapp, co-chairperson for the Student Programming Board, said, "There are lots of leaders on this campus and lots of followers; I'm glad we have followers along with the leaders, because everyone cannot be a leader."

Environmental advocates offer advice for individuals

by Mary Rose Slaughter
Staff Writer

Many students may wonder how a single individual can help clean up the environment. David Powell, instructor in English at MC, offered advice on how to begin tackling the environmental problem.

Powell said that to change the world for the better each individual must: 1) admit there is a problem, 2) get educated about the problem, 3) change habits making the environmental slogan "Refuse. Reuse. Reduce. Recycle," an intimate part of life, and 4) GET INVOLVED!

The first step is defining the nature of the problem; there must be a problem to solve before a course can be set to change the world.

The next step is to get educated about the problem. What are the options? What can an individual, a small business, an industry do?

Almost daily, articles can be found in newspapers, in magazines, in the book stores, on the radio and on the television containing information about the environment. These articles cover a wide variety of topics from hints on environmental shopping, to creative ways to save the earth, to an in-depth analysis on the effects of ozone depletion on the environment of our planet.

"Once you have committed yourself to making the world a better place to live, you will find many surprisingly easy ways of accomplishing that goal."

—Sue Dawson

Powell recommends many books and magazines to increase understanding of the environment. "Buzzworm" and "Garbage" are two of the magazines. Good sources to consult first are books by the Earth Works Group and a book by Benjamin Goldman called The Truth About Where You Live, he said. Powell urged those interested to contact him at box 2824 for a reading list.

Local sources include the chamber of commerce, the area Keep America Beautiful (KAB) affiliate, and the local chapters of national environmental organizations.

Sue Dawson, coordinator for Beautiful Blount, Inc., the KAB affiliate in Blount County, said she can provide other useful information and ways to become involved. Dawson has teacher resource materials as well as information for the general public such as a directory of local recycling opportunities.

"Once you have committed yourself to making the world a better place to live, you will find many surprisingly easy ways of accomplishing that goal," Dawson said.

Changing personal habits is one way of helping to save the environment. Dr. George F. Smith, professor in resource development with the University of Tennessee Agricultural Extension Service, suggests that consumers can reduce the amount of waste thrown away by "enviroshopping."

Some things he suggests one do when shopping:

- Consider whether you need something before buying.
- Think about what will happen to the product or package after you no longer need it.
- Try to reuse items you already have instead of throwing them away and buying new ones.

• Consider what wastes were created in the manufacture of the items you buy.

- Use recycling facilities in your area.
- Purchase recycled items.
- Shop at second-hand stores or garage sales.
- Donate old clothes and other items for further use.
- Use dishcloths or sponges, not disposable paper products.

• Use disposable items such as batteries and plastic razors only when absolutely necessary. When possible, choose longer-lasting alternatives.

- Use cloth shopping bags rather than paper or plastic.
- Use mugs or cups at work or school rather than disposables.
- Buy concentrates and mix the product.
- Use less toxic substitutes for cleaning and household maintenance.

• Compost food waste rather than put it into the trash can.

• Try to think of creative ways to reuse items rather than to dispose of them.

• Talk to store managers about stocking bulk products to avoid excessive packaging.

• Express your opinion to manufacturers about "built-in-obsolence."

• Write to government officials and leaders to express your concerns about the need to produce less wasteful products.

• Read consumer articles to find out about the quality and durability of the products you buy.

"Don't just recycle your recyclables," said Dawson. "That is only part of the solution. You must close the loop by buying recycled products." Dawson said that if recycled products were not bought by the consumer, then there would be no need to recycle.

The final step in changing the world is to become involved. Powell says there are many good causes and organizations out there but too many to be a part of all of them. Powell suggested choosing one cause or area of concern and pursuing the necessary means to accomplish it.

The March snowstorm split this tree located between Anderson and Fayerweather.

Replacing lost trees may require years

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

On the eve of the very beginning of Maryville College's 1993 spring break, the most powerful storm in a century swept across the Southeast, the East Coast and up into Canada. The storm brought massive record accumulations of snowfall, with reports of Mt. LeConte catching a full 64 inches with 9-foot snowdrifts. Hellish winds ransacked much of the Southeast. With the hurricane force winds went thousands of trees and parts of trees, littering the South. Maryville College has suffered an enormous amount of tree damage, with the numbers and cost still unknown a month after the storm.

Andy McCall, chief of physical plant operations and coordinator of clean-up efforts, said "most of the trees damaged were the cedars, evergreens ... and white pines." McCall mentioned that the cedars were the most hard hit. All over campus, familiar trees which have taken decades to reach their form are missing major limbs, twisted in one or more directions, or have completely collapsed.

McCall explained that the weight of the snow caused all of the damage: "They (the trees) sustained the sheer weight of 20 inches of snowfall in the eight to ten-hour period."

Luckily, no buildings were damaged by the snow-laden trees.

Several students who had to stay on campus until Monday due to the storm reported watching the snow fall and hearing the trees groan and crack.

Even though the campus was the most visible in damage, the college woods suffered an enormous amount of damage. The Mountain Challenge ropes course also suffered some damage.

The amount of downed trees and branches is so extensive that shredders have been rented to recycle the foliage into mulch. The wood will also be used to provide firewood. A large pile of collected debris lies in the entrance to the football field, awaiting the shredder.

McCall mentioned that the college budget allows for 25 new trees to be planted per year. The number lost after the storm will not be completely replaced for several years. The size and maturity of the trees lost and damaged will take decades for the new trees to reach.

McCall said "We always try to plant natives," referring to the native trees of the area. He also said that several trees growing now will be relocated to replace fallen trees.

"The trees (on campus) are getting quite a bit of age," noted McCall. He referred to a void in tree-planting around ten years ago which has left the college with a generation gap in its tall foliage. Hopefully, according to McCall "the old ones will hold on until the young ones can grow (to strength)."

He said of the storm's effects, "(there was) a tremendous volume of wood waste created."

On Sat., Apr. 3, volunteers gathered at Crawford House to help clear the hiking paths and the ropes courses within the college woods and on campus. There was a large turnout, with the group splitting into four divisions and cutting up debris and piling it for maintenance crews to pick up.

Stadium certification expires; funding sought for new facility

by John Morgan
Staff Writer

Is it true that the fighting Scots could be running onto Honaker Field next season with new facilities?

In 1990 FAMCO Engineering recertified the stands along Honaker Field for a period of two years, and now that certification has expired.

Athletic Director Randy Lambert stated very simply, "At some point in time, we're going to have a new stadium; the question is, when?" Fund-raising, mostly through private donations are the source from which Maryville College hopes to acquire $250,000 to build a new facility modeled after another located in Halifax Co. VA. "We've got the blueprints and know what we want to do. Our football program deserves a first-class facility," said Lambert.

Outside of renovations it is estimated that the original structure has been there since the mid-1940's. "The only thing I know is that it has been there too long," Lambert said. "We're hoping to have a new structure completed by Sept. 2."

"At some point in time, we're going to have a new stadium; the question is, when?"

—Randy Lambert

Other cost-consuming options that may take place in the event that the new stadium is not completed in time for next season's home opener are to play at another facility or renovate and recertify the existing structure.

When asked about the possibility of these scenarios taking place, Lambert's response was "not likely, but it could be just as good of a time with green grass and lawn chairs!"

A view from behind the condemned Honaker Field football stadium reveals the peeling paint and dilapidated wooden frame of the press box.

Junior Nicole Boop hurls a pitch as she did for all of the 1993 Lady Scots' softball games. With only three pitchers on the team, coach Kandis Schram assigned most of the throwing responsibilities to Boop who said that she had been prepared to pitch back-to-back games: "We talked about it a lot last year, so it was something that I expected. I feel really comfortable about it."

Only ten players donned the orange and garnet for Maryville in 1993, and Dena Godsey of Seymour was the lone senior. Coach Schram naturally shows interest in having a larger squad, but the main reason for expanding the roster in the future is pitching.

Besides their limited roster, the team also had to deal with bad weather at the season's outset. The Lady Scots got off to a "soggy" start with many games rained out and postponed. They finished with a record of 1-9.

Local Amnesty chapter hosts concert

The Maryville College chapter of Amnesty International hosted a benefit concert featuring Smokin' Dave, the Blenders, Barbed Wire Sheila, Steve Britton, Terry Hill and Scott Miller.

Amnesty International is an organization dedicated to the worldwide end of the abuse of human rights and to the release of prisoners of conscience. Money raised at the concert will be used to fund local letter writing campaigns and to pay dues to the national organization.

The benefit was held in conjunction with the Amnesty International chapter at UTK.

The concert was May 5 at Flamingo's (above what was formerly Arnold's) on Kingston Pike. The concert began at 9 p.m. There was a $3 cover charge.

Blister begins tradition

By Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

On Sat. April 17, the Student Programming Board presented Blister in the Sun, a band and activities festival which took place on Honaker Field. Four groups performed between 12 p.m. and 7 p.m. These were 13th Generation, an alternative band, and Impulse Ride, which performs rock. Impulse Ride has played at Maryville College previously with a positive student response, according to Edward Levan, a member of the Student Programming Board.

Many college organizations and outside businesses sponsored booths and fundraising activities. Some of these included the LEC, which sold T-shirts, and the Sign Language Club, which sold posters. InterVarsity Christian Fellowship set up a "jail", in which friends could be incarcerated for a fee. Members of IVCF sold "warrants" for the brief (15 minute) "arrest" of a favorite person. The warrants cost $1.00 and were served by the person buying them, according to Heather Peterson, IVCF member. Copeland Hall sponsored a dunking booth, and Chickfilet and Subway sold food. The Student Programming Board sold commemorative T-shirts for $5.

Blister in the Sun was free to all students with a college ID and $2 to all others.

Senior and freshman honor societies induct new members

Alpha Gamma Sigma Honor Scholarship Society of Maryville College inducted 14 new members in a ceremony held Apr. 15 at the Music Hall of the Fine Arts Center. The new members include 13 students of the class of 1993 and one member of the class of 1994. The seniors are: Kerri Lynne Kidd, David King, Marcelete Lloyd Ailor, Kristi Kennedy, Terri Vichich, Cindy Huffstetler, Michelle Hall, and Jessica Roitman. Briana Brugner, with the highest scholastic average of the Class of 1994, was the one junior inducted. Jennifer Danner of the class of 1993 was inducted last year as a junior. New members of the society signed their names to a fifty-nine-year-old ledger containing the signatures of all society members since the organization's found-composed of student members, faculty members who were inducted into membership as students at Maryville College, and faculty who are members of Phi Beta Kappa. Alpha Gamma Sigma elects its members following Phi Beta Kappa criteria, with new student membership limited to 10 percent of the candidates for the Bachelor of Arts degree in that year.

The MC chapter of National Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society for Freshman held its initiation at the same time. The following freshmen were inducted: Deena Leigh Clark, Nadia Edoh, Kevin Ernsberger, Jeannie M. Brey, Kelly Garrison, Ticca S. Hartsfield, Rebecca A. Hicker, Scott W. Hitch, Joshua D. Hogan, Kristin M. Kant, Treva L. Lewis, Christen E. McCammon, Megan A. Miller, John Scott Powell, Kristi D. ## Alpine Tower helping others reach new highs by David Picard and

Karen Beaty
Staff writer and Editor

On June 16, 17, and 18 of this summer, Crawford House added a new addition to the Maryville College campus. If you have missed the obvious, the Alpine Tower is now being utilized by various student groups, inquiry/orientation classes, and some off-campus organizations. About 450 people in total have used the facility.

Designed by Outward Bound, it stands 60 feet, and is one of 33 towers of its kind built in the world. The Crawford House version has another distinguishing feature—it's one of three in the world which is accessible to the physically challenged.

The tower features obstacles called the birth canal, the bean stalk, the missing link, the corporate ladder, the wild woosey, the "see" saw, and the swing, to name just a few. Following Crawford House philosophy, the object of any Mountain Challenge course is to encourage individual or group goal-setting, be it reaching the top or climbing mid-way.

Crawford House staff knows of 33 ways to climb the Alpine Tower. With six "faces," six individuals can climb at one time. Safety is of a top concern. If six people were climbing, there would be at least six belayers on the ground, according to Jeff Huffman, Crawford House staff member. Outward Bound School officials will check the tower at least three times a year, to ensure structural stability, and equipment quality. Also, Crawford House staff went through intensive training before school began.

Because it is isolated and free-standing, the "life expectancy" of the tower is 15 years, much longer than courses that are built in tree tops.

In previous years, Crawford House had to rely on the facilities of Wesley Woods, a Methodist church camp in Townsend. Building the Alpine Tower not only makes that dependence unnecessary, it will also save Crawford House money. Students and staff who have climbed the tower, have described it as "exhilarating," and "a great team builder." Adventures on the Alpine Tower are open campus-wide on October 30 and November 13. Sign-up with Crawford House is necessary. Dial extension 8125 for sign-up or for more information.

Gibson — "We Can Make it Happen"

by Jeff Huffmann
Assistant Editor

On October 23, 1993, Maryville College inaugurates its new president, Dr. Gerald W. Gibson. Gibson takes the reigns from Dr. Mark Ebersole, who served as interim president following Dr. Richard I.

Ferrin's resignation in 1992.

Gibson, chosen by the College Board of Directors in January, actively assumed his job on July 1.

Gibson served in his last occupation as Vice President and Dean of Roanoke College in Salem, Virginia for nine years. While at the College, he helped the school's faculty initiate and cultivate a new general education curriculum that gained national recognition and strong student support. Gibson also used his expertise in institutional financial matters and strategic planning at Roanoke. Gibson graduated with the highest honors from Wofford College in 1959 and continued on to the University of Tennessee, gaining his Doctorate in Organic Chemistry in 1963. He later enrolled in the Institute for Educational Management at Harvard University in 1983.

Security beef-up is aim of administration

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

Many of the residents of Maryville College perceive this institution to be a utopian society. We have our own post office, convenience store, clothing store, and version of the police. It seems as if the entire campus is self-sufficient and the outside world, including Blount County, does not affect Maryville. Recent events have changed this utopian perspective that has long been characteristic the students on this campus. Steps are now being taken to make our lives at Maryville College as safe as possible.

The newly appointed director of residence life, Stephanie Wyatt (no relation to Dr. Sue Wyatt), believes that "students should feel safe, but also aware of their surroundings," meaning that we should not count out the possibilities of people coming to this campus and threatening our "perfect little world."

Wyatt, along with the other Student Development staff, feel that improvements can be made to "beef up" security on campus. Dr. Wyatt agrees that the campus as a whole could "do better" when it comes to security. "Safety will be a major focus for the 93-94 year," she said.

The expansion of Maryville College's security systems is already under way. Lights from the roof of Lloyd Hall now illuminate the sidewalk from Gamble to Davis. Currently, the Student Development staff is looking into several other options in which to improve the safety of the residence halls, including a 24-hour lock of all doors to residence halls with phones being placed outside for visitors. Issuing identification cards to open locked doors is also being discussed by administration. The use of ID cards excites Cathy Pounders-Cate, the director of student programs. "It will lead to several other options," she said. "The use of ID cards could also be used for credit and may eliminate the use for money in the bookstore and the snack bar."

Although there have been no commitments and no timeline has been given as to when or if these changes will go into effect, the outcome will likely alter resident life.

Activity Fair

On September 7, most of MC's many organizations and clubs came out to recruit new members for the new academic year at the Activity Fair. Tibo Katambwa shows interest in the Student Senate as Lance Klosterman informs and Jenny Cummings watches on. The Activity Fair was one of the successful projects of the new Activities Coordinator, Anne Beconsall. For more on Beconsall, see the story on page 3.

MC gets funds to improve literacy

printed with the permission of the Daily Times

Congressman John J. Duncan, Jr. announced Tuesday that the United States Department of Education has awarded a four-year grant to Maryville College for $24,865 for the first two semesters.

The grant will be used for the new Student Literacy and Corps Program at Maryville College. A primary goal is to teach those participating in the program how they can serve the community at large by improving the literacy skills of disadvantaged children and adults.

The program will incorporate tutor training and practice into an academic course designed around literacy. The goal is to improve the research, writing and critical thinking skills of approximately 20 undergraduate students each semester.

The students participating in the program will receive both on-campus and off-campus training. The off-campus component allows students to work as tutors in conjunction with community educators in order to receive hands-on training.

"I am pleased to see federal grant money focusing on the important issue of literacy in our society," Congressman Duncan said. "I think this program has the potential to make a real difference for many of our residents."

The program will aim to enhance students' sensitivity to community literacy needs and help foster the students' sense of personal responsibility to care for the community by assisting in meeting those needs.

Carnegie gets new lease on life in '93

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

Carnegie Residence Hall got a new lease on life this September. Students and staff have been looking forward to its reopening since it was condemned in 1970. Many events will be taking place during Homecoming Week to help celebrate Carnegie's restoration.

On Wednesday, September 29, Carnegie will have a History Night, beginning at 8:30 p.m. Alumni who lived in Carnegie will come and share their experiences from when they lived there. Dr. Sarah McNiell, Associate Professor of History, will speak.

The dedication of Profitt Parlor, in honor of Dr. Jim and the late Ruth Profitt, college alumni and generous contributors to Maryville College will take place on Friday, October 1, at 7:30 p.m. Jenni McCafferty, president of the Student Senate, will be speaking at this event.

Carnegie will be dedicated on Saturday, October 2, at 10:30 a.m. Dr. Gibson, the new MC president, will give the welcome, and Jenny Cummings, a Maryville College junior, will be among the speakers. From 10 to 11:30 a.m. Carnegie students who have volunteered will open their rooms for viewing by interested persons. Everyone in the Maryville community is invited to Carnegie's Dedication.

The restoration of Carnegie was paid totally from donations and gifts pursued specifically for that purpose. No part of any student's tuition was used in the rebuilding process, according to Ellie Morrow, Director of Development. The total raised for the project as of September 16 was $3,464,291, which exceeded the college's expectations by over $80,000.

The final phase of fund raising included the Carnegie Commemorative Walk, the brick sidewalk leading to the front steps of Carnegie. For a fee, a person can have a brick placed in the walk with the name and class year (if applicable) of alumni, friends, employees or their children, and faculty. For example, a brick has been donated in the memory of Harvey "Butch" Crabtree Jr., class of 1969, who was the only college alumni killed in the Vietnam War.

Almost all of the construction has been completed, and the remainder is scheduled to be completed by the Saturday of Homecoming week. According to Mark Cate, Carnegie Residence Director, problems involving construction have been kept to a minimum, and the students have been extremely patient and mature in handling the ongoing construction.

He said that living in Carnegie has been a unique experience. He says that what is different about this residence hall is the apartment style atmosphere due to the suite room arrangement which involves less sharing of bathrooms and greater access to kitchenettes. Cate is struck by the beauty of the building. He says that the challenge for him and the students, both now and in the future, "is to maintain the beauty it possesses right now." He is not the only person who feels that way. Sue Wyatt, Vice President for Student Development, said "I think it's one of the finest combinations of restoration and redesign I've seen in college housing in twenty-five years of experience."

Edward Levan, a senior living in Carnegie, said "We don't think Carnegie is any better than any of the other residents halls. We feel lucky to be living here, and we want to take care of the building as much as possible. We want other students to come visit and enjoy Carnegie as well."

New faces bring new life to Student Development

by Aaron Stone
Staff Writer

Maryville College has acquired new staff in some of our residence halls. The new resident director in Copeland Hall is Anne Becconsall. In addition to her job as resident director, she is also coordinator of student activity. Becconsall, throughout her college years, actively participated in resident life in her residence hall. While attending Eastern Connecticut University, she was not only a residence hall association senator, but was named outstanding senator. In addition, she was Bates West Resident hall president where she received the recognition of being named outstanding president.

Becconsall stated, "My goal at Copeland is for everyone in the hall to respect the individual."

She sees this as a challenge for the students. She also wants to seek and understand the student.

Anne likes her environment here at Maryville College.

"It's exciting. You can see a lot more happen at smaller schools."

Other characteristics of the college that Anne admired are the idea of students being more involved in policy making decisions, the experiential learning courses the college offers during the January term, the fact that students are more involved in the campus life and policy making at Maryville (student senate and judiciary board), the population, and the beautiful mountains nearby.

Becconsall looks forward to working with her staff and coordinating activities she hopes students of Maryville College will enjoy.

Becconsall: "You can see a lot more happen at smaller schools"

Tucson: "The position I have at Maryville College allows me to reach out to people."

by Ayesha Dastgir
Staff Writer

Davis Hall has a new role model in the guise of Gwen Tucson. To many of us who have met and talked to her she does not come across as a typical role model. She is young and looks pretty much like any other student on campus. What sets her apart are the facts that she is a graduate of University of Pennsylvania with a Bachelor's degree in Psychology and a member of the Peace Corps. She is the new Resident Director of Davis and Associate Director of Volunteer Services.

Being a young professional in the College, she is a role model whether she wants to be one or not and is "aware of being a role model." But she views herself to be more of an "educator" than anything. Her positions have helped her to be part to the process of helping students through volunteers, Resident Assistants or help in getting residents of Davis to where they want to go. "The position I have at Maryville College allows me to reach out to people i.e., educators, senior citizens, 'normal everyday people'." An opportunity to educate people might not be directly from me but from the people around me. I am setting the stage for education opportunities that are not considered traditional i.e., including being an RD and an Associate Director of Volunteer Services."

Three factors motivated Gwen to join the Peace Corps. These included the idea of the frontier, living in a cultural community other than the US, and a place where you can make a difference.

Wyatt: "I'd like living on campus to be something people want to do and not just that they're required to."

Gwen spent two years as part of the Peace Corps in Botswana, Africa. She found the place to be "shocking" yet "fascinating". Part of the reason was the educational system. The teachers who were the educators in Botswana, were educated and trying to make a difference. Unfortunately, some of these teachers belonged to the minority groups in their local community and faced lack of trust in the community; there were also differences between the generations.

Having been brought up in New Hampshire, her first impressions of Maryville College were positive. When she came for her interview in mid-June this summer, she felt "welcomed by the staff and students I met".

by Kristin Johnson
Staff Writer

Among the many new faculty and staff faces this year comes Stephanie Wyatt, the new Director of Residence Life at Maryville College. Originally from Huntsville, Alabama, Wyatt most recently attended Appalachian State University in Boone, North Carolina where she received her masters degree in Student Development while working as a Residence Director there.

On her decision to come to Maryville College, Wyatt said, "I had been on a lot of campuses, and this is the first place I really felt a fit."

She went on to say she enjoys the atmosphere and friendliness of a small college like Maryville. Wyatt was also impressed with the fact that although the college is based on tradition, it is also "willing to move with the times and make some changes."

As Director of Residence Life, Wyatt will concern herself solely with the residence halls and their occupants. She has many goals, the most important being improving security. Wyatt is currently looking into more lighting around campus, telephones outside the residence halls, and 24 hour locks on residence hall doors.

She also seems genuinely concerned with the happiness of the occupants of the halls. Her list of priorities included making the residence halls a more desirable place to live. She said, "Eventually, I'd like living on campus to be something people want to do and not just that they're required to."

GIBSON

Gibson's talent in poetry won him a nomination for a book award in 1992. He enrolled in a writing residency at the Institute for Education Management at Harvard University in the Summer of 1990.

Professionally, Gibson worked as an information chemist for the US Army Chemical Research and Development Laboratories at Edgewood Arsenal, Maryland. He later became a Chemistry Professor in his native state at the College of Charleston, South Carolina.

A member of numerous academic associations, Gibson authored his book "Good Start: A Guidebook for New Faculty in Liberal Arts Colleges" last year along with other articles on college administration and works concerning Organic Chemistry.

The tenth President of Maryville College, he leads MC into its 175th anniversary.

"I'm very impressed with the students I had contact with," Gibson said, noting his first contact with MC students was in a student senate dinner in February.

Gibson described his impressions of the students as "mature in their outlook, who act out of principle... the students are serious."

Gibson commented on the amount of input he has received from the student body that there was "not input in any formal sense."

Gibson mentioned most of the student feedback he received came from the Student Senate. "But, there really hasn't been a lot of input," he added.

"A president never has a normal day," Gibson remarked. His usual day begins at a few minutes before 8 a.m. Coffee at arm's length, he reviews the day's schedule in his calendar, all appointments having been reserved more than a week in advance. He normally has an average of six meetings a day, not including cabinet meetings. The meetings usually last from 45 minutes to an hour. Drop-ins also accompany his busy itinerary in between meetings.

A large part of his itinerary is also off-campus. "Part of my job is to work with people in the community. We depend on them."

Gibson earmarked two outstanding qualities of Maryville College: the faculty and alumni.

He praised "the attitude of the faculty... there are high values on collegiality, civility and cooperation."

"On other campuses, the tendency is... they tend to be difficult to deal with," said Gibson.

Gibson also pointed to a distinctive alumni. "They love this place... their spirit is just extraordinary."

Gibson commented on Maryville College as a whole, "I fit the institution, the institution fits me."

"There's a lot of potential here," he said, emphasizing his desire for the community to see "just what a great place this college is... I want this to be known as the best college around here anywhere. We can make it happen."

President Gerald W. Gibson

Isaac's renovated — under new management

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

During the 1993 spring semester many changes were made at Maryville College.

The brick walk beside Anderson was replaced with a concrete sidewalk, the rebuilding of Carnegie was in full swing and the commuter's lounge in Fayerweather was redecorated. The summer brought about an even bigger change in Fayerweather; Isaac's received an attitude adjustment. Until last year, Isaac's was a snack bar type business ran by the Marriott corporation, who also operate the dining hall. The change was brought about by a series of meetings held between students and Student Development. Requests were made for a convenient type store on campus. Vice President of Student Development Sue Wyatt and others met with Marriott to discuss the situation. It was decided that the college would take over Isaac's, leaving Mariot free to concentrate on the dining hall in Pearsons.

The college approached Beth Stuart, who also runs the bookstore, to manage Isaac's. She accepted on the grounds that she could make changes and changes she made. The store was cleaned out and entirely redone. The floor was repaired and the walls received a new paint job. Shelves were built and machines were brought to achieve the convenient store look that was the goal. Over five thousand dollars was spent giving Isaac's a new image. Student response indicates that the change was a smashing success. Beth Stuart remarked that of all the comments she has had, only two have been negative and one of those was "I liked it the way it was."

When asked how the store was doing, Beth said that so far the school was breaking even. Her expectations for Isaac's first year are, "we don't expect to make a profit the first year, if we break even we'll be happy." Several students commented positively of what they thought of the change.

If Beth would still take over Isaac's knowing all she knows now, she responded immediately, "yes, I'm having a great time." She did admit to being tired at the end of the day, but she is excited with the future of Isaac's.

Some may have noticed that recently Isaac's received a television. Beth said a videocassette recorder had already been ordered and is on the way.

More changes are planned as the store begins to make money. One idea is to put a door between the store and the other part of Isaac's, so that the other part could be left open late for student use. Beth said that she would keep the store open later now if she thought students would take advantage of the increased hours. "We need student response, she stated, we encourage students to make suggestions."

The store's hours are Monday through Thursday 8 a.m. to 9:30 p.m., Friday 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Friday October 1, Isaac's will have a super grand opening. From 8 to 10 a.m. 10% off all breakfast goods, 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. 10% off all sandwiches and from 1 to 5 p.m. 10% off all Colombo yogurt. In addition fountain Coke products are 25 cents all day long and door prizes will be given away. Isaac's will be open for Homecoming from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday, October 2.

New members, new issues presented to Senate

by Sharon Graves
Staff Writer

Student senate is an organization that aids in campus governance and is composed of student-elected representatives. The senators represent the various classes, residence halls, and commuting students. The new members of senate are Aaron Stone (Freshman Pres.), Clint Wright (Freshman Vice-Pres.), Kerry O'Keefe (Freshman Sec./Treas.), and Laura Dunn, Bishop Moore, Beth Nuchols, Tiffany Rudicill, and Geoff Vinson (Freshman Senators). There are also new senate representatives from each residence hall.

The president of this organization for the 1993-1994 school year is senior Jenni McCafferty. The main three issues that the senate will be covering this year are the proposal for a new smoking policy, the covenant, and the Maryville College 2000 plan. "The main focus of student senate this year will be the covenant. The covenant will be something that will be a part of Maryville College for years to come. Hopefully, this covenant will have students develop more respect for the individual, and to teach them to become more responsible adults. The student senate would like to see this document developed, and placed in front of the student handbook," stated McCafferty. In asking McCafferty what was her main personal goal for student senate this year, she replied, "The most important thing for me is the covenant. I feel it is important to help one another become responsible adults."

The smoking policy will also be another important issue dealt with by senate. "The campus is looking toward a smoke-free environment by the end of December 1993," stated Cathy Cate. Cate, director of student programming, is actively involved in judicial proceedings, all senate committees, and senate itself. "Senate will be talking about the steps it needs to take in implementing this policy in the residence halls and Isaacs. This is going to be a long drawn out process trying to get everyone into agreement. Overall, it is going to be a very difficult issue to deal with. The federal guidelines on smoking will guide us in the decisions that we make regarding this policy," stated Cate.

Other than the smoking policy, the Maryville College 2000 plan will also be covered. This plan involves the president of the college, Dr. Gerald Gibson. The senate hopes to replace the Vision 1994 plan with the Maryville College 2000 plan. This project will focus more on "accessing the needs of Maryville College, and where the school will end up in the year 2000," stated McCafferty. For instance, the construction of new buildings will be considered.

In addition to student senate, the disciplinary review board is run by students. It consists of one representative from each residence hall and one commuter representative. This board reviews incident reports submitted by students, faculty, or staff members. The board then reviews the reports to determine if there is enough evidence to hear the case, dismiss it, or refer it to the judicial board. The student senate and the disciplinary review board have both acquired newly elected members for the 1993-1994 school year. The new members of the disciplinary review board are Terrell Alexander (Gamble), Jeremy Blevins (Lloyd), Johnny Gordon (Carnegie), Angela McClellmore (Commuter), Chris Rapp (Pearsons), Sarah Stevenson (Davis), and Eric Stone (Copeland).

Both of these student run bodies in one way or another aid in creating campus policies and ensuring that campus policies are followed by each and every individual who is a part of the Maryville College campus.

The senate's next meeting will be on September 30, at 12:30 p.m. in Sutton Science, room 113. These meetings are open to any individual who wishes to attend after the September 30th meeting. They will meet every other week thereafter.

Friedlander featured at FAC Gallery

Ann Ruth Eisenberg Friedlander was born and raised in Englewood, NJ. She has a BFA in Book Illustration from Parsons School of Design and a Masters of Professional Studies in Art Therapy from Pratt Institute. She also graduated from The Psychoanalytic Center of Northern New Jersey and is qualified to practice psychoanalysis.

For many years Ann worked only as a psychotherapist with the more seriously disturbed members of our population, where her creativity and artistic abilities were put to work enhancing therapeutic relationships with her patients. In 1990, she resumed a disciplined, dedicated relationship with her art work. Ann's recent work has been included in "The Regilded Age" at the Newark Museum, the Annual New Jersey Small Works show, and the Tennessee Women In the Arts East Tennessee Exhibit at the Knoxville Museum of Art.

The mixed media exhibit "Unique Books" by Ann Eisenberg Friedlander will be Oct. 4-29 with an opening reception and gallery talk Tuesday, Oct. 5 at 7:00 p.m. in the gallery. Gallery hours during the exhibit are weekdays 9-4.

Mariott asks for student input

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

Over 400 Maryville students pay $2,146.00 a year for a "twenty-one meal plan" provided by the Mariott Food Services. This comes to a total close to $887,000.00, 57 percent of which goes to the Mariott Services. This percentage pays for food, staff, and expendables (ie. paper ware, towel rental, etc...). Forty-three percent of this figure goes to the college to cover the utility and maintenance bills of Pearsons Hall.

What, you may ask, does my $2,146.00 get me. Looking at the breakdown even closer, each student on the meal plan eats three meals a day for approximately $9.50. The amount each student pays, is based, surprisingly enough, on the assumption that each student will eat only seventy percent of his or her meals in the Pearsons dining facilities. But what, exactly, are you getting at Pearsons?

Students' opinions ranged from, "It's better than last year", to, "for what we pay, the quality of the food should be a lot better. The general consensus was that most everyone seemed to be disgruntled with the quality of the food, and of the lack of seasoning in the dishes.

One student commented that the entrees were "too creative...", and that Mariott should, "stick to normal, everyday food. Meat and potatoes, stop fixing baked fish and quiche."

The opinions of the faculty, however, were a bit more harsh. One professor described the food as, "repulsive," while another commented that "at least it's identifiable and edible." The most profound statement was that "for institutional food it's okay." The majority of the faculty conceded, however, that they received a good deal. One member did add that, "occasionally they don't serve anything that I like." One faculty member made a point of the quality of service, "the staff couldn't be nicer," she said.

Sue Wyatt in Student Development commented that this year was crucial in deciding whether or not Mariott would be the food service working on campus next year. She made a point of stressing the importance of the food service meeting the wants of the student body. The final decision, she pointed out, lies with the Student Senate. Kristen Kant and Landon Harris are working with Student Development as the co-chairs of the Dining Service Committee. Dr. Wyatt stressed the need for student involvement with the committee, and urges any interested students to contact her.

Kevin Collins, the director of the Mariott services on campus, discussed some of his concerns, and the concerns of the college. Mr. Collins made it very clear that the Mariott services are here for the long haul. He expressed his resolve to serve the students needs, and acknowledged that the food service had faults. "I don't want people going away feeling they had a bad meal," he said. He outlined a plan for "ating entrees so that he could get better feedback. "It doesn't help when someone says the food sucks," he said, "I need to know what to improve, and what the students want."

Bowls will be placed above the various entrees, and students may vote as to which entree they prefer by dropping a penny into the bowl. At the end of the month, all of the pennies collected will be donated to a local charity.

Mr. Collins' biggest concern was over communication with the student body. "I'll do my best to give them what they want, but I have to know what they want," he said.

It seems that the biggest issue concerning the food services is the quality of the food. If the student body gets involved, and works with Mr. Collins and the Mariott food service, this issue can be quickly resolved. Mariott has been making strides in the right direction for the past few years, and a little positive criticism will help them continue along this path.

Lloyd Thornton football stadium to be dedicated at homecoming

by David Picard and
Karen Beaty
Staff writer and Editor

This year, loyal fans of the fighting Scots may have a winning season for which to cheer. They definitely have something else to cheer about—the old, wooden stadium bleachers have been replaced with new aluminum seating. A bigger pressbox can accommodate more announcers, radio sportscasters, and media corp.

And it's a good thing the stadium was revamped—otherwise, those loyal fans wouldn't have had anywhere to sit. If no improvements were made, the bleachers would have been condemned. "We knew that last year would be the last time the fans could sit there," Athletic Director Randy Lambert said referring to an engineer's evaluation of the stadium two years ago.

During last year's football season, architects were at work planning the renovation of the stadium and bleachers, as well as the design of a new press box. Construction began in May, with one of the big tasks being the removal of lead paint on the old bleachers. The completion is slated for this Saturday, when it will be renamed the Lloyd L. Thornton Stadium. Dedication ceremonies will take place before kick-off.

Just as Carnegie renovations were completed in phases, the athletic department is taking the same approach with its goals for the football field. This Saturday marks the completion of Phase I. Phase II will include the renovation of the visitors' stands. The projected starting date for construction is this winter.

Other improvements made in the athletic department include the installation of new gym lockers to replace old lockers that were either damaged or destroyed. Coaches and team players hope that the new lockers will add to security. Easily hidden in because of their size (six feet in height), theft was a common problem.

Stage set for October 21 theatre production

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

"What's my next line?" an actor calls out to the stage manager. Crew members quickly adjust the scenery and props on-stage behind him. "Lounge chairs!" reminds the director. A cue is given, and the scene begins again.

These preparations are just a small part of what is taking place nearly every day and night as the Maryville College Theatre Department prepares for its fall mainstage production, Prelude to a Kiss. The play will be showing on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, October 21, 22, and 23, at 8 p.m. in the Wilson Chapel/Theatre Complex.

Written in 1988 by Craig Lucas, Prelude to a Kiss has been described as both a romantic comedy and a beautiful tribute to unselfish love. The play has received an Obie award, an Outer Critics Circle Award, and a Tony nomination.

The Maryville College production is under the direction of Dr. Jill Stapleton Bergeron. When asked why she chose this play, she replied, "I fell in love with it. It's what real love is about."

Both she and other cast and crew members feel that, although the story itself is a fantasy, it forces people to examine themselves because it presents real aspects of love and relationships.

"It has a very magical quality," said Stage Manager Julie Walker, "but I think people will be able to relate to it, especially because of the modern setting."

Julie will be assisted by Kathryn McDonald. Leading roles will be portrayed by Charles Michael Wilson, Julie Williams, and Christopher Lance. Supporting roles will be performed by Sam Waycaster, Melody Alexander, and Tiffany Rudicil. Other roles will be performed by Sheila Pirl, Michael Purvis, Cindy Johnston, Ronald Moore, Emily Venable, and Callie McDonald.

Maryville College's production of Prelude to a Kiss is the debut performance of the play in the greater Knoxville area. Regular priced adult tickets are $7.50; senior citizen and area student tickets are $5.00. Maryville College students will be admitted free if they present a current ID. Season Coupons, which offer discounts on ticket prices, are also being offered this year. They are available in the college bookstore and in the Fine Arts Center office. They may be used individually or in groups for any performances of the mainstage season.

As the rehearsal continues, a line is delivered correctly. The cast and crew chuckle, even though they have heard it many times before. Suddenly, they see a glimpse of the final product they will present to the audience. They smile at one another and continue to work towards their goal.

Appalachian experience highlights community forum

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

This semester's Community Forum, "The Appalachian Experience" features five speakers revealing the Mountain Society so close, yet so far.

The first presentation on September 9 featured Dr. Sandra Ballard, an Assistant Professor of English for Carson-Newman College. Ballard, gaining her Masters degree in English from the University of Tennessee, has endeavored on a biography on the novelist, Harriette Simpson Arnow. Ballard's mission has already encompassed a decade, and promises to take more years before here work is complete.

Using a slide-show, Ballard talked of the life of Arnow, who published a number of well-known novels detailing life in Appalachia. The titles, most of which Maryville College's Lamar Memorial Library contains, includes Arnow's first work, Mountain Path, her second Hunter's Horn, and her other works, including The Flowering of the Cumberland, Seedtime on the Cumberland, and The Kentucky Trace: A Novel.

Arnow's most famous work, thanks to the 1983 television movie, is The Dollmaker.

Ballard referred to Arnow's impression of the movie, which did not impress the novelist very much. Arnow remarked "a lot worse films have been made of better books." The movie starred Jane Fonda and was filmed in Sevierville.

Ballard talked of her excitement in meeting Arnow outside one of the novelist's presentations. When Arnow heard of Ballard's biographical intentions, Arnow asked "Why?" and scolded Ballard that she should "write about someone else. Write about Irishman James Joyce!"

Ballard continued on about her research into creating Arnow's biography. She mentioned funny discoveries, including Arnow's dog, who was named "Sin".

The second presentation on September 23 featured Dr. Lanny Bowers, Professor of Sociology at Walters State Community College. Entitled "The African-American in Appalachian Heritage: Invisibility and Involvement", his presentation concerned the black American in poor Appalachia.

Bowers began his talk saying that he would "try to break myths... the predominant myth... all who live here (in Appalachia) are of Anglo-Saxon background."

He gave a staggering fact. "There is absolutely no mention whatsoever of the 1.4 million African-Americans living in Appalachia."

Bowers, himself from Green County, Tennessee and the seventh generation of his family to be in Appalachia, told another unknown fact that blacks came to Appalachia before the whites. He referred to a 1526 Spanish expedition that landed in South Carolina. A handful of slaves had arrived with the expedition and overthrew the Spaniards, escaping into the hills of Appalachia. The Blacks met the Cherokee Indians and the groups racially mixed. The relationship, according to Bowers, lasted 150 years until the Native Americans realized they could market the blacks. Bower's also pointed out that over 1,000 blacks lived with the Cherokees at the time of the Trail of Tears, a long, desperate march from the Southern regions to Oklahoma. Bowers also mentioned other slave-holding expeditions which left slave behind.

He enlightened the audience on some fascination and some humorous happenings in Southern Appalachia, including an event in Irwin, Tennessee, where an elephant was tried, convicted, and hanged of a crime.

Bower's also commented on African-American History courses offered in Universities and colleges. "You will find no mention will be made of Blacks in Appalachia," he said, adding "... even if it has a black professor."

"This region is the most segregated place on Sunday," remarked Bowers, referring to church choice attendance.

Bowers attacked the label "African-American", saying he hated hyphenated names. He said he hated the names "German-American, Japanese-American," and that he is "just an American."

"As long as we are in categories, we are going to have problems."

Bower's ended with two poems on the Appalachian region by poet Effie Wallace Smith.

The Community Forum line-up was devised and organized by Dr. Susan Ambler, Assistant Professor of Sociology. Ambler thought of the Forum theme and put it together during the summer.

Ambler said Ballard was the first person she contacted. Both having participated in a James Still Fellowship, they met while celebrating the author's 85th birthday.

Ambler's second contact was Marie Cirillo, the third presenter on October 7. Cirillo is one of the founding mother's of Mount Women's Exchange. They met in 1984. Cirillo's presentation "The History of Self-help Development", will describe her experiences of going into the mountains to help the poor. She "wants to connect the students to work in the mountains" according to Ambler. Cirillo is now a Community Developer for the Woodland Community Land Trust in Clairfield, Tennessee.

The next person Ambler contacted is probably the most well-known of the Community Forum line-up. James Still, author of River of Earth, was called by Ambler. Still, who speaks to numerous groups every year, readily accepted Ambler's invitation and added he would stay on campus for two weeks. From November 1 to 12, Still will speak to classes, two Community Forum events, and also in library lectures. Still's Tuesday, November 2 Forum presentation at 8 p.m. will feature a song and story act from his River of Earth, accompanied by Musician Randy Wilson of Roark, Kentucky. Contact Joan Worley on the library lectures. Ambler also added that if any group wanted to see and listen to Still, they can notify her in advance.

Bowers was next for Ambler to ask to the Forum. She had never met him, but knew of his presentations.

The last person Ambler contacted was Dr. John Gaventa, Associate Professor of Sociology at the University of Tennessee. Gaventa, is director of the Highlander Center, begun in 1933 by Myles Horton. Gaventa was involved with the Civil Rights movements. The Center was visited by the likes of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Rosa Parks.

Gaventa has published several books and has received numerous awards as well as being a Rhodes Scholar and attending Oxford University in England.

Gaventa's presentation, the fourth in the series, "Appalachia: The Changing Economy and Grass Roots Response," will be delivered October 14 at 11 a.m. in the Fine Arts Center.

Ambler hopes the series will help her develop an Appalachian Culture course for Maryville College.

Shedrick McCall recovers from serious injury

by Jed Tuiolosega
Staff Writer

September 11, 1993 was an exciting and tragic day for Maryville College. It was the opening day for the Fighting Scots football team. The home crowd was on their feet and pumped up for the game. The Fighting Scots, coached by head coach Phil Wilks took an early lead at the half, 6-0. Number three Shedrick McCall, Jr. dazzled the crowd with a 22 yard run up the middle just before intermission.

Tragedy struck late in the fourth quarter of the game. McCall of the Fighting Scots was lying down on the sideline with an injury. Thanks to MC trainer Sharon Woods, McCall was immediately rushed to the University of Tennessee hospital.

The doctors analysis of McCall's condition was very serious. A blood vessel had burst between the skull and brain. Hemorrhaging occurred. Surgery was necessary to drain the blood from causing extreme pressure. The surgery lasted three hours.

Nancy McCall, his wife, recalls her thoughts, "I was scared and didn't know how to handle it. I felt all alone, with no one to turn to for support. I felt relieved to see a group of friends waiting for me in the waiting room. I am thankful to have had their support in a time of despair."

The surgery went well as planned. The doctors repaired the vessel and drained the blood to relieve the pain. McCall had twenty-three staples on the right side of his head. Immediately after the surgery he was taken to Intensive Care. He spent three days in ICU.

During his stay at the hospital McCall faced many financial setbacks. Maryville College covered the medical expenses, but McCall and his wife have been out of work for at least two weeks. Maryville College students were aware of this and wanted to help. The Halls; Carnegie, Copeland, Davis, Gamble, Lloyd, and Pearsons, contributed banners and donations to help McCall and his family for work missed. The Bonner Scholars have also offered to help by volunteering hours to help in any way. The Faculty and community have helped in many other ways.

"I believe that friends, the college, and the community have come together to show that they are caring and willing to help. Together with my family and God, the almighty, we can overcome any obstacle," said McCall.

McCall knew exactly who he wanted to thank when I asked him. "I would like to thank God for allowing me to be here today, my family, students and faculty at MC, Sue Wyatt, my mother Roslyn, and most of all my wife Nancy. I love and am grateful for having a strong woman by my side to help me on my way," said McCall. His gratitude towards all those who took the time to help in any way was evident.

McCall spent approximately a week in the hospital and was released Saturday, September, 18. The doctors estimate a period of one month for recovery. McCall is currently undergoing therapy. The doctors are surprised on how fast he is recovering. The staples in his head were removed on September 22nd. He is quickly recovering and is almost back to normal. "I hope and pray that what has happened to me will never happen to anyone," said McCall.

McCall, Maryville College student, President of Black Student Association, member of Voices of Praise, and Assistant Mgr. of Things Remembered, is glad to be alive. McCall said, "I am blessed to have support from MC, family, and the community. I plan to take one day at a time. I'm a true warrior, nothing and I mean nothing will bring me down."

Defending Scot Brian Lewis, # 25 is assisted in holding the line as an opposing Centre player goes nowhere with the ball. So far this season, the Scots have a record of 2-1, losing 6-7 against Kentucky Wesleyan, winning 21-7 against Centre, and winning 26-14 against University of the South.

Soccer Lady Scots' roster consists of smaller team with determined players

by Ahron Bobbin
Staff Writer

The Maryville College Lady Scots are in the middle of a new season. Led by coach Pepe Fernandez and assistant coach Ben Sohrabi, the lady scots are working hard. The soccer team lost seven seasoned players from last year and one of their best this year. #7 Julie Dingels, All-American senior, was injured in a game two weeks ago. She was two goals away from an all time career record. Players are hopeful of her recovery, but it is unclear if she will be able to return this season.

The thirteen players on the team are struggling to overcome their limitations. Thirteen is a small number of players to have on a soccer team. In comparison, the men's soccer team has over thirty players. This has an affect on how rested the team is as they play.

One thing that helps the women through the season is how close they are. As #6 Jennifer Wells indicated, during the preseason, the team was really close; but as the season progressed, the team had problems. Now that the team realizes they must work together, they have gotten much closer.

The facilities that the team uses are in excellent condition. This is an aid to the team. Good facilities are one of the keys to a team's success.

As far as the playoffs go, the team would have a good chance to participate if they win the rest of their games this season. This will be difficult to do, but the coaches and players are determined to make this a successful season.

Fall Baseball League sharpens players' skills, improves field

by Ahron Bobbin
Staff Writer

Welcome to another year of Maryville College athletics. One of our school's lesser known Fall sports is baseball. The MC Baseball team is involved in something called the Fall League. The team plays local colleges within a couple of hours driving time.

The team has nineteen players involved in the fall league.

Participation is not mandatory for those players in football, or who have other commitments. Players are advised to play so they can sharpen their skills. Their coach works closely with the league to help the upperclassmen get in shape, and helps the underclassmen develop their skills. This is a time when the team can become very close, which is sometimes difficult to do during the regular spring season.

This time also gives the players a chance to work on their facilities.

Jeff Rosa, one of the Fall Baseball team's players, said, "the bleachers needed painting, so we got out there and did it."

Much of the work on the playing field is done by the team. This allows the team to take pride in their facilities, and yet another way for the team to become closer. The city of Maryville uses the field in exchange for field improvements such as new bleacher and a new underground watering system.

The team would really appreciate everybody coming out to see their games. Right now, only a few friends, family, and alumni come out to watch their games. The guys would appreciate playing to some full bleachers.

*From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .Editorial

So the first issue of the "Echo" is out.

Upperclassmen are thumbing through to see what kind of philosophy "Dave's World" can offer, faculty and staff are going through it with a fine toothed comb, and freshmen are pulling it out of their boxes thinking "Hey— what the *%@!?!... We even have a school newspaper?"

What I hope—and I'll say it on behalf of my staff—is that students will respond to Dave, professors will scrutinize our work, and that freshmen will learn that they have a voice on this campus (albeit a small one and one that's heard biweekly). We hope that this 8 page tabloid will be taken to the residence halls, to offices, to homes... and read— not thrown in the recycling bins on the day they're delivered, and not strewn all over the post office floor. That is an insult to our hard work and makes a mockery of every student's right to voice his or her opinion about any relevant issue here at Maryville College.

Some say that there is a lack of communication here. I don't agree. I think there is a tendency to ignore strides made to communicate on this campus. The purpose of the "Echo" is, and always has been to give students an objective and recent (or as recent as we could make it) view of stories and issues that affect us. Reading this newspaper might take initiative, but it is a big source of information. No, this news is not national, but it is newsworthy. Besides, there are only so many pieces of paper one can put into someone else's mailbox, so many signs one can hang up, so many telephone calls one can make to remind others that blah, blah, blah.

by Dave Roberts

Freshmen: you're in Maryville College, in the foothills of god's own Smoky Mountains, so knock em' dead, all right? Be all that you can be, and don't let the home team down... this is your chance to excel, by gum, and your mother and I are praying for you. Don't take any wooden nickels, and remember the golden Rule: he who has the gold makes the rules! Heh heh heh, just kidding ya' there, but seriously... don't screw up, we're spending some heavy duty cashola for you to go to college and get you some smarts... learn how to get by in the real world, by gum... nose to the grindstone and all that... (sniffle) and don't go catchin no diseases, ya crazy nut! Heh heh, well... make us proud.

Hey kids. How the heck are you? Welcome to another fun-filled, laugh-a-minute year of goofy good humor here at Maryville College. In this, the first 1993-94 edition of our glorious gift to journalism, The Highland Echo, I would suggest that we imagine the paper as Mrs. Johnson's fourth grade class: anyone can speak, but first you must overcome your fear of being heard. Raise your hand. We invite you to speak out in the paper whenever you get the urge, and you are free to pontificate on any subject that interests you. The more you people speak, the more there is to be heard. As always, I will do my best to provoke response. Heh heh.

Well, at this point, the only one with his hand up in Mrs. Johnson's class is me, Dave.

"Well, Dave, what did you do this summer?" Good question.

I slept on the ground at a rest stop in Kansas, moshed to Primus in the dust of Utah, climbed crocodile rock in Montana, walked through Haight-Ashbury in San Francisco, California, ran out of gas in the middle of Nevada, got a speeding ticket in Wyoming, rode a mountain bike up eleven miles and strait down six, bussed tables for a living (on my breaks I sat and watched Old Faithful spew hundreds of gallons of boiling water into the air), won 255 on a slot machine, saw the Grateful Dead with my older brother, caught a ride with a family of Mormons while hitchhiking, and played frisbee golf with regional pros. I found out what it's like to be stranded in a foreign land with no job, no transportation, carrying no worldly goods except for a sleeping bag and bagels, and being denied access to the only people you know within a thousand mile radius. I saw elk, deer, bison, foxes, coyotes, marmots, and a bald eagle. I met people from Arizona, Indiana, Florida, California, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, New York, Texas, Oregon, Washington, and New Mexico. I kicked a hacky sack in seven different states (geographic states and states of consciousness). I found out that America, contrary to rumor, is a big place - much bigger than Tennessee.

This summer, I packed the Omni (a.k.a. the Hominy, a.k.a. the Omnivore) and drove west. Yellowstone National State Park or bust! The next three months were, to understate the case, revelatory. My eyes were opened, and I saw and learned things that had been hidden from me and things that had always been right in front of me.

On the road west (meaning northwest), the most striking difference manifests around South Dakota. The sky seems to expand in size and activity - the air becomes clearer and humidity nears zero. The weather becomes cinema. At dusk, isolated groups of clouds meander across the sky in cloaks of purple and scarlet; sunsets last for hours and glow like they are preening to be postcards. The patterns shift in minutes - a raging blizzard can be melting in hot, clear sun in the space of an hour. The speeding, sporadic, seemingly haphazard weather seems to have a subconscious effect on the people of the west: urgent atmospherics spur a kind of

I'm grateful to our new staff writers, photographers, and lay-out help who have become part of this journalistic cult. These are classmates with initiative. They share a vision of free speech. I studied abroad last semester at a university whose students lived with no student newspaper, annual, or literary magazine. With no voice, they also had to live with rules from the Eisenhower era.

I am afraid that this, my first editorial, may be viewed as pessimistic. I am not dwelling on the reception of the "Echo" in years past. I am optimistic and enthusiastic about our new recruits, our advisor, and the possibilities therein.

I am convinced that the newspaper will grow in creativity. Mark Hall's front page picture of the students on the Alpine Tower is one of the best I've seen by our staff photographers.

The paper will grow in credibility. Jed Tuiolosega volunteered to write the article updating the condition of Shedrick McCall, a football player for the Scots who was seriously injured during the first football game. Jed saw the need to let the campus community know what happened after the ambulance drove away, and he went to the source.

With creativity and credibility, I believe that the "Echo" will grow in audience.

And with that, students will grow in voice.

— Karen Beaty

psychic urgency. Many of the defensive social tactics I have become so used to using began to seem tiring and useless. Especially among the people who come just for a season, there is a buzz in the air that denies apathy. Communication is direct and incautious; by necessity, friendships are quickly made, deeply felt, and tenuously held - based as they are on a continuous flow of rapidly changing circumstances. The west is full of travelers, and the movement lends intensity to each moment. In a climate that defies definition, motion seems the only constant.

Communities in the west are different from southern communities, in subtle and not-so-subtle ways. The south (and I am painting very broad strokes here - there are always exceptions) is a very aged place. It moves slowly and safely, and everyone knows where they stand. It has changed a great deal in recent decades, but there is still a lingering sense of rigidity, of predetermined behavior. If you choose to do so, it is easy to blend in and become invisible - and it is just as easy to rebel and become a mindless opposite in all things. Be it the long haired hippie faggot, the bible-beating strait-laced Christian, the big dumb jock, the conforming fraternity/sorority dork/bimbo, or the plain old macho badass - the pressure is to find a role and play it, to find a clique and blend in it, to find a herd and graze with it. Some individuality is sacrificed for comfort, which may or may not be a worthy trade; communication is haunted by courtesy and custom. The socioeconomic currents are deep and strong and almost always overcome a contrary swimmer.

I do not mean to imply that the pressure to conform is limited to states east of the Mississippi; the need for emotional comfort and acceptance is everywhere. However, the west is the last place left in America with big spaces - I mean big spaces physically, to live in, and spiritually, to search in. There is an aura of tolerance, dignity, independence, and most importantly, individualism among the people of the west. Frontier mythology - the roaming cowboy, the noble savage, the rugged entrepreneur - still exerts a powerful subconscious pull. ON the frontier, a person is left to his own devices, to live or die according to his own effort and will. Each person has a personal space, and that space is inviolate, a core free from psychological probing and emotional invasion. The attitude of the old cowboys seems to be, "You stay out of my way and I'll stay out of yours." Especially among the youth, there isn't the undercurrent of intolerance and condemnation that I seem to feel between so many groups in the south.

Debate scheduled today for 24-hour visitation

by Kristin Johnson
Staff Writer

The residents of Lloyd Hall are taking steps in a new direction—venturing into territory that has only recently been chartered by residents of Carnegie.

A host of ideas, suggestions, rules, and regulations have been compiled to form the Lloyd proposal for 24-hour visitation. This year is not the first time the idea has come up. "We were led to believe by some actions taken by student senate last year that we would have the opportunity to vote on it," said Peggy Smith, a junior resident initiating the proposal. When she and other residents found out otherwise, they were greatly disappointed. Therefore, they decided to do something about it.

Senate President Jenni McCafferty did not remember the issue ever being discussed in depth in meetings last year. "It was discussed the year before last. But I don't know where the idea came from that those residents would be given the opportunity to vote on it."

The Lloyd proposal is a request that was initiated by Smith, who took a petition around to other residents to see if the majority would be in favor of the proposal. With this in hand along with a lot of input, Smith went to Kristin Kant, a sophomore senator and resident of Lloyd. Kant agreed to sponsor the proposal as did Lloyd senator Joe Meyers. In doing so, Kant took on the responsibility of formerly writing up the proposal which she and Meyers will present to student senate at today's meeting.

Upon receiving it, senators will vote on whether or not to pass the # Senate committee formed to address counseling issue

A note from the Editor:

The following is a reprinted letter from an Echo issue dated March 25, 1993. Alene Day, then a junior at Maryville College, wrote to the newspaper expressing her opinion about the problems (as she saw them) at Crawford House.

Like Day, it is the concern of myself and my staff that the College stresses the importance of having a counseling service here that meets the needs of the students. It is for this reason that we have chosen to pursue a follow-up story to the letter.

The Echo is in no way commenting on the quality of programs offered by Crawford House last year, or this year.

Dear Editor,

The other day I made a call to Crawford House to make an appointment with a counselor to discuss some of the normal tribulations facing any college student in the nineties; this was not an easy thing for me to do considering my distrust in any arena requiring confidentiality here at Maryville College. But I took a chance and did it anyway. Well, my chance was in vain. I was told by the person I had requested that she did not have the time to see me then, nor did she have the time to see me in the near future (or the far future for that matter). She was polite. But I declined her recommendation to call another staff member at Crawford House because, as I had told her, I was apprehensive and she was the one person that I thought I could talk to; then I hung up the phone. Then I started registering what had just happened, and I thought, "This is unbelievable! I could have been suicidal (which I wasn't, and a good thing too, otherwise I probably wouldn't be here today), and I've just called for help and virtually was told 'no'." For me, that was simply the straw that broke the camel's back. As far as I was concerned, any hope I had ever had regarding Crawford House had just been blasted out of the water.

Some of you may be wondering why I have chosen to write in the Echo about something so seemingly personal. Well, with encouragement from the Echo staff—in their last letter to the college community in the previous issue pleading for an ounce or two of interest and feedback from the students regarding our school—and with the simple fact (that I know to be true) that I am not alone in my lack of confidence in the little house next to Copeland nor in an abundance of the questions pertaining to it.

In regard to the counseling services that are provided, I know few people who feel completely comfortable asking for help from anyone and even fewer who would ask Crawford House for help. There is a distinct air of distrust among the student body when it comes to confidentiality issues here at MC. You can believe that this is not just my own point of view; I have had lengthy conversations that support what I am saying. There is also undoubtedly a reluctance to seek help for someone else. Many people whom I have talked to feel that voicing concerns about a friend will most likely be more hassle than help. Crawford House's solutions appear to be surveillance, disciplinary action, or placing the worried party in the uncomfortable position of having to "observe" and report back on said friend's actions.

And there is nothing worse than making such a personal call and having a fellow student answer the phone.

I would like to take this moment to say that when I talk about Crawford House I know that I am guilty of a blatant generalization of all the people who work over there, but this letter is going to go on long enough without my being specific. I would also like to say now that there is a part of me that does feel bad about sitting here dogging a bunch of people whom I know work very hard, but the rest of me does not feel bad enough to ignore that fact that all the bases are simply not being covered here at MC. Specifically, there is nothing resembling a program or means of helping the women of this school. Most colleges have some sort of women's services somewhere within the college community. If we want to pretend that sexual harassment, date rape, pregnancy, abuse, and just plain confusion does not occur here, we are all kidding ourselves. And if we want to believe that a woman is going to dial the same number for one of these reasons that she is going to dial for time management assistance, again we are kidding ourselves. (I am not discounting a man's need for advice, but someone else can write that letter.)

In regards to the Mountain Challenge branch of Crawford House, I would just like to say that one of the biggest reasons that I came to MC was because of its Mountain Challenge program. After having had two and a half years of solid experience in a similar organization, this was something that I wanted to do for the rest of my life. I am still a firm believer in the positive force of outdoor recreation as a means of education and therapy (but only if by choice), yet I find it amazing that here I am, a junior, and I virtually have nothing to do with Mountain Challenge, which partly is still a mystery to me and partly my own decision after failed attempts to try to get involved.

Right about now I imagine that you all are wondering where this is all leading; what is the point to this letter that is really beginning to sound like some personal vendetta? Well, mainly I just wanted to publicly voice my opinion because (1) I can, and (2) more of us need to do so. It seems like a lot of us will talk and complain but rarely to the people who need to hear it. (I know, because I do it too.) If nothing changes over at Crawford House, it's no skin off my back—I'll rock climb with someone else; I'll seek advice from my friends; and I'll do graphics for someone who has faith in me. But at least they now know (and now so does everyone else) my discontent. And if something does change, that would be great for the people after me at Maryville and great for the people who work at Crawford House as well. They basically are trying to do too much out of one small unit of people. We need full-time, dedicated professionals who can really devote themselves and their time to each area of Crawford House.

I know that I probably sound bitter. To a certain extent I am. But in all honesty I truly see this as a problem that goes beyond the personal; it goes campus-wide. There would be no reason for the services provided at Crawford House to be the butt of so many jokes and the source of so much disdain if there weren't such a sense of discord among the students.

Well, it's finally over. Thanks for reading this, and feel free to take it with a large grain of salt if you need to. Do think about what I've said, and speak up or speak back if you have the calling to as I did.

Alene Day
Junior

by Karen Beaty
Editor

When the Echo published Alene Day's letter criticizing the services at Crawford House, the staff at "the little house next to Copeland" began drafting a letter to the editor in response to some of the allegations.

Day never received that letter because it was never finished.

"I said to [staff members]: 'I don't know if that's the way to approach it,'" explained Bruce Guillaume, director of Crawford House.

When asked what kind of response she was given of behalf of Crawford House, her answer was very clear. "None. Zip. Zilch-o. Students left and right were going, 'Hey, great letter.' Thumbs up. But no response from Crawford House."

Day said she feels that her letter, like her initial request for counseling, was ignored. "You would think that possibly someone would say, 'Alene, are you O.K.?' For being a place that encourages communication, they did not communicate at all. They swept me under the rug."

Guillaume said he feels differently. "We acted on it quickly. We (being Student Development) took Alene's letter very seriously." He went on to say that while there were points of the letter with which he didn't agree, he felt, for the most part, her letter was "correct." He immediately met with Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development, and later the president of the student senate to discuss the issues broached by the letter, because it "documented very well the places [we] have needs."

When Guillaume was finally asked how the letter was approached, he said that he "didn't know that [he] was supposed to respond to it," and that he does not see "not responding to it as bad."

"It seemed to us that Alene did not want any kind of response like that from us in person," Guillaume said.

Day has reason to believe that philosophy may have been shared with other members of the college staff. She thought her letter would provoke some type of response, and was surprised when there was none. "I talked to [a former staff member] and she told me on the side: 'Well, you know Alene, they were told not [to respond]. I have no proof of that allegation, and I don't know who 'they' are, but that was what I was told.'"

Guillaume said he does not recall ever sitting in on a meeting where "anybody said anything like that."

Recently, college administration has taken a serious look at Crawford House's need for more money. Day was also told (in her conversation with the former staff member) that the letter was copied and presented in meetings to justify a budget increase for counseling services. Again, Day said that she had no proof this was ever done, as she was never notified of its use for this purpose.

The Crawford House director believes, though, that through some committee work and with Wyatt fighting his "budgetary battles," improvements are being made. The program's biggest problem is understaffing. "Last school year, we had 500 clinical hours of need, and we were funded for a staff that could meet 300 clinical hours."

The counseling staff consists of him, Carolyn Morton, Catherine Nickle, and a few University of Tennessee graduates. Of the counselors, only Nickle does strictly counseling services. Morton is involved with an "Academic Success" program, and Guillaume himself is responsible for the operation of the counseling services, the Mountain Challenge Programs (both college and corporate), the LEC Task Force, and health services. "We take things as they come in," said Guillaume of their priorities. "If people request a counselor, and there are emergencies, then they will be seen [immediately]. That was not the presentation of Alene's letter." Guillaume also indicated that her request for a certain counselor was unusual. According to him, most callers are not specific in making appointments.

This year, sufficient funds were accrued through a few staff changes made by Student Development. Those funds were allocated for the hiring of a second secretary to answer phone calls. While the money is there, Crawford House is still trying to fill a clerical position.

Guillaume also stressed the fact that all counselors, professionals, and graduate students alike are legally bound in the area of client confidentiality. As for the location of Crawford House being conducive to confidentiality, Guillaume expressed that the amount and diversity of his programs may prevent people on campus from assuming that anyone walking to Crawford House is seeking counseling services. He illustrated this idea by pointing out that if the counseling services were housed in Fayerweather, in an office for counseling purposes alone, anyone entering the office would be pegged as a client.

Day's letter is not the first publicly expressed concern of the counseling services, or the need to "cover the bases" at Crawford House. But it does seem that her letter and its articulation of problems may have been the catalyst for the creation of a new senate committee that will look into the questions students have about the programs at Crawford House. The exact role of the committee has yet to be defined. Guillaume hopes that it will look into how to "present Crawford House as a positive thing." Both he and Day have been approached to join.

Day is not sure of how being on the committee will "turn out." She is encouraged that with the formation of a committee, something may be done.

"I couldn't say no to the offer [of being on it]," said Day. "That would have been very hypocritical of me."

New professors bring fresh ideas to MC

Gombert makes the fine arts finer

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

One of the new (bearded) faces in the Maryville College faculty this semester is Carl Gombert, assistant professor of art history.

Hailing from Ohio, Gombert graduated from the University of Akron with a bachelor of fine arts in drawing. He gained his master's degree in painting from Kent State University.

Gombert is currently finishing an interdisciplinary Ph.D. program in fine arts at Texas Tech University in Lubbock. He is finishing up his dissertation on Lakota Indian Art.

He has been the recipient of Texas Tech fellowships and grants and attended the Summer Institute of Western American Studies at the Buffalo Bill Historical Center in Cody, WY. He was also awarded an art department scholarship at the University of Akron and an Ohio National Guard scholarship.

Gombert taught at Texas Tech and also at the Broadway School of Music and Art in Cleveland, OH. He worked as stage manager at the Civic Center in Canton, OH, and as a scenic designer and stage manager at the University of Akron Opera Theatre.

Gombert was a graphic designer for Khoury Art Service.

He is a member of the College Art Association and has published work on the art of Julia Kerl, Edward S. Curtis, and the Plains Indians.

Gombert's work has been exhibited in Lubbock; in Seattle, WA; in New York City and Buffalo, NY; Cleveland, OH, and Sacramento, CA; as well as other invitation exhibits.

Miller adds to the quality of physics

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

How does the old saying go—"there is always room for new blood?"

The physics department here at Maryville received new blood this year. Dr. Roger Miller began his first year of teaching at Maryville College this semester, after having completed his postdoctoral work at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville.

Miller graduated Summa Cum Laude with a bachelor's degree in physics and mathematics at Central University of Iowa.

A native of Chicago, Miller has taught and lived and taught in Egypt, at Ramses College in Cairo.

ECHO: Why did you choose Maryville College?

MILLER: "I was looking for a small liberal arts school. I graduated from Central University of Iowa, which has about 1,500 students... I also wanted to teach in the South, and I really like the Tennessee area."

M: "I love the academic life. I am a people-oriented person."

EC: Did you always want to be a physicist?

M: "I was interested in political science and physics in high school. It wasn't until college that I decided to pursue physics. I also try to stay on top of current events."

EC: Why did you choose physics over political science?

M: "I see a lot of beauty in the universe in terms of how it works, and physics studies how the universe works."

EC: What makes a good physicist?

M: "Curiosity. Definitely curiosity—curiosity about how the world works."

EC: Where would you go for your ideal vacation?

M: "Someplace where the culture is different from western culture. I think Asia would be a wonderful place to visit, because I've never been there. Luxury hotels and regular tourist centers are not the kinds of places that attract me. I enjoy roughing it."

EC: If you were a color, what color would you be?

M: "Probably purple. It is a little bit unusual and a little loud, but it doesn't draw attention to itself."

EC: And your favorite time of the year?

M: "Summer. I hate cold weather, and being from Chicago, I like warm weather."

EC: What was your most memorable class in college?

M: "Modern Algebra. A small Lebanese woman taught the class. She was a good teacher, and she tried to make the class fun. Each day we started class with a joke."

EC: How do you feel about being a professor?

M: "It's much busier than I thought it would be. I remember telling a fellow classmate who was going into medicine that I thought he was crazy—[medicine] required too much time. It was nine years from graduation to this job."

EC: Would you go through it all again, knowing how much work it is?

M: "I don't know anything I'd rather do."

Thomas brings poetic justice to English Department

by Jeff Huffman
Ass't Editor

The newest addition to the English Department is Dr. Mark Thomas, a published poet and graduate of North Carolina State University.

Holding his master's degree in English from the College of William and Mary, Thomas has instructed at the University of Illinois, Guilford Technical Community College in Jamestown, NC, the College of William and Mary, and North Carolina State University.

Thomas has published academic work dealing with Malcolm Lowry's poetry and has held a university fellowship at the University of Illinois. He was also nominated for Outstanding Teaching Assistant Award. He is also a member of Phi Kappa Phi Honor Society, the Midwestern Modern Language Association, the Modern Language Association, the National Council of the Teachers of English, and the South Atlantic Modern Language Association.

Thomas's specialties in teaching include 19th Century British Literature, modern British and American literature, creative writing, freshman rhetoric, and business writing.

EC: You are a published poet?

Thomas: "Yes. I started writing as an undergraduate at NC state. I published some poems in the literary magazine."

EC: Who is your favorite poet?

TS: "Contemporary poet is Amy Clampitt. Fabulous poet. Of the old poets, William Butler Yeats."

EC: What is your favorite poem?

TS: "Kubla Khan."

EC: What is your favorite color?

TS: "Cornflower."

EC: What kind of animal would you be?

TS: "A skylark."

EC: What was your most embarrassing moment academically?

TS: "When I was a graduate student, in a journal article on Keats' 'Lamia'... the title publish was supposed to be 'Whither Fleed Lemia: A Signification in Search', but the title published had a mistake and read 'Wither Fleed Lemia'. My professors and colleagues were confused by that."

EC: What do you usually look for in a grocery store?

TS: "Fresh coffee beans and bran. Snicker's and ice cream."

EC: If you got one million dollars tomorrow, what would you do?

TS: "I would endow the college, then choose a sports car, and go to driving school at Road Atlanta."

EC: What is your favorite sport?

TS: "Motor racing. (While removing a wallet photo) Here's Alain Prost, four-time world-driving champion. He's really a phenomenon."

EC: On the serious side, what's your general impression of the MC campus?

TS: "It's a lovely setting. I love all of the big trees, all the grass... I think we're really lucky to have the woods."

EC: And the students?

TS: "Very positive. I'm crazy about my students. I love all my classes. How friendly everybody on the faculty is. It's one of the things that really impress me. No ill will."

Fiery past haunts Carnegie

In the fire of 1916, residents threw belongings out the windows.

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

The flames were eager. Very slowly, but surely, they crept through the halls into the rooms, out the windows, up through the roof. The building was wrapped in a curtain of smoke and flame."

The largest Carnegie fire, described here in an excerpt from the 1916 Chilhowean, completely destroyed the building. At first, the students who rushed out of chapel to watch and try to help believed it could be saved. They ran for buckets and any other containers they could find to carry water. It quickly became apparent that the fire that had begun in the west stairwell was engulfing the entire building.

Realizing the seriousness of the situation, the Carnegie residents ran inside and began to throw their belongings out the windows and push them out the doors. They worked until nothing more could be done.

By nightfall, all of the 126 residents all had temporary lodgings with either college staff or members of the community.

Carnegie reopened on Jan. 2, 1917, barely ten months after the day it burned, April 12, 1916. The cause of the fire has never been determined.

Since then, Carnegie has had minor fire damage, been closed, and reopened for a third time in the early 1980s.

"I think many people hear of the three reopenings and assume that there have been three major fires. That isn't the case," said Dr. Sally McNeill.

Still, Carnegie's history is full of fire stories, both true and fabricated ones, which all add to its uniqueness. Its current residents, however, seem to be unaffected by its past.

"It's seen as a joke, said Residence Director Mark Cate. "People like living in Carnegie too much to be concerned."

Those who helped renovate Carnegie were concerned. Sprinklers were placed in every room and hallway. Each kitchen is equipped with a fire extinguisher. The wooden fire doors can withstand a fire for three hours before flames will burn through.

Cate said his only worry regarding fire is evacuation. Earlier this year, three false alarms were set off early in the morning. They were caused by a short in the system, which has been fixed.

"It's a concern of mine that the students are used to [the alarms] now, and they won't evacuate," Cate said. "We're not really worried about the fire itself, but we are worried about the danger of smoke inhalation."

Carnegie has had a somewhat tragic past. Those who have a personal interest in this structure hope that its newest residents will behave responsibly and prove that with its reopening, the third time really is the charm.

College mourns death of freshman student

Scholarship being discussed in memory of MC student

In the very early hours of July 21, 1993, Maryville College lost one of its own.

Robert E. "Bobby" Smith was the only fatality in a 3-people car accident on a side road in Winchester, Tn. Smith was driving a vehicle similar to a land cruiser, lost control of it, and hit a telephone pole.

He had just completed his freshman year at MC two months before the tragedy. A biology major, Smith had plans of going to medical school.

"He wanted to be a doctor," said Jay Clark, Smith's roommate during last year's fall semester. Clark was also a fellow graduate of Franklin County High School. "We were in the same class since third grade. He was my best friend."

Smith is survived by his parents, Carter and Judy Smith of Winchester; a sister, Susie, brother-in-law, and niece, all of Knoxville.

A scholarship in memory of Smith is being discussed.

"People sent contributions [to the family]," said Clark. "And Bobby's mother works in a bank, so she set up an account. Our friends back home—eight or nine of us—and parents have put in quite a bit. And, of course, some parents [of students] up here."

The family is considering taking the memorial money and giving it to MC to begin an endowed scholarship in memory of Smith. It may be designated for Franklin County High School graduates attending MC.

"We are interested in talking with the family about setting up a scholarship," said Ellie Morrow, director of development. "None of the details have been worked out."

Once plans for the scholarship are completed, the Echo staff and the offices of Willard House will work together to let students know whom to contact in order to send money for the scholarship.

"Bobby was always crazy and taking risks—living on the edge. But he was a nice and caring guy, and he cared for other people's feelings. Bobby never took his friends for granted," said Clark.

Read faster and dream easier with non-credit courses

A non-credit course entitled "Rapid Reading" is being offered from Oct. 20 to Nov. 10. The course, taught by Tammy Krukreja, is designed to enhance reading skills and speed. Students' study habits and professionals' workday productivity can be improved through the course. The class will take place every Wednesday for 6-8:30 p.m.

According to the course description, a person's reading rate and comprehension can be increased by 30 to 40 percent within weeks with continued practice and dedication.

Krukreja, who has instructed this course for four years, became interested in speed reading because of the massive number of computer manuals and journals she had to read as an instructor of computer courses.

"Dreamquest", taught by Dr. Eileen Riordan, will be offered on Nov. 5, from 7-9 p.m. on Friday; and Nov. 6, from 9 a.m.-4 p.m. on Saturday. The $40 fee includes lunch on Saturday. For more details or registration for either course, call 981-8116.

Inaugural Glossary

So, it's time for the inauguration. You'll need to brush up on your lingo. Here's a brief guide for the schedule printed on page one.

Humphreys Court—the newly-landscaped area between Anderson, the CCM and Fayerweather Hall. Diane Humphreys-Barlow (a 1970 graduate of Maryville College and current member of it's board of directors) donated the funds for this project. "She wanted to honor her parents in a very visible way," said Jane Gilbert, director of alumni and parent programs of Willard House.

175th Anniversary Celebration Kickoff—the official beginning of a year-long celebration of the 175 years since Isaac Anderson founded the school in 1819. "We're going to ring the bell 175 times," said Gilbert. Different constituents of the college—students, faculty, staff, board members, and others will be asked to pull the rope.

Academic Forum—a gathering to hear alumni and other campus voices debate in favor of a liberal arts education.

Delegate—an individual representing other colleges and universities. Gilbert referred to them as members of "learned societies," and added that "there are about 200 delegates invited." During the inaugural ceremony, these delegates will be members of the academic procession.

Inaugural Ceremony—the formal installation of the 10th president in Maryville College's history. "It's a big deal," said Gilbert. "The ceremony part is a very traditional, formal installation." The offices of Willard House have mailed out about

1,000 invitations. "I am anticipating the chapel being filled," Gilbert said. (The chapel will seat roughly 1,000 people.)

Inaugural Ball—a semi-formal dance held to recognize the induction of the new president. Tellico Village Yacht and Country Club is located just outside of Lenoir City. A bus will be provided for students, and they can sign up for seats in the post office.

Festival of Faith—a three-day event to mark the end of the 175th anniversary celebrations of Second Presbyterian Church in Knoxville. The church, founded by Isaac Anderson in 1818, will have Dr. M. Scott McClure as its guest speaker. McClure is a 1948 graduate of Maryville College and serves on its board of directors.

RESEARCH

that many students are involved in learning outside of the campus, as well as inside the gates of MC. He sees the value of their accomplishments in five ways. "First, they gain terrific experience. Here, we teach them the nuts and bolts of science. The only way to learn a job is by doing the job."

He went on to say that students "satisfy college requirements," and earn practicum credit, earn experiential credit because of study outside of the college community, and have the opportunity to get a lead-in to their senior thesis. "The fifth advantage is that there is money involved. Most of these programs are federally funded, and students do receive money for their work," he said.

"It was a pretty good deal," said biology major Dana Brantley. Brantley studied at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. She was paid a stipend for her work, and both of her living and travel costs were paid as well.

Brantley studied cytological genetics. Her work was mostly one-on-one with a professor. There were 16 undergraduates in all chosen for that particular program. Brantley met other rising juniors while in Chapel Hill, and noticed that "actually, most were from smaller, liberal arts schools."

While she believes that her research was not "in-depth enough" for a senior thesis, Brantley has decided to go to graduate school, and very probably, at Chapel Hill. "The professor said she would love for me to come and work in her lab for graduate study," said Brantley.

Junior Jennifer Cowan spent twelve weeks at Clemson University in S.C. The goal of her research was to "come out with compound precursors for compounds that could be used as any conductor or ceramics," said Cowan.

She said she isn't sure if Clemson is for her, but she is definite about attending graduate school. "It was a wonderful learning experience for me."

Senior chemistry major Lori Schirmer moved to Lexington, Ky. for eight weeks to study at the University of Ky. Schirmer investigated the process of transdermal drug delivery.

"This drug delivery is a way of using skin patches that contain some type of drug to be placed on the skin. We used laboratory animals to determine how fast the drug on the patch could go through the skin," she explained. This project has become her senior thesis. Lab work and research studies will be completed in Lexington.

Senior chemistry major Jenni McCafferty conducted her research in a hospital in Cincinnati. Like Schirmer, her research will be used in the senior thesis. McCafferty was unavailable for comment.

Most of the students obtained their positions by submitting applications to institutions that sent various flyers and letters posted by the departments in Sutton Science. Naylor encourages interested persons to contact him or other faculty members in the natural sciences.

Players take chances with Cowpatties

by Dave Picard and Karen Beatty
Staff Writer and Editor

Ever wonder how long it takes a cow to... well... "do its business?"

On Sept. 30, it took one specific cow two hours and 25 minutes to defecate.

"Cow patty bingo" is the most recent (and arguably the most unusual) fund-raiser at Maryville College thus far. In a money-raising effort, the volleyball team divided up the softball field into 199 squares.

Team members sold squares to individuals for $5 each. The winner took home a $175 cash prize.

Just like in the real bingo, the object of "cow patty bingo" is to fill up your square with chips. The owner of the square where the chip falls, wins. (Pardon the puns.)

"The girls came up with [the idea]" said volleyball coach Kandi Schram, and added that players organized the event, sold tickets, and located the cow.

Out of 199 squares, 175 were sold. The money raised will go toward the team's upcoming dents that Maryville College should support consistency in visitation policies for upperclassmen residence halls.

Stephanie Wyatt said one of her main concerns would be safety and security, but added that "this process really isn't going to go through me."

The Lloyd residents are also taking this into consideration. They have come up with several new rules that would be enacted should the proposal be granted. Responsibility is a factor that is sure to be debated. Christen McCammon, a sophomore resident in Carnegie, feels that as an upperclassman, signs of responsibility should be seen in these years; otherwise, there are none, and never will be. "All you're going to do is end up breaking the rule somewhere else, and that's not responsible," she said.

Smith realizes if the proposal is passed some conflicts may come up from time to time. However, she stated, "If we're supposed to be based on an honor system, then that's exactly what we're going to have to show responsibility for, and the only way that anyone can show responsibility is with added freedoms like this one."

Homecoming '93 for Maryville College started Sept. 26 through Oct. 2. There was a particular event for each day of the week. Student Programming Board came up with certain events. Each residence hall and the commuters competed against each other. All the events for homecoming were leading to the finale, the homecoming game. The spirit of competition encouraged the Fighting Scots football players for their encounter with Cumberland University.

Sunday the 26th kicked off the start of competition. Each Hall had representatives to brief their members of the upcoming events. The first thing talked about was the banner competition and the spirit frame competition. Every hall had to create a banner and a spirit frame for Oct. 2.

Each Hall also had to send in a picture of a female and male pair of legs to take part in the "sexy legs contest." Throughout the week students voted for who they thought had the best pair of legs by donating money for their choice. All money raised in this competition was given to MC football player Shedrick McCall, Jr. Overall money raised was $184.50 and the winners of the "sexy legs" competition was Carnegie Hall.

Monday, Maryville College was fortunate to have speaker George Obermeier at Wilson Chapel. His speech was on "natural highs." The most number of individuals that were present at the lecture won the "natural highs" contest. Davis Hall, naturally "high" won the contest by showing up with almost all of their residents.

Tuesday, MC had a Dutch auction at the CCM. A list of objects to be auctioned was made. The problem was that no one knew what was on the list except the creator of the list. The Dorm with the most objects on the list wins. Everyone in each Dorm donated anything that they could to the auction. Once again Carnegie was victorious.

Wednesday was full of excitement and very messy. "Anything Goes" was the name of the day on Pearsons lawn. Representatives from all the Dorms competed in a sort of field day. Relay competitions challenged not only the teams, but the individual as well. For ex-back with a dixie cup on his forehead waiting for their partner to make an ice cream sundae. There was a catch to this competition. The person making the sundae could not bend down to put ingredients such as ice cream, chocolate syrup, nuts, and a cherry into the cup. Teams had an ice cream fight. Such events as this one made up "anything goes." Carnegie did it again and for the third time captured first place.

Thursday the competitions were over and points were calculated for all events. Gamble Hall had its very own dating game. Several contestants from all the residence halls were involved. The lobby was filled with spectators eager to see the chooser and the chosen.

Friday night in Lloyd lobby almost all the talent at MC came. "Coffee House" took place from nine o'clock until midnight. Any person who could sing, dance, or play an instrument, had the chance to show off their talents. There were many people participating.

On Saturday came the homecoming game. Before the game started the stadium was dedicated to Lloyd Thornton. It was a short but sweet ceremony. Unfortunately for the Scots, they were defeated by highly ranked Cumberland University.

At the half the homecoming court and winners of homecoming week were announced. The banner competition winners were the commuters. The spirit frame competition winners were Carnegie. In the overall homecoming competition, third place went to Gamble, second place went to Copeland, and the overall winner was Carnegie.

Later on that night was the homecoming dance. "Moondance-1993" was the conclusion of homecoming '93. The dance took place at Green Meadows Country Club. There was a live band present and the dance was full of MC students and some alumni. McCall enlightened the party with a rap that livened up the dance. Just a couple of weeks ago McCall was injured in a football game costing him his football career. McCall ended a busy and fun

Fighting Scots maintain 3-2 record

by Mary Beth Foxall

Coach Wilks believes that this year's freshman recruits are the best ever. This group of Jr. Scots proved themselves on the field last Monday by beating Cumberland 27 to 22.

However, it has been the Scot Seniors who have gained the intense focus needed to set the stage for the J.V. team. These Scots have helped young men better themselves by participating in specialized football camps sponsored by Maryville College.

The Scots hope to maintain the mental toughness needed to succeed on the field. Wilks stated that "Jay Teague (#36) and Billy Godfrey (#42) have a lot of ability and are quite consistent on the field".

Wilks also stated that these two Scots are clearly the two best inside linebackers on the team.

Wilks briefly spoke to Vance Grant (#5) during pre-season practice but never thought further about the situation. The first game proved apparent for Coach Wilks to call up Grant. "I thought Vance, then I knew (it should be) Vance" claimed Wilks. Prior to this past week's game, Grant made 4 out of 6 kicks, and at least three were 40 yards or more.

Junior quarterback John Berry Cox (#14) has also been a great asset to the team. This is Cox's second season throwing for the Scots. Cox and Adam Heiks (#15) have also proved to be very reliable for the football team. Senior member Nick Wilson (#83) did an outstanding job during the Homecoming game against Cumberland University. Although the Scots lost against the country's 20th ranked team, the Scots did manage to beat Tennessee Wesleyan this past weekend by a score of 30 to 20. Wilks said that Wesleyan's strong point was their size, speed, and aggressive style that would make them tough to beat.

The Scots will play out of town this week as they try to roll over Clinch Valley College. Their next home game will be November 6 against Tusculum College.

MC Football team's finest unexpectedly quit

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

"You can take a man out of the game, but you can't take the game out of the man."

For many players of professional sports this holds true, but for a small group of Maryville Scots football players the love for the game has subsided. Since pre-season practice, the Scots have lost over 20 players.

Scott McGaha, a sophomore who left the team after one year of playing, decided to focus on academic matters this year. "I just want to get my grades up," McGaha said. Another former Scot Allen Blackwell, who left Maryville last year, said "I just have too much to do," but hopes to return to football in the near future because he loves it.

One player, who refused to be identified, believes many of his teammates are leaving for personal reasons. Some former players say that they just didn't like the program here at Maryville, others have just lost interest in the game of football. Jay Teague, who recently left the football team said "It's [the love for football] just not there anymore." Teague also said there were personal reasons for leaving the team. Lorenzo Howard, an outside linebacker, left the Scots after a stellar performance at homecoming also gave personal reasons for leaving the football team. Howard, along with Teague did say that their disagreements with the coaches had a major impact on their decision on playing or not.

Many freshmen came to Maryville with the hope of continuing their high school glory by playing college football. Unlike their upperclassmen peers, many of them chose to leave before the season had begun. After seeing a lot of the their skills and prepare for their real games.

The Lady Scots have several strong points in their game play. Their serving is really strong. "We hardly ever miss a serve," said Kant.

During the game, the players work as a team. Even those who don't play get into the excitement of the game. The players on the bench encourage the starters.

The three senior girls are really the backbone of the team. Jenni McCafferty, Nikki Boop, and Dena Godsey are the team co-captains.

One other thing that helps the team is a new program this year called adopt a Lady Scot. The two objectives of this program is to get the community involved and help the team establish contacts with the community. The program has been very successful this year, and shows promise for years to come.

This weekend, the team will be traveling to Washington, D.C. to play in the Gallaudet Tournament.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial... Editorial

Sadly, this issue of the Echo contains an obituary of a student who suddenly died this summer.

Bobby Smith was a friend of many here, and will be missed.

Just two weeks ago, there was another student who, like Bobby, died in a car accident. Oscar Villamediana, a former student of the CELL program from Venezuela, died in Arizona. He was studying for a master's degree there.

I had the pleasure to meet Oscar here, and saw him last April when I went to Venezuela to visit Miguel Ginez, a friend and another former CELL student. Oscar came over to the hotel where my friends and I were staying, and he took us out to (of all places) McDonald's. He was, as always, charming. A true gentleman.

We talked about mutual friends, the campus of Maryville College, and the community. Although we laughed about the size of the college and the difficulty in finding a Maryville "night life," it was evident that Oscar really liked it here, and missed it.

During that week in Venezuela, I became aware of the connections I've made while a student here. The American friends accompanying me on the tour of Caracas were from Penn State and Akron University—big schools that probably have 10 times the international student population we have, but it was I who had connections to friends from Venezuela, Puerto Rico, Japan, Thailand, Bangladesh, and Norway, to name a few. My friends from the states were very impressed.

Make connections. It's advice we hear when looking for a job. But while we have the opportunity, we should make many connections. And through making connections, we should make friends.

Not for personal gain.

Not for a place to stay when we find ourselves in Caracas or Tokyo. For the enrichment of lives.

Bobby wasn't an international student, but I can imagine that the lives of the friends he made here were enriched by their knowing him—just as the lives of Oscar's friends were.

Students asked to approve Covenant

With the issues concerning campus safety, visitation, and confidentiality addressed in this issue, the Echo found it fitting to print the Covenant in its entirety. The goal of student senate is that it will be adopted by the student body and presented at convocation ceremonies in January.

Preface

Maryville College is related to the United Presbyterian Church in United States of America in a voluntary covenant. The College community, in the name of Jesus Christ, seeks to challenge all human beings to search for truth, to work for justice, to develop wisdom, and to become loving persons. To amplify noble ideals, the student body has developed its own covenant. The student covenant symbolized the fusion of basic values and ideals that people of all beliefs share.

The heart of the covenant lies in commitment, top integrity, responsibility of global citizenship, and appreciation of diversity. Individuals of high ethical standards do not lie, cheat or steal. They realize their responsibilities as members of the global community and are diligent in fulfilling them. They recognize that tolerance implies no lack of commitment for their own beliefs; rather it condemns the oppression of persecution of others.

The covenant began as an idea in the Student Senate in 1990. Today it is a reflection of the values and ethics of the Student body. As those ideals change, so will the covenant.

Maryville College Covenant

Maryville College is a community for learning that challenges students to grow in academic competence, personal and social maturity, and spiritual discernment and commitment. As scholars, we strive to maintain a high level of academic integrity. As young adults, we struggle to grow into responsible global citizens. As members of a spiritual community, we continue to develop a strong awareness of our individual faith while fostering a sensitivity understanding of all faiths.

People come to work at Yellowstone from all over the country, and the resulting mix is fascinating, both from a psychological and sociological standpoint. Like I said, the west is full of big spaces, so the comfort of being lost in the crowd is somewhat removed. Every individual stands out in relief, and that can be terrifying, tiring, or exhilarating, depending on what kind of person you are. The people who thrive there seem to share certain characteristics. First and foremost, they are individuals. They have a strong sense of identity - not an ego, really, just a firm understanding and acceptance of self. An ego must be bolstered and guarded; it manifests in a competitive sort of emotional selfishness. A genuine sense of identity frees a person to give more - to be more accepting and understanding, free from the constant drive to gain the emotional upper hand. I found myself surrounded by people who would have given me the shirt off their backs had I asked, and expected nothing in return. Another characteristic that seems to draw people westward is self-reliance. The people that I lived with in Montana are earthy - by "earthy," I do not mean that they wear Berkenstocks, smell like patchouli, make their own jewelry, and buy Greenpeace bumper stickers. I mean earthy as in close to the earth. They hike over it, ride up and down it, sleep on it, play around it, ingest its flora, and generally seem to understand it in a much more fundamental way than most of the starry-eyed young environmentalists that I have met. They willingly give up some of society's benefits to enjoy as much freedom from it as possible - and it is possible, to a much greater degree than I had thought.

My intention here is not to brag about my travels or present them as some sort of epic journey; my intention is to urge you all, particularly those of you who have lived in this area all your lives, to get out. Go and experience other places, other people, other attitudes. You may find that you are happiest where you were born... or maybe not. Don't let the decision be made for you by fear and apathy. I'm not a world traveler and I'm not trying to claim the west's superiority - it takes more than three months to get to know a region and its people. However, what may sound like exaggeration or idealism about the west stems from real incidents. Only recently have I had the time and distance to digest my experiences and gain a little perspective; while was in the midst of it sensory overload left no time for reflection, only action and reaction. But I felt like I had found a home.

But now I'm back in Maryville, in the foothills of God's own Smoky Mountains...

Correction: The Sept. 30 issue misspelled the Marriott Corporation's name. It is Marriott, not Mariott. The Homecoming Dance Schedule designated the Dance as taking place in Green Acres instead of the actual name, Green Meadows. We apologize for any inconveniences.

This covenant was developed and is maintained by the student body. Our community has an obligation and responsibility involving relationships and mutual understanding, appreciation, and respect. With this in mind, I, entering into a covenant with all other members of the Maryville College community, vow:

- to pursue lifelong goals of education and scholarship;
- to encourage and support my fellow students as they aspire to be honest in their academic endeavors, as well as their personal relationships;
- to respect each member of our community for his/her individuality regardless of race, gender, religion, national or ethnic origin, socio-economic background, philosophy, or affectional preference;
- to act with integrity in all interactions-academic, personal, and beyond;
- to respect the rights of others be they property, privacy, opinion, or expression;
- to perpetuate sound moral and ethical values in my dealings with the Maryville College community and the global community.

Upholding these standards is vital to my continued growth as a person. I realize that nothing is produced by those from whom nothing is expected and recognize that constantly challenging myself to become a better person is the only way to achieve that end.

Four presidents and sixty-three years separate the guidance of Samuel Tyndale Wilson and Dr. Gerald Gibson as Maryville College presidents, but the hope of the former is the same of the latter—that the institution would become “beyond question, the best possible college.”

In his introduction of Maryville College's tenth president during inauguration ceremonies Saturday, Dr. Norman Fintel, Roanoke College President Emeritus, said: “He is a disgustingly hard worker. Maryville College has shown extraordinary wisdom and insight in choosing Gerald Gibson.”

Before coming to Maryville College in July, Gibson was vice president and dean of Roanoke College. He has publications in higher education, chemistry, and poetry. His most recent book is titled “Good Start: A Guidebook for New Faculty in Liberal Arts Colleges.”

Gibson's own “good start” and hard work at Maryville College will stem from the pledge made in his inaugural address to maintain the college's commitment to the liberal arts education, and to make it “the best possible model for others.”

The president described himself as a “newcomer to the tribe at the

Enrollment miscalculation forces major budget cuts

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

There are some themes on this and other college campuses which always seem to come up in conversation. Money is one of those topics. Talking about money is about as common as discussing the weather.

Yet when it comes down to specifics, many members of the college community have only a vague idea of the school's financial processes.

An example of this is the recent budget reduction of nearly $1 million. In the approved budget last April, administration budgeted for a growth of 40 new students. In reality, those 40 students didn't enroll and another 40 students didn't return.

The revenue generated by 80 students has a big impact on the budget of a small school such as Maryville.

People may think it sounds scary, and jump to conclusions — “How will we survive if they cancel all of our activities and only offer five classes a semester?”

In reality, this is not the case at all. “We don't foresee any major reductions in programs,” said Vice-President of Student Affairs Sue Wyatt. “We're just reducing in all areas as much as possible.”

In small ways, this means that the faculty is cutting down on the number of copies they make, the amounts of office supplies they use, long distance phone calls, and other parts of office management.

Repairs on scientific equipment and audio-visual supplies has been delayed. There have also been fewer purchases of library items, such as books..

The largest part of the reduction affects the part-time faculty. Some spring courses and a few January

What the cuts will mean to students

by Ayesha Dastgir
Staff Writer

The budget cuts will effect the students, according to Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president of Student Life in the following ways:

□ The club sports and cheerleading programs will be taken over by the student senate or through the efforts of student fund raising events.

□ There will be a fewer educational programs relating to preventive health and resident life.

□ The hours for the swimming pool will be cut down.

□ There will be less mail and flyers from the student programming office.

□ Commuter students will face a delay in getting their newsletters.

□ Only “essential” sports equipment will be replaced.

"Echo" becomes subject of journalism research

by Karen Beaty
Editor

Maryville College's "Highland Echo" will be the subject of a research project conducted by a graduate student at the University of Tennessee.

Cindy Roberts, who hopes to graduate in December with a master's degree in communication, said she was turned on to the idea of working with a small college newspaper after talking to Echo advisor Jeff Gary, a former classmate in media technology at UT. "He realized research on the 'Highland Echo' would be beneficial. So we discussed what would help him, and what would benefit me."

The research project will try to define what students—Maryville College students—want in a school newspaper. Roberts believes that her findings would be consistent with what students at other small colleges want. She said she thought about studying other school newspapers for the purposes of comparing and contrasting, but with a limited time frame, wanted to "remain more focused."

Roberts took her idea to a university committee for approval. In getting the go-ahead, she was instructed to organize focus groups that would be fair representations of Maryville College's students in gender and year in school.

"I decided to go through the RD's," said Roberts, when asked how she chose students for the focus groups. "Everyone I talked to was very helpful," she added. Resident Directors either recommended students who might be interested, or they consulted with their staffs for ideas.

Roberts recruited 24 students to compose three focus groups. (Echo staff members were not eligible, as Roberts felt they would have a "natural bias.") Two focus groups met, and the third will be asked to meet if Roberts discovers that the opinions of the first and second group contradict each other.

Roberts met with focus groups last Wednesday and Thursday nights. Students were asked to look over the last two issues of the Echo, and newspapers from Milligan, Bryan, Tennessee Wesleyan, and Knoxville Colleges. Students evaluated each newspaper's use of format, photography, graphics, and writing.

"It went beautifully," said Roberts of the discussion. "[Students] did most of the talking. Almost everybody had an opinion."

The final draft of the project report is due before Thanksgiving. Roberts said she plans to give the results to the Echo staff in December.

Echo staff members plan to look at the results and make the necessary, feasible changes students in the focus groups suggested.

sions Donna Davis. "We had purchased almost all our supplies for this year by last March."

Despite all of the adjustments that have to be made, people are hopeful. "This is just a problem we've had to deal with this year, I think," said Alden Stewart, chairman of the Budget Committee. "We've really taken it in stride."

Gibson said he felt connected to past presidents in purpose, pledging to continue in their goals, two of which are to "keep the latchstring out for all students," and to continue in "whole person education."

Gibson's dreams for the college were five-fold:

"I hope that by the year 2000, we will have a historically large student body... a robust fiscal health... a full restoration of the Maryville campus... service and learning which are thoroughly integrated... [and] the liveliest, very best liberal arts education anywhere."

And true to Fintel's witness, Gibson ended the address with: "Let the work begin."

term experiential classes that were to be taught by adjunct faculty were canceled.

Also, some raises that were planned for this semester were put on hold for this spring or next fall. The time when they will be given depends on the enrollment for The budgeting problem arose when approximately 750 students, the largest number of applicants on record, were expected, and only 655 enrolled. A large part of this gap seems to have been caused by the delayed financial aid forms. Many students could not wait for their results and chose instead to attend state schools closer to their homes.

Not many changes occurred in the admissions funding for this year, however. "Our funds are committed," said Vice-President of Admis-

Recent MC Grads find employment on campus

Mark

Mark seeks more African-American students to attend MC

by Sharon Graves
Staff Writer

A recent graduate of Maryville College in May 1993, Kelin Mark has become a new staff member of Maryville College's Admission staff.

Mark travels to high schools to take part in college fairs in the tri-cities of East Tennessee, and areas in and around Nashville, Chattanooga, parts of Middle Tennessee, and also Birmingham, AL. He takes students who are interested in attending Maryville College through the admission process.

Mark, who also played varsity basketball, graduated from Maryville College with a B.A. in business. Little did he know that he would become a part of Maryville College's staff. Mark enjoys the job because he is able to "talk to the different parents of students and students who are interested in attending Maryville College," adding that they "enjoy talking to me more because I attended and graduated from Maryville College."

Mark says there is a transition to make from student to staff. "I get a more personal side of the faculty than I could have gotten as a student," he stated.

Mark views this job as a rewarding experience. He is able to enhance his communicating skills by putting them to use when he attends college fairs and other engagements.

"I would like to see more African-American students choosing to attend Maryville. That is one goal of this job that I would like to pursue," Mark said.

Moore

Moore learns from Christian Fellowship

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

Rita Lynn Moore, a former student at Maryville, is working with InterVarsity Christian Fellowship at Maryville College.

Moore, of Oak Ridge, worked with the organization while a student at Maryville. She graduated in May 1993 with a major in Sign Language Interpreting. She said the InterVarsity offices were "considering looking to get a part-time staffer here. I got this 20-21 page application in the mail... all essay questions, and I mailed it back."

After some informal interviews, Moore got the job, officially starting September 1.

Her job as a "campus trainee" is to help with paperwork and administrative duties of the organization on the Maryville College campus.

Moore does not miss schoolwork—her schedule is usually so full she has little time for anything else. One of her duties includes writing one biweekly report and a monthly report on InterVarsity progress.

"I'm learning a lot about myself," said Moore, introspective. "God has revealed areas in my life I need to work on, and this job works on those areas."

Moore says she thoroughly enjoys her work. "I've met a lot of neat people," and of the InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, "It's about loving people and accepting people for who they are through Jesus Christ... It's a Christian organization which seeks God's will."

Of the new position, Moore said "I'm learning more than I could ever teach."

Porter

Porter shares his experience with younger players

by Jed Tuiolosega
Staff Writer

Recent Maryville College graduate Scott Porter is currently an assistant football coach under Head Coach Phil Wilks.

Porter graduated from Maryville College in May of 1993 with a major in management and a minor in biology. While at Maryville he participated in varsity football. His contributions to academics and athletics are what made Porter very popular with the students and faculty at Maryville College.

"I chose Maryville College due to the fact that it was a small school and I liked smaller size classes. I also had the chance to play football," said Porter. His freshman year was his best. He was nationally ranked as a punter and kicker.

Coaching allows Porter to help the younger athletes excel in their position and share some of his experiences with them. "The benefit of a small school is that a coach can work on a one-on-one basis with a student and an athlete. I wouldn't trade my experiences at MC for the world. I've had the chance to make lifelong friends as well as obtain a great education," he said. Coaching gives this alumnus the chance to continue making friends while allowing him to teach.

Porter's future plans getting a master's degree and becoming a high school teacher. He is taking a semester off of school to coach one year under Phil Wilks. He wants to get some coaching experience under his belt.

Porter is a person who is willing to share his time and experiences.

Sohrabi

Sohrabi assists with coaching soccer men and women

by Jed Tuiolosega
Staff Writer

Maryville College graduate Ben Sohrabi is the men's and women's assistant soccer coach and building supervisor for the P.E. building at Maryville College. Sohrabi, a former soccer player for the Scots, had a stellar career for MC. His major was business with a minor in economics while here.

Sohrabi chose a small school over many Division-1 schools. While in high school, he rejected offers from Division-1 schools that offered to give him full rides. "Maryville offered a great education, and knowing the coach influenced my decision in coming to Maryville College. I don't like big schools. The small town atmosphere is wonderful. I like to know everyone and like everyone knowing me," he said.

After Maryville, Sohrabi spent a year in Nashville running a soccer association. He held the title of executive director. He then tried his hand at business and did not find it to his liking. When an opening for an assistant soccer coach at Maryville College came up, he applied and was chosen for the job. The administration along with the coaches were very supportive in Sohrabi's hiring.

The future looks bright for Sohrabi. He plans to someday become a head soccer coach at some university. "I have no regrets or dismays of MC. I love working with young people. Coaching allows me to influence young people in a positive way. Maryville College allows me to teach and learn about people," said Sohrabi.

Wardeska makes the most of her sign language interpreting skills

by Ayesha Dastgir

Angela Wardeska, who is from Johnson City, TN, decided she was interested in interpreting while in high school. She found out that Maryville College offered a four year course in Sign Language Interpreting and decided to come here. She graduated from Maryville College with a degree in Sign Language Interpreting in May 1993.

She is presently working as a lab assistant in the sign language lab at MC and also as a freelance interpreter at Knoxville Area Community Center of the Deaf (KACCD). Her job at MC is only six weeks old and she said she feels a little unsure about it. Even though lab work and interpreting are related, they are somewhat different. "Interpreting is usually just one person, and not a group. But lab work can be like support work—it's not as stressful because you can stop and think what sign choices would be."

Angela helps students in the 302 and 303 level sign language courses who have lab assignments. She helps them with suggestions about the sign choices and different assignments. "We use a combination of both signing and talking to figure out what sign choices to use."

She meets with the students every Tuesday from 4 to 6 p.m. at the sign language lab in the Sutton Science building.

Her job at KACCD, which is a referral agency, is "basically that of a 'freelance interpreter.'"

Whiskers and ghostly girl help give MC the creeps

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

Ghosts roaming the campus? Quite possible at an old school such as Maryville, and the stories abound. It seems they have been floating around, so to speak, at least since Weldon Hila wrote his story, "Whiskers," in 1930, about the ghost supposedly residing in Anderson Hall.

Conflicting accounts slam into each other around MC concerning the Anderson Hall ghost. According to some, he is the ghost of a former MC night watchman known as Whiskers. Others claim that he was a civil war soldier who died in Anderson. One constant detail throughout all of the stories is that the ghost has a peg leg.

Interestingly enough, the origin of Whiskers is a story most likely written as exercise in short fiction for Writer's Workshop. According to Hila's story, the ghost in Anderson is that of a civil war soldier who died there. He apparently cannot rest until he finds his amputated leg, which the night watchman apparently has promised to find for him.

While this tale is interesting enough, and it explains the myths surrounding Anderson's ghost, it does not explain the experiences that faculty members and students alike have shared late at night in Anderson. It fails to explain the doors that mysteriously open and shut, the sound of keys jingling in the hall when no one else is around. It does not explain the phantom that occasionally comes knocking on the unwary professor's door, or the shadows often seen lurking on the third floor. One student commented, "I don't know what's going on, but it's downright spooky." Another student added, "There has to be a ghost. What else would repeatedly do the same things for so many years?"

Whiskers is not alone as the only ghost on the MC campus. According to a number of Pearson's residents, they have their very own specter. It is supposedly the ghost of a girl who died when the fourth floor of Pearson's hall burned on February 13, 1972. However, when the fourth floor burned, everyone made it out safely, and the fire was extinguished without any casualties.

Just as the fictitious story "Whiskers" fails to explain away the strange happenings of Anderson, so fails the 1972 fire. A number of Pearson's residents have heard someone walking up and down the halls when no one else is in the building. Many Pearson's residents have had their keys pushed from tables and dressers onto the floor, or lifted from a hook and dropped by and unseen force. And there have even been reports of a girl sighted in the window of Pearson's attic, "where there aren't any stairs," the reporting student explained.

Maryville College seems to be chock full of unexplained mysteries. Secret passages, tunnels, ghosts, you name it, and we seem to have it. It is all a part of our 175 year-old history.

Third floor Pearson's residents claim to hear bumps in the night on the floor above them. But nobody lives in the attic.

Ghost in theatre creates its own drama behind the scenes

There's one thing which past and present theatre majors agree—spirits are living in the theatre complex.

Their definition of what the spirits are exactly is debated. "I don't like to use the word 'ghost.' I think it's the spirit of someone who really loved theatre. It binds us together," said Julie Walker, a senior minor-ing in theatre.

This spirit is called by name—Lilly.

She lives in the costume room and makes frequent appearances on the catwalk and in the prop rooms. In recent shows, props have been taken on opening nights, only to be replaced after the curtain falls.

Students have it from unearthly sources that Lilly worked backstage, but always wanted an acting role. Walker and another theatre participant, Nancy Allen, believe that Lilly has a favorite costume—a short black and white dress.

A portrait found in the prop room exactly illustrates the person students claim to have seen (and still see).

"I think it's the spirit of someone who really loved theatre. It binds us together."

—Julie Walker, senior

Lilly is not he only spirit to live in the theatre. A ghost by the name of Andrew lives downstairs, under the stage. Theatre students believe that he was in love with Lilly, but ended the relationship because he fell in love with an actress. By sitting under the stage, he waits for her to speak and sing. Many students who have worked on sets downstairs claim to have felt something brush up against them. But Andrew is not thought to be friendly, like Lilly.

Students also claim to have seen flashes of lights going across the house, and have heard giggling from unknown places and names whispered while on stage.

Many theatre students don't find it unbelievable to have a presence there. "Everyone acknowledges her," said Walker. "She's like tradition."

Allen added: "When you're acting, you create another person with its own energy. At the close of a show, where does all of that energy go?"

MC football team 4-0 against arch rivals

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College football team has had its ups and downs the past two football games. The Scots had a poor performance against Clinch Valley losing 29-10, but came back the following week to defeat Rhodes 16-12.

The Scots traveled to Wise, Va., to face the Highland Cavaliers of Clinch Valley in a contest held on Oct. 16. The Scots (3-2) went into the game hoping to shut down the running game of Clinch Valley but had their problems stopping the Cavs. The Scots defense gave up 347 yards on the ground and allowed Cavs quarterback David Nara to pass for an additional 44 yards for a total of 391 yards total offense.

Maryville took an early 3-0 lead on a 44-yard field goal by Vance Grant that was a result of a Peter Oakes fumble recovery on the Cavs first possession. That would be it for the Scots scoring in the first half as Clinch Valley scored on their final three possessions of the half to take a 16-3 lead.

Clinch Valley scored another touchdown and led 23-3 before Maryville took the ensuing kickoff and mounted a scoring drive early in the fourth quarter. Scots quarterback John Barry Cox completed passes of 19 and 12 yards to Doug Parris, and Greg Shelton had runs of five, eight, and six yards to set up the one-yard touchdown run by Cox. Grant added the extra point to pull the Scots to within 23-10.

Clinch Valley finished off the Scots on their next possession as Nara rushed for a one-yard touchdown, his third of the afternoon. The extra point was blocked but still gave the Cavs a 29-10 lead.

The Maryville offense gave one last try on their final possession as Cox hit Nick Wilson for a 77-yard touchdown pass that was called back due to a penalty. The Scots failed to score again in the game giving the Cavs a 29-10 victory. The loss gave Maryville a 3-3 record going into the next game with Division III rival Rhodes College.

The following Saturday the Scots traveled to Memphis to battle the Lynx of Rhodes College. Rhodes came into the game with momentum from a win over Sewanee the previous week and an average of 235 passing yards per game. Maryville had to overcome a disappointing defensive showing at Clinch Valley and did so in dramatic fashion by holding Rhodes to just

Two fumbled punts, one a controversial call by the officials, set up potential scores for Rhodes. The Lynx capitalized on the first fumbled punt early in the third quarter to decrease the Scots lead to 16-12. The second fumbled punt was recovered by Rhodes at the Maryville two-yard line where the Scots defense totally stopped the Rhodes offense. After a first play penalty put the Rhodes offense back at the seven, Maryville stopped a running play to make it second-and-seven at the seven. The Scots Chad Smith then intercepted a Glorioso pass in the end zone to end the Rhodes threat and maintain a 16-12 lead.

Maryville failed to move the ball on the ensuing drive and was forced to punt giving Rhodes the ball with less than two and a half minutes left. The Rhodes offense moved the ball to the four-yard line to set up a fourth-and-two situation with less than a minute left in the contest. The Maryville defense rose to the occasion once more to stop Rhodes and go on to win 16-12 in a hard fought game.

The Scots offense was led by Ron Silver who had two touchdowns on 113 yards rushing. Greg Shelton who added 112 yards. Maryville quarterback John Barry Cox also had a strong showing completing 9 of 17 passes for 92 yards and rushing for 42 yards.

The Scots defense was represented well at all positions. Billy Godfrey was the leading tackler with 17, and Terrel Alexander had a strong showing with 11 tackles. Chad Smith had a fumble recovery and a key interception while Peter Oakes added 10 tackles and a fumble recovery.

The Scots win moves them to a 4-3 record on the season. They will travel to Fayetteville, N.C. this Saturday to face Methodist College.

Team members huddle around Coach Porter for instructions during a game earlier this season.

Maryville scored on their first possession with an eight-yard touchdown run by Ron Silver. The extra point was blocked but the 70-yard drive gave the Scots momentum. The Scots then scored again on their second possession with a 23-yard field goal by Vance Grant to take an early first quarter lead 9-0.

Maryville scored for the final time late in the second period on a two-yard run by Silver giving him his second touchdown of the game and Maryville a 16-0 lead. Rhodes struck back just before the half on a seven-yard touchdown pass. They then went for the two-point conversion that failed when Peter Oakes sacked Rhodes quarterback Jimmy Glorioso. The Scots led 16-6 at the half.

Special team mistakes almost killed the Scots in the second half.

Seasons draw to a close for soccer teams

by Karen Beaty
Editor

With three teams left to play, and five defeats under their Umbros, the pressure intensifies for players of the Maryville College Men's Soccer team who want an invitation to a tournament.

But it is possible.

"The men are on the bubble," explained Head Coach Pepe Fernandez. "Four losses tend to get you in, and we have five."

The men's record is 11-5-1, after Sunday's win over Thomas More College, 7-0.

The previous game at Maryville against Ripon College was impressive as well. Leading scorers Chris Reid, a freshman, and Todd Tompkins, a senior, together kicked in five goals. Other successful goal attempts by Stian Jordalen, Chad Brown, and Badia Katambwa finalized the score at 8-1.

The soccer team has three more regularly scheduled games left in the season. The next match-up will be against Cumberland University on Thursday.

Fernandez doesn't make any bones about the pressure his team is up against. "It's going to be awful tough for us."

The Lady Scots soccer team won its last game of the season over Centre College Tuesday 3-2.

After Sunday's defeat by Thomas More College, the ladies' record was 9-9. Fernandez said he doesn't exactly feel that it is a disappointing record. "We've had a good group of people to play. It's been a good season."

Injury plagued the team early on. All-American Senior Julie Dingles fell with a knee injury in early September. Freshman Leslie Piety prematurely ended her season Oct. 14 with injuries yielding a compression fracture of her cervical vertebrae. The following Sunday, the Lady Scots without Piety, lost to Rhodes College 4-0.

Softball player Liz Helle stepped in to help the Lady Scots as a goalkeeper. With her in position, the Scots beat Ripon College 1-0. At that point, the record was 9-7. A defeat by Depaw University brought them to 9-8.

Overall leading scorers on the team have been Jarra Griffith and Christine Neal.

Fernandez was confident that his team would finish the season with a winning record.

A. DAY in the LIFE

by Alene Day

This is the first installment of what will be a regular column in the Echo by me — Alene. Some of you may be asking yourself: "Who the heck is Alene Day?" Some of you who know me may be asking yourself: "Why would the Echo give a column to an illiterate art major?" Then some of you may be asking: "Why doesn't she just get on with it?" So...here goes...

My name is Alene Day, I am a senior (I think), and an art major. I am not a writing major, or a minor for that matter, so I won't even try to kid myself or you that my column will be grammatically correct or well structured. As an artist I am always looking for a creative outlet and I thought that this column would be a new and interesting medium.

First off, I want to tell you about a new place that just opened right up the road. Lowell's Place now occupies what was, up until recently, the Jailhouse Lounge, an establishment where one had to question: Which came first? The name or the bars on the windows? But Lowell's would never be confused with its dark and rather frightening predecessor. Lowell (I guess) cleaned the place up, installed good lighting, and took the massive step of making it a smoke-free environment. As a smoker, I will admit that it is a hassle to leave my cold beer and enter out into the even colder night to join my fellow comrades in the unusually bonding experience of sharing a cigarette. But, I have to respect Lowell for the stance that he has taken and maintained through all of our whining. He chose to own and work in a non-smoking atmosphere, and he knows that he is paying a pretty penny for that decision. Maryville, Tennessee, is not famous for its health consciousness, and Lowell knows he would probably double his clientele if he were to change his policy, but he won't—and he owns the place—and that's cool. I must admit that I smoke about one quarter the number of cigarettes I would if I were in any other bar, so my lungs thank Lowell. BUT, (amazingly enough) this is not my point, my point is that Lowell's is a great place about three minutes away from the campus that has good, affordable food (ten cent hot wings for example), and you can't beat 50 cent drafts and $2.50 pitchers! But the real clincher is that now three of our own are supplying quality entertainment on Friday and Saturday nights. Spears Driskell, Kevin Ragsdale, and Kelly Meacham perform both unpretentiously and competently using acoustic guitars and a (sometimes amusing) variety of percussion instruments (i.e. medicine bottles filled with beads) to create music that is conducive to good times. Spears and Kelly do the singing, everything from the Dead to Drivin' and Cryin'. My personal favorites are an eerily realistic rendition of Neil Young's "Pocohantas" sung by Spears, and the unexpectedly successful combining of Blues Traveler's "But Anyway" with a smooth segue into "All Along the Watch Tower" (two thumbs up!). Ragsdale has yet to pipe up and sing (even though we know he can), but in the meantime he plays the hell out of the guitar. Believe it or not, this is not a restaurant review or a music review, this is a plea to the students of MC to take advantage of the opportunity to have a place to go that's right in our backyard. Personally, after three years of hauling back and forth to Knoxville every time I want to go out, it's a welcome change to have a hip hang-out in our immediate area. So...for good food, good music, good friends, and good cheap beer...check out Lowell's Place (head towards the mountains and it's on the left, just past Food Lion).

The second thing that I want to throw at you is a question. "Where the heck was the student body at President Gibson's inauguration?!" There has only been ten inaugurations now in 175 years, I would think that you could make it to ONE. It was embarrassing to the students that were there, and for the faculty as well. My guess was that there were approximately fifty students there. Thirty of which were the choir, ten of which were the ushers, and then ten other miscellaneous students such as myself. I understand that a lot of people were out of town, and that we are all very busy here at mid-term with exams, senior theses, etc...but really guys, that was pathetic. I'm really glad that I went, I got to meet President Gibson and his wife Rachel, and to wish them luck here at MC. I also got to meet some of the board members and other affiliates of the college. Someone, somewhere, at some point made the student body feel like unless we were on senate, or a presidential scholar, or a Who's Who, or whatever, that we were not supposed to meet or want to meet these "big-wigs" of our school—that we were somehow an obstacle or an embarrassment and not to be seen (eating in dorm lobbies, parking, etc...) when these big campus events were going on. But here I was, just your average chick with a low GPA, responsible to nobody but myself, and I met some really great people who were nothing but friendly and receptive to me. It was also nice to run into some professors that I hadn't seen in a long time and shoot the bull. I don't know why everyone thinks that events such as these are so "uncool." What could be cooler than hangin' out with people fifty times more educated than yourself hoping that a little ounce of wisdom will find its way into your brain? And if we're really lucky, a bit of our ideas will nestle into their brains and help them understand us better. I'm serious!!! Well, if nothing else, my teachers saw me there which makes me look good. You all missed out.

Oh well, on that note I'll quit babbling. I look forward to the next issue. Let me know what you think, and what you want to talk about—I'm open to just about anything (P.O.Box 2280). I'll leave you with a quote...

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .

Editorial

I have witnessed apathy at Maryville College many times during by four years of here.

But nothing like the apathy shown by the majority of the student body during last weekend's inaugural ceremony.

Actually, last Saturday was a day of mixed feelings for me. Watching the bagpiper lead the academic procession of more than 100 professors and delegates to the Wilson Chapel, I was caught up in excitement. And, the risk of sounding cheezy, I felt proud—like I was finally taking part in a tradition.

But soon after, my feelings were squashed. I realized that inside the chapel, I shared those feelings with only about 50 of my fellow students. And that number includes the ensemble and choir.

When Dr. Harry Howard, speaking on behalf of the faculty, challenged Dr. Gibson to be a professor, there were few students to whom he would profess.

When Jenny Cummings, speaking on behalf of the student body, charged Dr. Gibson with being our "visionary leader," there were few students whom he would lead.

And when Dr. Gibson spoke in support of liberal arts institutions, there were few students who would celebrate that "whole person education."

In earlier drafts of this editorial, I attempted to explain the absence of about 95 percent of the student body during the inauguration, because as an editor, it's my responsibility to look at both sides. I thought that maybe, maybe there was a good reason for the apathy.

But I can't find one.

(I realize that some sports teams were gone for away games. They are exempt from this tounge-lashing.)

Students were invited to attend. Invitations were put into mailboxes, the electronic sign in the post office flashed it, and the Echo ran a front page story. Lack of communication is not an excuse now.

Yes, it was a beautiful fall day. But, if memory serves me correctly, fall comes around every year. Historically, Maryville College inducts a president—on average—every 19 years. How many of us plan to come to the next?

But my feeling of disappointment stems from more than just students skipping a college function. By not committing one hour of our weekend imply that we are uninterested in the goals of a man who will guide our alma mater in the years to come? Do we have the attention span of a two-year old?

The questions didn't end there. On Monday, I was told that some of the 175th anniversary banners were stolen. To avoid more theft, all of them were taken down. Who stole them? Why? Obviously, not only does apathy reign on campus, but also crime—a real setback for students who ask to be treated like adults. And a real slap in the face to a student senate that has worked hard to convince administration we are responsible enough to live and abide by a covenant based on concern, commitment, and integrity.

I've always heard that only 5 percent of students on campus are leaders with initiative. After Saturday's showing, I tend to agree.

If I'm wrong, I'd like to be told. But better yet, I'd love to be shown.

by Dave Roberts

Hey, kids. Welcome to the "Oh my God, did you say my deadline is tomorrow?" edition of Dave's World.

What's up? How are you guys doing this semester? Same old cycle, huh? At the beginning of the semester, you start out thinking: "Okay, a fresh new semester, a new start. This time, I'm going to really hit the books, cause I absolutely have to bring my grades up or I'm screwed. I'm not going to go out except for on weekends... and I'm going to get to bed on time... and I'll study... and I won't procrastinate and stuff. Yeah, a new start!"

That stage lasts about two weeks.

Then, that evil demon that lurks in academic institutions everywhere leaps on your shoulder and starts whispering, quietly at first, but eventually roaring through your thoughts:

"You know, you really don't have to read this whole chapter right this exact second. After all, you have a whole semester to catch up. Sure, you're not totally prepared for that quiz tomorrow, but the two lowest quiz grades get dropped, remember? So anyway... what? Oh, Dr. _____ said that only had to be four pages long, and you don't even have to have sources... you could do that tomorrow morning before class. Yeah, you should definitely drink a few beers tonight."

This stage continues roughly until you get your midterm test grades back. That's when the demon starts saying, "No problem, you can just make A's and B's for the rest of the semester." This stage continues until about two weeks before finals. Then, suddenly, the demon is no where to be found. This begins the brief "Holy failure, Batman, my grades bite!" stage.

And then comes the night: two days until finals, calculator gripped in sweaty palm, stomach sinking as you discover that you need a 97 or higher on all your finals to escape being castrated by your parents and put on academic probation by the college. Might as well drink a few beers.

Same old same old.

But hey, speaking of something completely different, isn't campus looking spiffy this year? I've considered, actually, devoting some of my legendary journalistic talent to help write a new brochure about our glorious college. That way I could lure some innocent, nubile, shapely young... er... people into our community. (However, I fear I don't have much of a future in journalism - like Hunter S. Thompson, I deal too often in truths rather than facts... or maybe I just don't deal well with deadlines... or maybe I just suck wind). Here's an excerpt:

DAVE'S MARYVILLE "FIGHTING SCOTS (WHAT'S A 'SCOT?') COLLEGE BROCHURE

Introducing Carnegie Hall: the pride of Maryville's new look, this luxurious dorm provides a sense of community, nay even family. You can listen to the comforting sounds of your neighbor's slightest movements through the attractively thin walls, reassuring you of their constant presence. If you choose to live on one of the upper floors, you will get a bonus: the elevator will actually work, for up to two weeks at a time! Sure, every time you walk in you have to fumble for your late key because ALL the doors are ALWAYS locked, but that doesn't affect your warm sense of security from friends and pizza delivery men. The relentless, seemingly infinite, seemingly eternal toiling of our construction crews is a testament to our dedication to perfection. We won't stop until we are done, and we will take all the time we need to do it right. You will be reminded of our dedication by the reassuring pounding of hammers and whining of saws outside your window, waking you in time for your 7:00 class. In fact, sometimes our fun-loving construction workers will simply beat two pieces of metal together to make sure you know they are hard at work at SEVEN O'FREAKING CLOCK in the FREAKING MORNING.

Like I said, maybe journalism isn't my thing.

Seriously, though, what's up with all the renovation? I tend to be skeptical of forced appearances, in people and in places. The constant prettying-up (for lack of a better term) going on around this campus rubs me the wrong way, for some reason I can't quite put my finger on. Just something about it - all these flower gardens around Anderson, Carnegie, and the CCM - all these new sidewalks going the same places eight different ways - all these dignified looking chairs and lamps and tables in the "parlor" or Carnegie (with books casually lying on the tables, as if anyone ever hung out in there, much less read classical literature) - that pitiful, low-budget thing I guess is supposed to be a fountain in the lobby of Pearsons... I mean, I'm glad they are trying to make the college look better, but it already looks great. We have towering trees, huge green fields of grass, and our very own woods. We have squirrels and birds chatting with us, leaves trying on rainbows above us, and mountains faithfully guarding our horizon. Nature has provided us with more beauty than most people here take advantage of, or even appreciate. The last thing we need is some neatly symmetrical little system of sidewalks and flower patches. That kind of artificial aesthetics is for colleges who find themselves in the unsavory position of being stuck in the middle of a city. We are swimming natural beauty, why don't we leave it alone?

Like most other things, it's all about money. The college gets a large portion of its money from alumni, and either 1. the alumnus donates it specifically towards some cheesy "let's make the campus beautiful" project, wanting their money and their name to show, or 2. the administration wants to assure visiting alumni that it is hard at work improving the campus with their money, so it plants flashy gardens so the old folks can "oooh" and "aaah."

As a student (and I think most students would agree with me, though I've gotten burned saying that before), I wouldn't care if they ripped up half the sidewalks on campus. It doesn't make me any happier to see all the perfectly shaped flower gardens. I don't gain any inner peace walking through the immaculate parlor in Carnegie. And that fountain in Pearsons: it's ugly. I mean hideously ugly. Ugly, on a Biblical scale. It is an altar on which to make sacrifices to the god of ugliness. It is the very essence of ugliness given material form. It is so ugly that if a group of ugliness-worshippers said, "Let's make the ugliest fountain ever," they would have to work really, really hard to make one as ugly as the one in our cafeteria. U-G-L-Y, it ain't got no alibi, it's ugly. And it doesn't make the food taste any better.

That is my point (yes, I do have one). Couldn't all this money be better spent? I was sitting in Anderson - this poorly heated, poorly cooled, drafty, aged, disintegrating monument to the architectural skills of people who have been dead since the Civil War - and it occurred to me: the students pay to go here. The college is our client. Ideally, it should be spending all the money it possibly can on making our education more complete and our lives more comfortable. Why not take the $3.50 it took to build that ugly fountain and use it to buy lettuce that isn't brown? Why not take the money used to put those self-serving "Maryville College 175th Anniversary" flags up on the light poles and use it to keep the library and the computer labs open longer? Why not take all that money going to flower gardens and sidewalks and devote it to academics? What a nifty idea. Maybe, when the old folks come back to Homecoming in their sedans and minivans, they won't be as impressed as they would be by pretty flowers. But then again, they already got their four years, didn't they?

Fayerweather renovation plans in the works

by Sharon Graves
Staff Writer

Fayerweather Hall is looking toward renovation.

The motive behind renovation is to improve student activity accommodations. The plan is that the first floor of Fayerweather will serve as a student activity center. The students will have access to pool tables, ping pong tables, a conference room, and also other game activities. This accommodation will take over the space that is now the student development office. Those offices will be moved to the second floor of Fayerweather.

The renovation process, at the present time, is in a primary stage. All the floor plans have not been completely drawn to decide on how the existing building spaces will be constructed.

"Right now we're still in the planning process," said Andy McCall, physical plant director. Committee meetings are being held in the student development office in order to help make decisions about how the floor plans will be developed. The individuals in these meetings are representatives of organizations now occupying office space in Fayerweather. Student development is working with committee members to determine how much practical working space is needed for operation. "A compromise will have to come out of all this somehow," said Stephanie Wyatt, director of residence life.

Once the amount of space for each organization is determined, McCall will work to determine the specifics of the floor plans. "I will have to compare existing space in relation to what wants to be done. The plans are still being worked on. We are rapidly approaching the point and time where we will be out

For the past few weeks, signs have been up all over campus asking for donations for Reggie Chery. Probably almost everyone has seen his name, but not everyone knows his situation.

Chery is a freshman Bonner Scholar from Palm Bay, FL (but originally from New York, NY). Recruited to play basketball for the Scots, Chery was to play a post position on the court.

But last month, Chery was diagnosed with t-cell leukemia.

"He was feeling tired all the time," said Dave Powell, Chery's inquiry professor. "He kept blaming himself."

Chery finally went to see a doctor and was immediately placed in the hospital. According to Powell, the doctor suspected that it was leukemia, but did not say so until he knew for sure.

When the diagnosis was confirmed, Chery was sent to Florida rightaway. He is there now and will remain for as long as necessary. This time in the hospital will include four to six weeks of intensive chemotherapy and other medical attention. "We really don't know a whole lot," Powell said.

Right now, he seems to be feeling fine, and his friends are looking forward to his return.

Bonner coordinator Steven Nickle said that Chery's current status with the Bonner Foundation is a "leave of absence," adding that the college "is planning on his return, but doesn't know when that will happen."

Assistant basketball coach Dean Walsh said he believes, too, that Reggie will soon be back on campus. "He is an extremely hard worker. Four years ago, he didn't even make the [high school team]. He has worked himself up to a position where he could have been a major contributor to this year's team."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR...

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2148.

Dear Editor,

The ghost story in the Oct. 29 edition of the Highland Echo about a girl perishing in the 1972 Pearsons Hall fire is interesting, but not exactly accurate. The following account is the one I heard when I came to the College in 1976, and later experienced.

In the early years of Pearsons Hall, a young woman student who lived on the fourth floor died while attending the College. She did not die in Pearsons, but shortly after her death, the residents of the fourth floor began seeing a woman dressed in white, walking along the fourth floor corridors. She appeared almost transparent or shadowy and wouldn't respond to their calls of "Who are you? What are you doing on our floor?" She would continue down the hall and stop at the same door every time, then disappear.

After the fire of 1972, the fourth floor was not rebuilt. Soon after the students moved back into the building, they began hearing footsteps overhead, as though someone walked along a corridor—a corridor that was no longer there. A few months later a shadow was seen in the northeast corner of the alcove that leads into Proffitt Dining Room. It was a vague impression, but if one looked out of the corner of one's eye, the shadow took on the form of a young woman. This phenomenon was always accompanied by a coldness that penetrated all clothing and chilled one's bones.

Although I had been told about the footsteps and occasional sighting, no one had mentioned the alcove to me, until one day Sharon Crane (an alumnae of MC and employee at the time) and I were in the alcove with two students. I felt a strange coldness and just as I started to say something about it, Sharon very quietly said, "She's here." I looked toward Sharon and saw beyond her a faint form that resembled a woman. We stood, mesmerized, as the apparition slowly moved toward us, bringing with it an extreme coldness. Someone sighed, and the apparition disappeared.

Later, none of us admitted to sighing. In fact, the scene so stunned us that we were not capable of doing anything but standing motionless and soundless.

I also experienced three strange "happenings" in Anderson Hall where I had an office in the early 80's, and after the third episode vowed never to work late there again... and haven't.

Dear Editor,

The following letter is a response to Dave's World in the Oct. 29 edition of the Echo:

Dear Dave,

I am glad that someone on this campus is willing to step up and express their feelings and opinions about Maryville College. I truly respect you for putting your ideas on the line for other people to respond to; however, I find it hard to appreciate your opinions because there are no actions to accompany them. You can and have said many things about this college; however, you do not seem to be doing anything about your opinions. Please correct me if I am wrong, but I have not seen you taking the initiative to talk to Dr. Gibson or any other members of the Board of Directors. On Tuesday, Oct. 26, Dr. Gibson came to the Proffitt Parlor to speak with students. Dr. Gibson talked and listened to the students. We were able to express some very valid thoughts to him; perhaps you should have been there. I am positive that he would have been more than willing to listen to your concerns. Perhaps your pessimism would produce optimistic results if you show your face and act on your beliefs.

Rachel Winter,

P.S. Rationally speaking, if you cannot live with the negative aspects of Carnegie Hall that you so readily pointed out, then get off your damn porch. Carnegie, like life, is not perfect. Deal with it.

Dear Editor,

I am writing in response to the "Dave's World" column printed in the Oct. 29 issue of the "Echo."

I applaud Dave's willingness to share his opinions, but I feel as if I must share my own opinions in response to Dave, for he did make some mention of the fact that he had "gotten burned before by speaking for students." Though my intent is not to "burn" him, I feel that on behalf of myself, students who share the same opinion as me, and the many people Dave slammed in his article, I must address some of the criticism.

The most upsetting issue to me was Dave's criticism of Humphreys Court and of alumni or others who supposedly give money only to get their names on a plaque. While I cannot speak on behalf of all of those who give money or as to what their motives are, I can defend many of the donors and supporters that I have had the opportunity to meet. Money is given not only for beautification projects (and, I must add that I like flowers and sidewalks), but also for academics, and for scholarships (like Dave's Presidential Scholarship).

Dave's article gives opinion only with very little information, and indeed shows little truth; only two reasons are cited in the column as to why alumni give money, both of which portray those who do give as pretentious and self-serving egotists who seek solely to relive their glory days. Can it be that Dave is suddenly omnipotent and has been able to find out every motivation of every donor and supporter? Sorry, but I beg to differ, citing these examples:

(1) Humphreys Court is dedicated to two people who supported MC not only financially, but also administratively.

(2) Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey have been deceased for several years, and I feel confident in saying that they did not give their tremendous amount of time, energy, and money in expectation of a plaque or a garden in their names.

(3) I had the opportunity to meet many of the members of the Board of Directors at the Oct. 22 meeting, and of those I met, several are alumni, all support the College, and probably most give money. But the greatest part was that I found that they CARE about maintaining the SPIRIT and LIBERAL ARTS TRADITION of Maryville College. Everyone I met was cordial, generous, willing to listen, willing to talk, and willing to be receptive and supportive. Example: Those board members on the Student Development Subcommittee (chaired, by the way, by Diane Humphreys-Barlow) expressed support for having a student to serve on the Board of Directors as a member. Of the alumni and administration I have met, I would venture to differ from Dave's opinion that people just give their money to come back and look at their names on a plaque. People who get plaques usually give a lot more than just their money, and I think most give from the heart because they care.

Another issue I would like to address is Dave's point about alumni donating more money to academics and comfort rather than to flowers. I know for a fact that the donor of the money for Humphreys Court has given large sums of money for areas other than beautification, including the very idea of comfort that Dave mentioned. When Davis Hall needed a new roof desperately a couple of years ago, and the money needed to repair the roof was nowhere to be found, one Diane Humphreys-Barlow saw fit to pay for the entire sum from her own pocket. (If keeping rain off of people's heads isn't comfort, I don't know what is.) I didn't find out this information from a plaque on top of Davis roof, and I certainly didn't hear Mrs. Humphreys-Barlow bragging. She is, like many others, dedicated to the cause and purpose of MC academically, aesthetically, entirely.

My point is this: People do care from the heart about Maryville College and its students, and making generalizations and assumptions about the personal character and integrity of individuals (by people who have not even met the individuals especially) is small-minded, immature, and hurtful. So Dave, get off of Humphreys Court, the Humphreys family, other supporters and alumni, and get some of your facts straight first.

Park Med, located beside Kroger, is one option students have for health services. For minor illnesses, the cost is reportedly $25.

Health care debated here

Student health costs addressed, Blount, Park Med are options

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

What would happen to a student who become deathly ill here at Maryville? This may be when the Maryville College Health Services system enters into a student's life. The program is one of many run out of Crawford House, under the guidance of Bruce Guillaume. It incorporates the services of Park Med Clinic and Blount Memorial Hospital, and can be both very useful, and very confusing.

The Health Services system, as described in "The Maryville College Student Handbook (1993-94), has three basic divisions under it:

rClinic Care- This form of care covers any minor illness, such as a cold, a sprain, or minor abrasions. It is limited to less than 30 minutes of care from a physician or nurse.

rAncillary Services- These services include x-rays, medication, lab tests, and generally require more than 30 minutes of care from a physician, nurse, and some form of health care specialist.

rEmergency Medical Services- This is provided for conditions requiring immediate medical conditions. "The Maryville College Student Handbook" (1993-94) gives the following examples, "...lacerations, fractures, unconsciousness or any medical condition requiring ancillary services and/or more than 30 minutes of basic clinic care."

What exactly does all of this mean to the student who must depend on the MC Health Services, and just exactly what effect does it have impact on a student's pocket book (or wallet for that matter)?

First off, we must brush off a common misconception held at MC, this being that the services provided by Park Med and Blount Memorial are free to MC students. As Bruce Guillaume explained, "every health care system in the country has a price attached to it." The price tag attached to the MC Health Services happens to be $25, as long as you meet a few basic conditions.

The first, and most important condition is that you go to Park Med rather than Blount Memorial. The visit fee at Park Med is $25, and that $25 happens to cover $100 of ancillary services. This $100 credit does not, however, cover x-rays or prescribed medications. This is the second condition—that other services are not needed. The third condition is that one does not surpass the $100 credit, if so, he or she will be directly billed.

A student's best bet for the cheapest treatment is to go to Park Med. Guillaume explained "if [Blount Memorial] run tests or provide ancillary services, [students] may be charged for an Emergency Room visit. At Park Med you know that you will pay at least $25." When asked what problems the MC Health Services have he responded that "most people don't understand what Health Care Services provide until they need it." Guillaume went on to say that health services is "designed for cold and flu's, not major things like broken arms—that comes under health insurance."

When asked why the college uses two separate entities for its health services, Guillaume explained it is because of convenience. "Students want a place that is convenient, where they don't have to wait long, and a place where they can go when they have the flu or whatever."

If a student is to need the services of either clinics, the handbook outlines on page 50 what to do:

"1. Call 981-8002 (SMOD) or 981-8112 (Security) for assistance and emergency transportation to the health care provider.

2. Current Student Identification Cards are required for clinic admittance. As with all patients, students will be treated according to the severity of their illness and seen as quickly as possible."

Blount Memorial Hospital is located across from the campus on Lamar Alexander Parkway, and provides 24 hour, seven-day coverage through its Emergency Room. The ER phone number is 977-5564. Park Med Clinic is located in the Armory Place Medical Center at 117 Gill Street in Alcoa. It is open from 8:30 a.m. - 6 p.m., Monday through Friday, and 10 a.m. - 3 p.m. on Saturdays. The phone number for Park Med is 982-3409.

Campus crime rate not significantly higher as reported by security

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

"This is a stick-up!" The very words make most of us jump. The idea of being involved in a crime leaves a sense of dread. Crime is a very real part of life today, yet no one wants to talk about it.

The Maryville College campus is not excluded from the effects of crime. As much as we would like to think of the college as a utopian environment, the reality is that there is crime on our campus.

Just about everyone could recall seeing the anniversary banners that were hung on the lamp posts. What may not be known is that four of those banners were actually stolen. They were intended to be left up for most of the semester, but were taken down after the four were lifted.

The comment has been made that crime seems more abundant this semester than last. Several members of the campus staff implied that there didn't seem to be an increase in campus crime.

The only staff claiming an unusually high crime occurrence was Copeland. RA Kelli Jackson said that several thefts and other crimes have been reported, but she could not provide any concrete numbers. When asked about strategy for dealing with crime she said: "The best way is for the residents to look out for each other."

Campus Security Chief Eldra Hurst commented that he does not think there has been a rise in crime if comparing this year to last. He stated that only eight to 10 crimes have been reported to him so far this semester. The average number of crimes reported per semester is around 15.

"The only unusual thing this semester has been the incident in the library," Hurst referred to a man masturbating on a woman's leg while talking to her in the library. "That sort of thing doesn't usually happen."

The crime rate for the college last year was 15.75 percent (the number of crimes reported divided by number of students, faculty and staff times 1000). Tusculum College—which is about the same size as Maryville—has a crime rate of 6.16 percent. So, it appears that we do have a higher crime rate than some colleges. As for an increase in crime, the number of reports do not support the speculation.

During Inauguration Weekend, several banners were lifted from lightposts.

The dorms have not been the only area to suffer the effects of crime. The college library has had several books stolen and vandalized this semester. While figures were not given to indicate the total monetary loss, it is known that every page ripped out costs at least $15 to replace. Some damaged or stolen periodicals can not be replaced.

Freshmen enthusiastic about college experience

by Aysha Dastgir
Staff Writer

The Freshman class of 1993 has a vision for the year 1997. The goals of the freshman class members is to do everything they can in their four years at Maryville College. That is what Aaron Stone is aiming for as the freshman class president.

To create a division of labor (so to speak), Stone and other class officers have formed three committees to focus on the following: class activities, the covenant, and campus communication. Each of these committees has its "own goal to reach."

The activities committee was formed to "provide activities for the freshman class which would shape and form togetherness," said Stone. The most recent activity sponsored was the Halloween costume dance. Upcoming events for the rest of the semester include a bonfire for the football team on Nov. 13, and a class camping trip to Cades Cove on Nov. 19. Some of the activities planned for next semester include a trip to the aquarium in Chattanooga, and a trip to Atlanta and Six Flags over Georgia.

The Covenant Committee hopes to "provide goals and expectations for the class of 1997. Our class can do and accomplish everything within four years," believes the president. Another important goal of the committee is to be a part of the implementation of and support for the Maryville College Covenant.

The Communications Committee is the newest one to have been formed. Its goal is to create a video tape of Maryville College activities, dorm life, and sports from students' points of view. "We want freshmen coming to the college to see a lot more than academics," said Stone.

The freshmen class officers would like to thank the cabinet for their attendance of the Oct. 11 meeting. Stone said that he and his classmates "look forward to working with each and everyone one of them."

Finally, part of Stone's mission (as he sees it), is to be able to break the stereotypical myths about freshmen. "We want people and the college community to know that we are adults—responsible people. We are enthusiastic about the next four years and hope expectations pay off toward graduation. We want to be the best class Maryville College has or will ever have," he said.

donated funds towards hospital bills because the bills will be too great for it to really make a difference.

Planning

Continued from Page One of working space, and until money is spent to upgrade the building to meet fire codes, using the third floor [for office space] is not an option."

He hopes the renovation will be completed by spring, 1994. Renovation will include "buying carpet, painting walls, erecting a wall here, tearing one down there."

The renovation is seen by many as a "temporary renovation." Until funds are allocated for a new student center, Fayerweather may be it. McCall thinks that Bartlett Hall may be one possibility for a student center. If that were to happen, maintenance will have to be housed into a new facility.

But for now, the renovation plan looks promising for the students and the individuals who have offices in Fayerweather. This renovation is being done for the reason that "students may have more things to their advantage," said Belinda Kenny, office manager of student development.

Campus buildings contain many stories

Editor's Note: Maryville College is having a 175 year-old birthday party all year, so, to honor this event, the Highland Echo will feature a page devoted to the history of Maryville College, principally through her buildings.

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

"Professor Lamar informs me that they do not propose to expend one dollar in repairs, but, that a new site, consisting of sixty acres, adjoining the town, has been purchased, and that they propose to build a new college building . . ." These were the words of Lieutenant Samuel Walker, an assistant in the Sub-Assistant Commissioner's Office in Knoxville on February 8, 1869 in a report to Colonel James Thompson in Nashville. That new college building is now the oldest surviving building on campus, Anderson Hall.

Professor Samuel Tyndale Wilson, in his book "A Century of Maryville College and Second Century Beginnings", said of the hope of the new building of Maryville College, "... there was arising, Phoenix-like, a new and greater Maryville." Finished in 1870 and used from 1871, Anderson was named after Isaac Anderson, the founder of The Southern and Western Theological Seminary in 1819. It was officially named Maryville College in 1842.

Anderson was the first president of Maryville College and served the college for thirty-eight years. He began the school with no money and himself the only Professor, a position he maintained continuously with the help of visiting Professors, for the first ten years of the college.

Of the 175 years since the founding of the college, Anderson Hall has been its landmark for 123 years. The money for its construction was raised by investments from William Thaw, John Center Baldwin, and others. Anderson Hall cost $25,000 to build.

The building, designed by Knoxville architect Benjamin Fahnestock, was built by contractor Alford McConnell. His choice in reddish-brown brick was well known in his time.

The library was in Anderson until 1888, when it was moved to Lamar Memorial Hall, today known as the CCM. The second floor of Anderson was once a chapel.

In 1892, the Fayerweather Annex to Anderson Hall was built, making Anderson in the "T" shape it has today. The addition nearly doubled the area of the building.

In 1963, the administrative offices were renovated. A stairwell like the one next to the Financial Aid Office now led up to the second and third floors where the president's office is located. In the area of the president's office were three rooms which housed the maintenance, student loans, and student work offices. Around 1965 and 1966, some of the classrooms were converted into the current teacher's offices of today.

Latin and Bible, both required, were taken in Anderson. The English Department, now located on the second and third floors of Anderson, was situated in Thaw until 1950. The burning of Vorhees Chapel in 1947 pushed the Drama and Music, and Art departments into Anderson. The classrooms and teacher's offices were converted into music and art studios. After the construction of the Fine Arts Center in 1950, these disciplines were removed to the new building, and the English Department returned to Anderson.

Professor Arthur S. Bushing, former of English Professor at Maryville College, came to the college in 1939. He remarked that his first thrilling experience while in the building was watching the 1939 homecoming celebration, when the old smoke stacks of the former power plant were blown up. "I got on the tower to watch."

Bushing commented on the qualities of Anderson, relating his experience while directing a summer school. The Sutton Science building's air-conditioners were not working, so classes had to be moved because of the intolerable heat. "We moved to Thaw . . . but it got hot there, too," said Bushing. The final destination for the Summer School classes were in Anderson because, says Bushing "you have cross-ventilation and higher ceilings." He said the building was designed to keep cool without modern conveniences of air-conditioners.

Bushing's former office, Anderson 314, has what appears to be a chimney closure. He speculated that stoves had been used in the building. He also noted the ventilation shafts which run from the basement up to the teacher's offices.

Here no more —

After Baldwin Hall was judged to be in poor condition, the building was set for removal. The structure was built in 1871 and was used as a residence hall. Later, after two annexes were added, it also housed the dining hall.

Time takes toll on Baldwin, Memorial

Maryville College has lost some of its historic buildings to time. The College was once located a little less than a mile away, and the only surviving member of the construction on today's campus in Anderson Hall.

Begun in 1819, Maryville College's first building was Dr. Isaac Anderson's own house, then a "little brown house" for the 1819 class of five was used. In 1820, a two-story brick house with six fireplaces was purchased. Inside were six rooms, two of them large. The smaller rooms were dorm rooms. A library was upstairs.

Between 1823-1824, two small frame buildings were purchased and turned into a boarding house, with the cost of board at a steep two dollars a month. The first staff of Maryville College was hired, a steward for the boarding house.

A 200-acre college farm was also maintained, providing the first workstudy.

At the time, Maryville was a town of 50 homes — a population of 250.

By 1835, a new college frame building was built. A new brick building was under construction by 1853. The new building was three stories high and contained a chapel, four recitation rooms, study and enough rooms to accommodate between 60-70 students. The new building was never completed but used partially until the Civil War.

On April 22, 1861, the last chapel service ended and the suspension of the college was announced, "on account of a state of armed hostilities in the country." The three faculty and one student tutor divided for either side in the conflict, as did the student body.

All of the buildings which made up Maryville College were closed at the outbreak of the Civil War, and they were used as barracks for the troops. The buildings were gutted and useless by 1865, and a new site was purchased for the creation of a new Maryville College.

On the new site, a president's house was erected. Soon after, Anderson Hall was constructed.

Within a year of the completion of Anderson Hall in 1871, two more halls were raised—Baldwin Hall, the women's dormitory, and Memorial Hall. These buildings were used as dormitories for the 100 students attending. For several years this was Maryville College.

Memorial Hall stood in the area between Carnegie and the tennis court. No additions were made, but the building was renovated in 1959. Baldwin had two additions, the first at the turn of the century in 1898 with the Boardman Annex. With this addition, the Dining Hall was housed in Baldwin. A second annex was added in 1904. The quality of these additions was judged in poor condition in 1958. The Hall was set for removal when more residence space became available.

Memorial Hall was in poor condition by the 1970s and was demolished in the mid-70's.

In 1968, Baldwin was removed, and today a large green field of grass lies between Anderson and the Sutton Science Center.

They were used in the past to keep the rooms warm upstairs. He said the shafts were convenient because when wiring for electricity or telephones was made, the shafts proved easy access without drilling holes in the floor.

Anderson was entered on the National Register of Historic Places on February 20, 1975. Every few years, improvements or additions are made, such as repainted offices or the new fans installed in classrooms without air-conditioning. The facade of Anderson has looked markedly different from today's landscaped surroundings. For a number of years, the sides of the building were engulfed in vines up to the very top. A row of large bushes sprouted out along either side of the sidewalk approaching Anderson from Fayerweather. In its 123 years, the building is the oldest surviving recorder of the happenings at Maryville College.

Bushing said of the number of students that have taken classes in Anderson, taking into consideration transfer students, "I would give a conservative figure of around 90 percent of the graduates have been in Anderson."

Lady Scots ranked second in NCAA poll

Honey Brown and Leah Onks named two "players to watch" in magazine preview

by Karen Beaty
Editor

Sweet sixteen is nice. But after five years, its time to move on to bigger and better things.

The Lady Scots made it to the "sweet 16" of the Division III NCAA tournament for the fifth time last year—an accomplishment they hope to repeat, but also alter. Their goal is to reach the Elite Eight.

Host Communications' NCAA Basketball Preview Magazine has ranked this year's team No. 2 in the nation—a very high honor. The preview has also named seniors Honey Brown and Leah Onks two of the top five players to watch in NCAA Basketball South Region.

Under the direction of Head Coach Wes Moore last year, the team's winning record last season was 23 wins and three losses. Moore has since relocated to join the coaching staff of North Carolina State.

Kelli Casteel-Cook replaces Moore as head coach. Cook brings a new element of coaching for the Lady Scots. Before coaching the Lady Scots in an assistant coach capacity last season, Cook played at the University of Tennessee between the years of 1988-1992.

Other returning players include Jamie Parrott, who, as a freshman last year, was the second leading scorer behind Onks. Whitney Williamson and Shelly Johnson are also expected to be scoring threats. Laurie Ellis, Lisa Campbell, and Jama Cameron are in the running for a post position. Kelly Moss and Jennifer Buck are new recruits who may be essential in filling key positions.

The Scots' good running game and strong outside shooting ability will be essential to making this season as good as last year's. The team will try to improve on defense and aggressiveness, according to Cook.

This season looks successful for the Lady Scots. If the women play the way they did last year, the Lady Scots can definitely look forward to another tournament bid.

Inexperienced men's team has tough act to follow

by Marc Hall

Looking for Inside Help—

John Robinette is expected to help out the Scots' scoring and passing game. Robinette is one of only three returning Juniors to the team.

The 1993-94 Fighting Scots will be hard pressed to match the efforts of last year's basketball campaign. Last season, the Scots won 12 straight games en route to a third consecutive NCAA Tournament appearance and a 20-6 record.

If the Scots are to match the feats of last season and of seasons past, Coach Lambert and his staff will have to rely heavily on last year's squad and return only seven letterman. Returning for his final season at Maryville is senior Wayne Norman. Wayne concluded last season as the Scots' leading assist man (5.2 apg). Norman chipped in 6.6 points per contest while hitting on 44.7 percent from the three point line.

There are only three juniors on this year's squad, two of whom will bring much needed experience. This class is led by John Robinette. Robinette is a strong, athletic guard who has excellent passing skills and long range shooting capabilities. He averaged 3.7 points and 2.2 assists per game last season.

Adding to this class is a post transfer from Walters State Community College, Rusty Wilson. Wilson will bring immediate strength and scoring to the Scots' front court. Wilson possesses good leaping ability and strong inside moves. He will need to be an immediate impact for the Scots to be successful.

The third junior is point guard Bryan Langley. Langley is blessed with sound fundamental skills and is an adept passer.

Lambert and his staff will be calling on several sophomores to help make the 1993-94 season a successful one. Jeremy Burgess will be called upon to help lead the Scots' offense at either guard position. Burgess has excellent court awareness mixed with good scoring ability. Named Freshman of the Year for the junior varsity last year, Burgess led the team in scoring, steals, and free throw percentage.

Helping bolster the inside attack are Jeremy Blevins and Bryan Mills. Blevins was a medical redshirt last season due to a broken ankle. He can run the floor for his size, and he couples that with sound inside moves. Blevins will be a key to the success of the Scots' inside game.

Mills is a tremendous rebounder who can run the floor with the best of them. These skills coupled with his deceptive leaping ability should help Bryan play a significant role for the Scots this season and earn him playing time.

Two transfer guards help strengthen the Scots' sophomore class. Jermaine Johnson, a quick shooting guard transferring from Walters State Community College, has a quickness and scoring ability which will enable him to push for valuable playing time. Point guard Scott McDaniel transfers to Maryville from Georgetown College in Kentucky. Scott is an excellent passer and a good floor leader. He should play a key role in running the Scots' motion offense.

This year the Scots have exceptional athletes at every position but must contend with the youth and inexperience of the team. The key will be for Lambert and his staff to find the right chemistry and to help the young players adjust to the college game. Once these factors are accomplished, the Scots can look forward to a successful season.

"We are young and wet behind the ears, but hopefully by mid season we will be competitive. Our youthful enthusiasm and strong work habits should carry us through this competitive schedule," said Lambert.

printed with the permission of the Daily Times

History will eventually repeat itself. Just ask Maryville College volleyball coach Kandi Schram.

After 11 years of exclusion, the Lady Scots Monday were invited to the NCAA Division III tournament.

Maryville travels to Thomas More college in Crestview, KY, for a first-round game at 7:30 p.m., Nov. 10.

The Lady Scots hold a 27-11 overall record, and are ranked fourth in the South Region going into the tournament. Thomas More is ranked first in the region, fourth in the nation.

Still, Schram said she feels very good about how the tournament schedule turned out.

"First of all, we've played there this year, so the gym will be familiar. Secondly, we've played the team before," she said.

Thomas More has played Maryville three times this season, and has won each time. Schram also sees that in her team's favor.

"We're counting on them to be overconfident," she said.

The coach is also very thankful that the game will be played close to Maryville. According to Schram, a four and a half hour trip north is not a big travel inconvenience to the team.

The Lady Scots have been practicing for two weeks without playing competitively. Schram isn't worried about preparation—she's worried about nerves.

"They're very tight. Nervous. Quiet. Pale. They know this is a long time in coming."

The last bid is on the minds of all the players, especially the coach.

Schram knows the details of that 1982 tournament. It was then she was a member of the team.

"I'm always afraid I'll sound corny when I say it, but I'm so excited that they are going to experience what I did as a player," she said. "And it's exciting that these girls are going to experience what they grew up dreaming about."

Schram is particularly sentimental in seeing the senior members have this opportunity.

"I'm happy for my seniors. They've been on teams as good or better teams that were waiting for that phone call, but never got it."

This time, history won't be cruel to seniors Dena Godsey, Jenni McCafferty, and Nikki Boop. The three were nominated as All-South and All-American candidates. Power player Godsey leads the team with 312 kills and 61 aces.

Schram said the invitation is the result of a reputation built on past seasons, as well as the talent on this year's team.

"You not only have to establish a good win/loss record, but you have to have a tough schedule, be invited to certain tournaments and do well," she said.

This year the Maryville team challenged six teams that were ranked in the top 10, nationally. By being chosen, they are among only 32 teams in the United States to see national tournament play. And Schram is proud to point out that most of the 32 are state supported schools. Only a few private institutions were invited. "Our community has so much to be proud of. It's prestige. Maryville College has three nationally ranked sports—volleyball and both basketball teams," said Schram. "And the girls know what this means to the school: Better recruiting, better schedules, better everything."

Schram doesn't like concentrating on a win. "I'm excited that this team was chosen for its ability, finesse, and quickness. It's my job to get them past the nervousness. If I can do that, they'll be fine."

Tennis club organized

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

The absence of track, wrestling, and tennis teams at Maryville College has been a subject of conversations and the brunt of jokes since the demise of these activities. The way tennis is regarded on campus, however, is beginning to change.

Recently, a few students got together and decided that tennis had been absent from the MC community for too long.

Athletic Director Randy Lambert, gave the go-ahead, and Larry Ervin agreed to be the club's sponsor.

The club currently consists of approximately fifteen players, and they are looking for more. Anyone is welcome.

Aaron Stone, a member, hopes that the club will be supported by the student body. "Tennis players work just as hard as [other athletes], and we sweat just as much."

Any student who would like to play and any faculty member who is interested in coaching should contact Stone at 981-8410. Practices are held on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

MC football wins one, loses another—Emory and Henry scheduled for Saturday

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College football team improved its record to 5-3 in a win over the Monarchs of Methodist College in an away game on Oct. 30. The Monarchs entered the game with a 4-3 record and hoped to slow down the Scots' momentum from a big win over Rhodes College the previous week.

The Monarchs struck first on a field goal to take a 3-0 lead in the first quarter. Maryville answered right back with a 1-yard touchdown run by Ron Silver late in the first quarter. Silver's scoring capped a 12-play, 74-yard drive. Vance Grant's extra point gave the Scots a 7-3 lead.

Maryville's defense shut down the Methodist offense in the second quarter preventing the Monarchs from scoring.

Grant added a 37-yard field goal midway through the second quarter to increase the Scots' lead to 10-3 going in to the half.

Maryville took the second half kick-off and drove to the Methodist 2-yard line, where Grant's 19-yard field goal was blocked. A defensive struggle in the third quarter prevented both teams from scoring.

Methodist tied the game in the fourth quarter with a 46-yard touchdown run which made the score 10-10. The Scots attempted to strike back after a Mike Hodge's fumble recovery, but the Scots fumbled the ball two plays later to set up the go-ahead touchdown for the Monarchs.

With the Monarchs leading 17-10, quarterback John Barry Cox took control of the team's final drive. Cox converted two fourth downs on runs of 12 and seven yards, and completed key passes to Eric Booth and Nick Wilson. Cox completed the drive with a 3-yard TD run to set up a two-point conversion attempt to decide the outcome with 54 seconds left on the clock. Andrew Johnson caught a Cox pass in the front corner of the end zone to complete the two-point conversion and give the Scots a 18-17 win.

The Scots matched-up with Tusculum College on Nov. 6 at home—the Maryville team going for their third consecutive victory. Tusculum came into the game with a 3-5 record and a wishbone offense that had potential for creating problems for the Scots' defense.

Maryville scored first on a two-yard touchdown run by Ron Silvers midway through the first quarter. Grant added the extra point, giving the Scots an early 7-0 lead.

After a Tusculum touchdown that tied the game at 7-7, the Scots battled back to take the lead once again.

Shelton and Mike Parris moved the ball on the ground to the Tusculum 43 where back-up quarterback Adam Heiks completed a 27-yard pass to Wilson. Shelton capped the drive with a 11-yard touchdown run, and Grant's kick gave Maryville a 14-7 lead at half-time.

After a scoreless third quarter, Tusculum took the lead on a 18-yard run and a two-point conversion to make the score 15-14. The Tusculum defense shut down the Scots' offense on the ensuing drive and struck again to take a 22-14 lead late in the fourth quarter.

Maryville's last drive of the game was stopped at the Scots' 17-yard line, leaving the score at 22-14.

The loss gives the Scots a 5-4 record going into Saturday's game with Division III powerhouse Emory & Henry.

MC and tennis go way back

Historically, Maryville College had tennis as an intercollegiate sport prior to World War I, according to Dr. David Cartledge. Cartledge coached the last women's varsity team in 1990. Men's tennis as a varsity sport ended six years previously, although they have been "fairly successful" with attempts to maintain tennis as a club sport, according to Cartledge.

Cartledge said he enjoyed coaching tennis but because of other academic duties, he had to drop out. He said that he believes the issue of supporting tennis is important because it is a "lifetime sport."

"The sports we have are sports people generally don't play after college," said Cartledge. "Guidelines of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools (SACS) say that our athletics should reflect the goals and mission of the college." He went on to add that if Maryville College wants to promote education and fitness for life, some evaluations need to be made.

Hey kids. How's it hangin'?

Get this, people. See if this isn't completely surreal: I just got a letter from the faculty advisor to the Echo informing me that my column

1. does not conform to AP (Associated Press) journalistic guidelines;
2. uses language which might offend some readers;
3. is not sufficiently edited, tending to be somewhat rambling and wordy;
4. states facts which are either outright false or at the very least not adequately researched;
5. does not back up its point with logic and clarity;
6. is negative, sarcastic, and occasionally mean-spirited;
7. is in danger of losing its credibility.

In fact, he went into torturous detail as to why my column was not the logical, factually secure piece of journalistic expression that it could have been. It probably took him longer than it took me to write it.

In response, I have to use a quote that thousands before me have used when confronted with humor: "ha ha ha."

Obviously, if he missed the point, then a lot of other people probably have also. There seems to be a dangerously misguided assumption lingering in the air like a fetid cloud of smoke in a Pontiac LeMans station wagon with the windows rolled up (huh?). That assumption is that Dave is a journalist, and that Dave's World is a journalistic undertaking. Methinks a disclaimer is necessary.

DAVE'S DISCLAIMER: Dave's World is not intended to be serious journalism. Dave's World is nothing but a release for Dave; it is a kick, a lark, a diversion, an experiment. It is nothing but a reflection of whatever Dave happens to be thinking the night before his deadline. Since Dave has absolutely no familiarity with AP guidelines, his column doesn't follow them. Since Dave uses offensive language in his daily life, his column contains the occasional offensive word. Since Dave is wordy and rambling, so is his column. Since Dave is too lazy to get his facts straight, they aren't straight. Since Dave is a sarcastic bastard, his column has a decidedly sarcastic tinge. Since Dave is not particularly concerned with credibility, his column is not particularly credible. THE END

Now, everyone cut this disclaimer out and repeat it to yourself each week before you read Dave's World. That way you will be free of those nagging preconceptions that tend to shine an unfriendly light on my column.

I hope, boys and girls, that you all have not taken my column as seriously as my advisor seems to have. My column, for the record, is directed at those of you without a corn cob in your nether orifice. I try to write with a little frivolity, a little irony, a little self-parody. Apparently my ironic tone has fallen on some deaf ears. I don't take myself very seriously, and I strongly urge you to do the same. God knows (though my advisor apparently doesn't) that this campus needs to learn how to laugh at itself.

I would end my column here, but I don't think it is wordy and offensive enough yet.

Let's talk about this inauguration business. We were all roundly scolded in the last issue of the Echo for our apathy, which was reflected in the low student attendance at the event. Since my advisor tells me that I'm not allowed to speak for students without "polling data, statistics, or just a quote," here are some quotes:

"Who are these lame, self-righteous, self-proclaimed representatives of the student body to harass me about what I should do on my Saturday afternoon?" asked Greg Carroll. "Why would I go to any event if I was not interested and would rather be sleeping? I don't like people telling me what to do with my time. It isn't apathy—I actively avoided it."

Other students had a more balanced view of the situation.

"Sure it's important and everything... but who wants to go?" asked Brad Sterling.

Students who attended the weekend ceremonies had this to say:

"I attended the little garden thing and even discussed the public butt-kissing with one of the professors," said Teyo Tyree, "it seemed to me that they could have fixed the leaking roof or faucets in the FAC or something else that we really need here. Stop putting up the front that Maryville College is a perfect little garden in which we get to play college student."

"I was one of those who was forced to be there," says Jon Peters, "and as I was sitting there, I realized why no one goes to these things. Who wants to be told by some guy for two hours that the purpose of being at this college is to turn into 'servants of churches and servants of nations.' Screw that!"

Josh Byers added a final word: "If and only if they handed out free money would I have attended."

You may be saying, "Hey, Dave, that's not a poll, those aren't statistics, those are just your buddies talking s**t!"

You're right. I thought I told you, I'm not trying to be Connie Chung here. This isn't 60 Minutes. This is Dave's World. I have things to study, a senior thesis to write, beer to drink. The last thing I have time to do is go out and interview a bunch of people, much less lobby the administration for minute changes in policy that won't affect me in about seven months anyway. I haven't yet been sucked into the organizational morass and frustrated by the molasses-like process of change, and I don't plan to. The letter to the editor is right: I just bitch, I'm not trying to change the world. I am worried about expanding the contents of my brain—I'll leave it to other people to worry about the "community." Anyone who thinks I actually got so worked up about flower gardens that I'm going to go organize a rally or something must be smoking crack. Lighten up, already.

Let's face it: I am the only person on this campus that is speaking for the Slacker Generation rather than down to it. You may or may not think that is a worthy calling, depending on whether or not you are a slacker. I am one, and a wordy, offensive one at that. Cope.

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

WOW!! I made it to my second column...miracles do happen. I want to thank everyone who took the time to respond to my last one—that was so cool. I'm glad that I evoked feedback. I did have one criticism that I feel I ought to clarify. In my last column I referred to myself as "an illiterate art major." I was in no way implying that all art majors are illiterate, just me. (Sorry Ms. Bianco!)

This particular column is dedicated to the memory of some one very special to me, a dedicated friend, and someone whom I've just recently lost—my car. Dubbed "The Doo-Doo Smear" because of its peculiar likeness to a turd, the 1977 brown Toyota Corolla had been my (kind of) faithful companion for six years. "The Smear" (to those who knew it well) made its final exhausted groan on Monday afternoon, as if to say "please Alene, I'm sooo tired." I could not bring myself to torture her any more, so I called for a tow truck. I thought that I had prepared myself for that moment, seeing how I have thought every day for the past six months: "This is her last." But as the ambulance/tow-truck wheeled out of the parking lot dragging the defeated tired body of my car behind it, a tear came to my eye. The tear was not for the fact that I get to look forward to the prospect of riding a bike to school and work everyday in the rain and ice that make up a Tennessee winter, nor for the fact that I will be harassing my friends to take me to Kroger for milk. Nope, the tear was for the memories of my car that I had so often ridiculed and been ridiculed about. Regardless of it's beaten exterior and trashed interior, I had done just about everything in that car. (Now y'all get your minds out of the gutter!) I'd been to see the Grateful Dead in that car, I'd been pulled over in that car (and had to laugh at the cop when he told me that I was going 80 mph, as if my car could go that fast—HA!!). I had piled 8 people into that car (that barely seated four comfortably), and trekked to various parties and dances. I'd ridden with my brother from Columbia S.C. to Richmond VA. in that car—the first time that we had ever spent any real time alone together—only to be drawn closer when the engine block cracked and we had to spend a day and a half somewhere in the bowels of North Carolina for the rebuilt engine to be put in. I had experienced my own spunk and independence by spending nine hours pumping gas in the Camp Comfort Chevron in Abington VA. waiting for Harry, Ray, and Mike to put in a new transmission when mine had failed during my big move from Richmond to Maryville.

When I watched all of that and more being dragged around the corner, it just got to me.

Why a eulogy for a car gone you ask? Because the old adage "you don't know what you've got 'til it's gone" had just slapped me in the face...hard (and it hurt). So this is a reminder to everyone to appreciate what you have here and now, even if it's not all that you want, or as nice as you would like it to be...it's what you've got and it may not be here tomorrow. It may be a car, a friend, the college experience, or an opportunity. Whatever your own "Doo-Doo Smear" is, realize its worth, and value it before it breaks down. My life is not over because my car went ka-put, it's just something that I'm going to have to work around—but like the end of any era (or error), it made me think a lot.

I think about all the people in California who are watching their beautiful state, their homes, and the jobs being swallowed up by fierce and uncontrollable flames — and I think how difficult that must be. Might I suggest that we do all we can to avoid being swallowed up by the fierce and uncontrollable flames of witlessness and taking things for granted?

As Janis Joplin once said...

"If you've got a cat for one day man...say maybe you want a cat for 365 days...right? You ain't got it for 365 days, you got it for one day man...well I tell you that one day man better be your life man..."

Not the best grammar, but you get it ...don't you man?!

Student Programming Board faces setback—sound board stolen

by Karen Beaty
Editor

For as long as Student Programming Board (STB) Chairpersons Chris Rapp and Edward Levan have been involved in student activities, neither have experienced a year of so many challenges.

But neither do they remember an instance when the STB's equipment was stolen or vandalized.

The sound board, operated chiefly by student programming but owned by the student body, was reportedly stolen the night of Nov. 20. The last activity for which it was used was "Scrutiny," held in Lloyd lobby two nights previously. It was last seen in the residence hall Nov. 19.

According to Levan, the sound board—a sort of "control panel" for microphones, tape decks, CD players, and speakers—is used at the majority of campus functions.

"It is a vital part of programming here on campus," he said. "If you think about it, [the sound board] is used at Lip Sync, Coffee House, Blister in the Sun, and Homecoming. It's something we depend upon, heavily."

Earlier this summer, the STB took the equipment in for repairs. It was appraised at $1,800. One bought to replace the stolen board would cost at least that, but a purchase could run as high as $2,500, according to Student Activities Coordinator Anne Becconsall.

"We're looking to see if it is covered by insurance," said Becconsall. Until that is decided, a sound board will either have to be borrowed or rented—a situation both Levan and Becconsall feel is less than ideal.

"It's difficult to borrow other people's equipment because then, we're responsible for it," said Levan. "And, there would be an increased cost [of programs] for the use of renting another sound board."

As of now, they have no suspects, though they believe the theft was committed by people in the campus community. The piece of equipment is large and heavy—impossible for one person to pick up and carry. And, because of the security of the building, people having access to the building at night would most likely be students.

Normally, equipment is both delivered and picked up by the maintenance department within 24 hours. Becconsall said there was a "breakdown in communication" between the STB and maintenance.

"That's a nitty gritty detail," said Rapp. "Even if it sat there for eight months, no one should have touched it."

"[Student] Senate is working toward community," said Levan. "This is a step backwards."

Becconsall and Rapp put the incidence in perspective of the covenant. Becconsall said: "The philosophy of the covenant is to respect the community and each other."

"I think we have to take a hard look at implementing a covenant when numerous things like this have occurred," said Rapp.

The theft is one more disappointment to a programming board already frustrated with low student participation in its planned activities. However, Rapp, Levan, and Becconsall were quick to point out that programming will

College Republicans sponsor debate on NAFTA

A debate about the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) was held in the CCM Nov. 16. The event, sponsored by the College Republicans, was attended by approximately 60 students, according to co-founder Chris Noe.

Professors Sherryl Kasper and Scott Brunger argued for and against, respectively. Dr. Harry Howard, the sponsor of the club, mediated.

The purpose of the College Republicans, according to Noe, is "to make people politically aware and interested."

Noe and Kristin Kant, both sophomores and political science majors, worked with the national party for a charter. A corp of 25 students, chaired by Todd Anderson and vice-chaired by Aaron Sintell, have been active since September.

"We saw that there was an absence of political clubs on campus. Kristin and I are both active in the Republican Party, locally, and thought a club on campus would be beneficial," said Noe.

Sophomore Alex Little recently asked the student senate to grant another group, the College Democrats, a provisional charter. A statement of purpose is in the making.

Noe said that he is excited about the potential rivalry. "We need to get people interested. Competition will do that."

More political debates are scheduled for next semester. Forums on health care and the environment are in the works.

The College Republicans meet every two weeks at 1 p.m. on Tuesdays in the CCM.

Anyone interested in either political party should contact Noe, Kant, or Little.

Adding the finished touches—
Rachel Gibson decorates her pottery for sale. In the background hang her homemade skunk hair brushes.

First Lady has talent, interests all her own

by Sarah Stevenson and
Karen Beaty
Staff Writer and Editor

Archeologists will attest that the remains of pottery have the ability to reveal civilizations, periods of history, and artistic trends.

From seeing the pottery of Rachel Gibson and conversing with her about its composition, she reveals much of herself.

Gibson, the wife of Maryville College's president, Dr. Gerald Gibson, likes to think of herself as "just an ordinary person."

As we have learned from recent events, the spouses of leaders in society can have strong impacts on their own surroundings as well. Gibson is no exception. She is someone with a unique past and has many thoughts to share.

She grew up in a rural community not too far from Maryville. She was the only member of her family who did not attend the University of Tennessee. Dr. Gibson attended UT, and had met every family member of his then future wife, except her. The two finally met at her sister and brother-in-law's house a few years later, dated for three weeks, got engaged, and were married three weeks after that. "I don't suggest my children do this," she laughed. They have been married for 25 years.

"I don't think a lot of people realize that I ran a business," said Gibson.

Although it might appear that her's is an ordinary lifestyle now, being a wife and mother of three children, she is also a business woman with a keen eye and a talent for three-dimensional art.

"I don't think a lot of people realize that I ran a business," said Gibson. "I went to shows and had a tax number."

Originally a biology teacher, Gibson began her career in pottery 18 years ago. While teaching in a private school, an art teacher offered free pottery lessons to the rest of the staff, though they were more

"hand building" (sculpting) classes. Gibson also tried pottery, and has been at it ever since.

Her move to Maryville meant that she had to say good-bye to two friends—"more like sisters"—who also share her love of pottery. They traveled to shows, worked in studios, and shared ideas. She has met potters in the community, but she doesn't know what kind of pottery they "throw" (lingo for sculpting clay on a pottery wheel) and what kind of kilns (ovens) they use.

According to Gibson, pottery is an art, a craft, and a science. Many pieces that she has in her house are pieces left over from shows that didn't go over well with the public. Oftentimes, those are her favorite pieces. "I like the brown pieces, and I don't usually prefer round," she said. "Decorating is not my forte, but I do it because it's marketable."

In business, she often found herself making what would sale in a show, and not what would sale in a New York City gallery. According to Gibson, that is one drawback to a professional career in art. "Sometimes you lose sight of why you're doing it." She went on to say that the heaviest production periods are very taxing. "It's basically like exam week all season long."

Admittedly not her favorite subject in high school, chemistry is very much a part of her daily life now. An explanation of baking pottery becomes a lesson in oxidation, reduction, carbons, and chemicals. "I did the poorest in chemistry, but I married it," she said, referring to the doctorate her husband holds in organic chemistry.

Now that the family has settled in, she is finding time to think about what she wants to do with her career in pottery. Because of firing zones within the city of Maryville, she said that it would be hard to set up the outdoor brick kiln she owns. Gibson plans to buy an oxidation-fired kiln (something like an electric oven), in the near future. Restarting a business in pottery is not in the plans. "Right now, I'm considering what I'll do next, professionally," she said.

One activity she enjoys outside of creating the pottery is giving demonstrations. One particular demonstration she gives is on pottery and clay in the Bible. "I usually read Jeremiah 18, and talk about why God used that analogy." While living in Virginia, she spoke to churches, senior citizens, and Bible study groups.

She said that personally, her work transforming clay into art and craft has given her a more critical eye. "Every day, you have to make aesthetic decisions. I think that that transfers to all other visual things in your life." But while concentrating on shape, form, and texture does lead to a deeper appreciation, she said that practically, it is time consuming in some instances. "I used to be able to go out and buy a dress and think: 'Oh, what a pretty blue.' Now, shopping for clothes is more difficult—"The neck doesn't match the rest of it."

She will be the first to admit that the pottery business does have its memorable times. She singed her eyebrows and some of her hair the first time she fired up her kiln. In the quest for brushes, she has searched the Chinatown's of large cities. While she might have bought nice sable and sumi brushes, she also has a talent for making her own, and that in itself is memorable.

Other than sable and sumi, brushes made from skunk hair are used when decorating pottery. Making skunk-hair brushes entails, in Gibson's own words, "getting fresh road kill."

"The first time I made [the brushes], my kids almost died. I was taking them to a lesson, and saw fresh road kill. You know how your parents always embarrass you. My kids were screaming 'Oh, no! Someone will see us!'"

The Gibson's three children—Holly, 22, Laura, 19, and Paul, 15—are all artistic.

Holly paints, and Paul seems to have inherited his mother's feel for three-dimensional design.

"Laura has excellent aesthetic judgment," said Gibson. Of the three children, she does the least artwork—not because of ability, but by choice. "I think it was a personality thing. She was more critical of herself," said Gibson.

Like the description of herself as "ordinary," Gibson doesn't describe herself as gifted. "I've got some talent. I wish that I was gifted. Gerald has more raw talent than I do."

Maybe it's Gibson's philosophy that makes her more than ordinary. "Innate talent isn't important. It's where you take it."

MC possesses broadcast capabilities

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

"Rise and shine, Maryville College! It's 7:30 a.m., and time to get up for that 8 o'clock class. Bundle up nicely, 'cause it's chill-ee out there today. Rain is expected later on today, so for those of you headed out for class in the FAC, be sure to take along your umbrellas. And now, here's a blast from the past that's bound to get you out of bed—Purple Haze by Jimi Hendrix..."

Fantasy or reality? Impossible or possible?

Two years ago some students approached Alan Reihl, the technical director of the Maryville College Theatre about teaching them how to broadcast from the school. Reihl refused because "they didn't want to learn. They thought it would be 'cool'." Since then, several students have been curious about whether or not Maryville College has the ability to run a radio station. According to Reihl the answer is "yes and no."

According to Reihl, radio equipment was the property of a communications and speech department housed in the space where the Learning Center is currently located in the Wilson Chapel complex. In time, the department broke up and moved to other buildings of the campus. Much of the broadcasting equipment was left behind. In 1989, the Learning Center moved into the complex after repairs were made to the roof. Clean up and renovation scattered the equipment left behind—the majority of which was placed in storage facilities all over the school. No one knows exactly where all of the equipment is.

"It is all old, outdated stuff, but it was enough to run a small FM station."

The equipment left is not enough to run a station, but if coupled with new equipment, the old would not be entirely obsolete.

The department had more than just radio equipment. "The [video] cameras are in the library and the rest is stored or gone," said Reihl.

"The closest thing we have to communications is the audio-video room in the library," he also said.

If Maryville College were to begin a radio station, how would we go about it? "Well, we need some new equipment, and if I were to put a tower (or an antenna) anywhere around here, I'd put it on top of Fayerweather, and the third floor would be a good location for the [broadcasting] booth," Reihl said.

Many factors, other than location, affect the broadcasting capabilities of the college. "We'd need a license and the FCC would have to [give us permission to have] the station, and a grant would be in needed to pay for new equipment," said Reihl.

American Chemical Society chapter invites guest speaker

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

How does cough syrup work? How and why do viruses make us sick? Why is it difficult to cure the common cold? These and many, many more questions are answered by the science of chemistry.

Chemistry deals with important topics that effect everyday life. It is a science of importance which cannot be stressed enough, yet most lay people know little about the inner workings of chemistry. Educating people about chemistry is one of the goals of the American Chemical Society, or the A.C.S.

The A.C.S. does many things for chemists: It has a service where chemists seeking work can be matched with available jobs, it helps educate others about chemistry, and it organizes gatherings so scientists can meet and talk over problems and possible answers.

The Maryville College campus has a student branch of the A.C.S.; however, its main goal is different from the professional organization. When asked about the purpose of the college's A.C.S. chapter, member Jennifer Cowan said, "Our purpose on campus would be to try to give people in chemistry and science in general an idea of what's going on in chemistry outside our world, outside our classes."

The chapter accomplishes their cussing current topics of interest. Guest speakers are often the focus of meetings. The next meeting of the college's A.C.S. will be held at 7 p.m., Dec. 7, in Sutton Science Center, room 223.

The guest speaker will be Dr. Gregory Robinson, an inorganic chemistry professor at Clemson University in South Carolina. A native of Alabama, Robinson did his undergraduate studies at Jackson State, where he was a star football player. Robinson received his doctorate of philosophy in chemistry from the University of Alabama.

He will discuss his current research, 13-15 compounds. Basically, the subject matter includes aluminum, gallium, and indium bonded with nitrogen, phosphorus, and antimony. For those interested, Robinson and some members of the A.C.S. will eat dinner in the cafeteria about 5:30 p.m. Everyone is welcome to come to the meeting.

When asked about future plans of the A.C.S., Jennifer Cowan stated: "We haven't been really active this year, but we are hoping to be more active in the future."

The chemistry society is mostly composed of chemistry and biology majors, but any major who want to join is not prohibited from joining.

Currently the chemistry society has about 25 members.

International Club celebrates diversity on MC campus

by Ayesha Dastgir
Staff Writer

The International Club is one of the largest clubs on the Maryville College campus. It has a membership of over fifty, representing 17 nationalities and still growing.

As President Yosef Addis pointed out, the club is an organization "where students being away from home can be part of a family," and added that they feel "very close." As new international students come to Maryville College, Addis said he tries to "help out as much as possible. One of the things we do is to find a common ground and help [the student] adjust."

According to Nadia Edoh, the vice president for the second year, the club is where "different nationalities and cultures get together to learn more about each other and interact with each other." She said the interesting thing about meeting new people from different countries is that one finds there is always something in common with another. "As we spend more time together, we realize that although we come from different cultures we have a lot in common," she said.

April Millsaps, the secretary/treasurer, said she believes that the International Club is "foremost a place where international and American students can meet, form friendships, work towards a common goal, and learn from each other."

As for activities planned for the club, the most popular ones are the Annual International Club Dance and the Annual International Club Dinner. The former is held in the fall and the latter event takes place in the spring. Edoh pointed out that the dance, which was held in Isaac's on October 22, "was a success. Even faculty like Dr. and Mrs. Overstreet, and Mrs. Laforest came..." According to Addis, the dinner is "the biggest challenge for the club" because of the preparation involved. Millsaps explained that it is "an event where we cook dinners for the guests, and present shows so that our guests can learn a little bit about the cultures represented at Maryville College. The response to it has been generally really good."

Other activities of the club include having softball, volleyball, and soccer games; playing Frisbee; throwing monthly birthday parties for club members; taking hayride trips; and going to the movies and mountains.

Comments from students have been very favorable. Senior Laura Obuch, a member since her freshman year, said: "I'm really glad I joined it. I've made a lot of really good friends, even though there have been a couple of years I felt I didn't belong. But this year is not that bad."

tional Club because it has given her the opportunity to be a part of a "very special group of people."

Nelvia Gonzalez said she thinks it is good that they are able to get together. "We meet people from different nationalities, and we share and learn more about each other." She added: "At this same time, we get rid of stereotypical ideas/myths we might have about people. Everyone on campus should take advantage of it."

Sara Goelz summed it all up for many Americans students involved with the International Club. "To me the international population is the best part of my education at Maryville College."

Stolen

continue. "We can't punish the student body for the actions of one or two students," said Becconsall. "[STB] will be as creative as it has always been in planning programs."

Even if the thieves who stole the sound board are never prosecuted, some members of the STB felt justice is being served in one small way: The equipment is defective.

"I hope the person who stole it is happy," said Rapp. "Only two [of the eight] channels on it work."

Burkey joins Willard House staff

by Ayesha Dastgir
Staff Writer

Dr. Frederick Burkey is one of the many new faces on campus this fall. He replaces William H. Eting as the new vice president for College Advancement.

Prior to joining his new post on Nov. 1, Burkey was the associate vice president for Administration and Institutional Advancement at Edinboro University of Pennsylvania in Edinboro, PA.

Burkey pointed out four main areas which are under his jurisdiction. The first is the communication and publication of stories about Maryville College. The second area is the development of the campus. (This basically means getting more money for the college through fundraising. The restoration of Carnegie was primarily the result of fundraising drives organized out of the offices of College Advancement.) Maintaining relations between the college and alumni and parent associations is the third area, and his fourth responsibility is strengthening the college's relationship with the Presbyterian Church. Burkey pointed out that his priorities are "the scholarships, general student aid, the replacement of new equipment, and renovations whenever necessary."

Apart from the areas he pointed out, Burkey's personal goals for this college are short and long term. The short term goal is to be able to "successfully complete the capital campaign during the college's 175th anniversary," while long term goals include "strengthening a charitable financial support base." He also hopes to upgrade "every aspect of scholarships."

What about his impressions about Maryville College? "It's a very nice place to be with an excellent academic program and good faculty." He also likes the "intimacy of a small campus and the college's church-related history."

Before his work at Edinboro, Burkey was vice president for College Advancement at Messiah College in Grantham, PA. Prior to that, he was on the advancement staff at Ashland, Ohio. At Ashland, Burkey was the executive director of Development, Alumni and Parent Relations; director of Development, Corporate and Foundation Relations; and director of Church Relations and Campus Ministries.

He holds a doctorate from Ohio State University, a master's degree in religious education from the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, KY, and the bachelor's degree in divinity from Ashland Theological Seminary in Ashland, Ohio.

It was his predecessor, with whom Burkey had worked with for a few years, who suggested Maryville College to Burkey.

Curtain rises Dec. 9 for "The Real Inspector Hound" production

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

What do brown Belgian bunnies and pink pug puppies have to do with this season's Alpha Psi Omega production of "The Real Inspector Hound?"

Quite a bit, actually.

The alliteration is all part of developing the exaggerated British accent—an integral part of preparing for the satire on a clichéd British murder mystery.

Written by Tom Stoppard in 1968, "The Real Inspector Hound" is a play within a play, directed by senior Julie Walker and produced completely by MC students.

In "Inspector Hound," Stoppard, the playwright responsible for the classic "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," parodies not only the British murder mystery, but play reviewers and their connection to the theater in a way that only he could. The play contains melodrama so obviously ridiculous, and dialogue so obviously and intentionally stilted at times that it cannot help but to bring laughter to the lips of the harshest critic.

Walker described the play as a "very ensemble show."

On the Friday night before Thanksgiving break, cast members of "Hound" could be found frolicking on stage in the Wilson Chapel theater. It was their first night on the theater stage. (Because of the theatre commitments with community productions, the first weeks of practice were held in the FAC Music Hall.) They were unapologetically caught up in the excitement of practicing among the stage set, and the pressure of performing without scripts for the first time. Calls for frustration and cries of triumph as the performers remembered their momentarily forgotten lines. When it was all through, and the dust settled, Walker called out tips and evaluations to each of the thespians. When the player evaluations came to an end, Walker and the cast began to evaluate the set. A question about the curtains came up, and other aspects of the set quickly followed.

If the first night in the theater, and the enthusiasm that the cast shares for its production is any indication of the quality of the final performance, then "Inspector Hound" will undoubtedly rival the main stage production of last month's "Prelude to A Kiss." Walker feels confident that "Inspector Hound" will be a success. "It's going great," she said before conceding that she was "a little nervous."

With a cast such as the one assembled, the show has more than promise. The critics are played by Brian Prather and Darrien Thomson. Sarah Stevenson has the role of Lady Muldoon, and Robbie Patton is playing the role of Inspector Hound. Sam Waycaster, of "Prelude" renown, plays the part of Magnus. The part of Felicity Cunningham is performed by Nancy Allen, Rob Riehl takes on the role of Simon Gascoyne, and Eisha Neely is Mrs. Drudge. Melody Alexander has tackled the immense job of stage manager.

"The Real Inspector Hound" opens Dec. 9 at the Wilson Chapel theater, and will run through Dec. 11. The curtain will rise each night at 8 p.m.

It promises to be a show worth seeing, and the student production could certainly use the support of the MC community.

CCM undergoes changes without losing beauty, charm

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

The name of the small chapel in the center of campus is not the Center for Campus Ministry, nor the CCM. Originally known as the Lamar Memorial Library, the tiny building was the first added to the campus after the original three halls—Anderson, Baldwin and Memorial—had been erected.

It was built in 1888 as a memorial for Professor Thomas Jefferson Lamar, the second founder of the college after the Civil War. Lamar taught for 30 years and was chairman of the board of directors from 1869 to 1887. In Samuel Tyndale Wilson's book, "A Century of Maryville College," Lamar is described in heroic stature: "He developed a rare spirit of unselfishness. He felt called to the mission of rebuilding Maryville College. His firm convictions and his high sense of duty made him a Rock of Gibraltar in those troublous times."

Lamar Memorial Library was funded by William Thaw, the Dodges, and the Willards, major contributors to the college in its second coming. The window was provided for $500 by Lamar's brothers and sisters. The inside is designed of oak, symbolic of Lamar's characterization as a man with a "heart of oak."

At the time, Maryville College had expanded from 65 to 250 acres. The number of students increased from 200 to 300. The faculty grew in the 1880's from nine to 17.

The small chapel served as the library, taking the place of the one in Anderson Hall. Lamar Memorial Library kept the college books until 1924, when Thaw Hall was opened.

Lamar Memorial Library was used as the post office and book store from 1926 until 1968. Before 1926, mail had been hand delivered in the morning and afternoon under students' room doors. When using the post office, students would walk through the area where the secretary to the chaplain's office is today. The post office and book store were moved to Fayerweather Hall.

The print shop was housed in the CCM until 1980.

The building's current function as the Center for Campus Ministry began in 1981. Bushing said that "renewed interest came and somebody saw the condition and took down that window and mailed it piece by piece to New York to be repaired." The woodwork was refinished, the stained glass window was repaired, and temporary partitions were removed.

The large pipe organ on the second floor of the CCM was brought in from the Fine Arts Center. Dr. Arthur Bushing, a former instructor at Maryville College, said that the FAC "had at least two or three organs." As the number of organ majors decreased, the need for organs correspondingly decreased.

In the last few years, the fact that the heavy organ is sinking into the floor has been revealed and discussed, but no action has been taken. Faye Humphrey, secretary in the CCM, warns against large groups of more than fifteen gathering on the second floor of the CCM, as "it is dangerous because of the weight of the organ."

Bushing remarked that one of the best experiences he has had in the building was when Martha Hess, the current head of the Registrar's Office, sang. "The domed ceilings in that building have great acoustic qualities," he added.

No "Infotrac" here—

At the turn of the century, the CCM building was known as the Lamar Memorial Library. The letters along the bottom edge of the second level were used to classify the books alphabetically. They have been left and are a reminder of the building's original function.

Campus has grown in acreage over the years

The present campus, the second in the history of Maryville College's 175 years, was acquired in segments throughout the last 126 years. According to the chronicles published by Ralph Waldo Lloyd in 1968, "Maryville College: A History of 150 Years," a total of 400 acres were acquired from 1867 to 1968.

The first purchase of land for the second campus of the college was 60 acres on Oct. 16, 1867. The area bought is today the front and central area of the campus.

On April 12, 1871, the five acres which are now Lamar Avenue and the railroad were purchased.

The College Woods was the largest purchase of MC property on May 31, 1881, by the Lamars. The total acreage added 187 acres to the campus. Today the Morningside Inn, the House in the Woods and the Mountain Challenge Ropes 1 courses are located in the woods.

From 1892 to 1925, 22 more acres were acquired, including the land for Copeland, Lloyd, and Davis.

The land where the heating plant is located was purchased on April 28, 1928. It is the second plant built—the first one was demolished in 1924.

From 1925 to 1934, 53 more acres were purchased.

A.M. Gamble sold the land north of Tuckaleechee Pike, a total of 64 acres, which includes Gamble Hall and Lloyd Beach.

Seven more acres were added until 1968 from adjoining lots north and northeast of MC. Currently, the college totals 480 acres, 160 of which are the College Woods.

MC Football defeats Emory & Henry, ends season at 6-4

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College Scots hosted Emory and Henry—the fourth ranked team in the South—on Nov. 13. The opposing team came to Honaker Field with hopes of winning and going to the NCAA Division III play-off's, but the Scots had something to say about that.

In a game that was decided in the final seconds, Maryville came away with the victory, 29-28.

The Scots gained momentum just before halftime in what might have been the turning point in the game. The Scots were behind 14-7 with three seconds left in the half when Maryville quarterback Adam Heiks threw a 43-yard "Hail Mary" pass in the end-zone. The pass was tipped by Eric Booth, then caught by Andrew Johnson to give Maryville the touchdown. Vance Grant's kick tied the game at 14-14 before halftime.

In the third quarter, Nick White picked off an Emory and Henry pass and returned in 22-yards for a touchdown that was nullified by a penalty. Maryville gained possession at their opponent's 33-yard line after the penalty was stepped off. From there, Greg Shelton found a hole in the defensive line and ran 33-yards for the touchdown. Grant's kick put the Scots up 21-14 going into the fourth quarter.

In the fourth, Emory and Henry struck back with a touchdown and a two-point conversion to give them the lead at 22-21.

The Scots were stopped on their next three possessions, but started their fourth possession at the Emory and Henry 16-yard line after a Mike Hodges' fumble recovery. Ron Silver scored on a third-and-goal. The Scots then converted the two-point conversion on a pass from quarterback John Barry Cox to Doug Parris to give the Scots a 29-22 lead with 2:56 remaining in the contest.

Emory and Henry then drove from their own 20 to the Scots' 25-yard line. They scored on a third down pass. The touchdown made it a 29-28 Maryville advantage with 56 seconds on the clock, and a two-point conversion to decide the game. The opponents passed into the end-zone, but Maryville's White made his second interception of the day to give the Scots a 29-28 victory.

The 1993 Fighting Scots football team finished the year with a respectable 6-4 record.

Senior players finished their careers with four consecutive .500 or plus seasons, and a victory over arch-rival Emory and Henry—an opponent the college hasn't defeated since 1982.

Trust me, I know what I'm doing—
Under intense pressure, quarterback John Barry Cox threw to Doug Parris for a two point conversion that ultimately gave MC the victory over Emory and Henry.

Post-season summaries

Surprises, disappointments, injuries dealt with by teams in fall athletic season

Volleyball

After an 11 year absence, the Lady Scots were invited to the first rounds of the NCAA Division III volleyball tournament in Crestview, KY, where they played rival Thomas More College for the fourth time in the season.

Going into the tournament, the Lady Scots had established a 27-12 record, with three of the 12 losses to Thomas More. A disappointing three-game loss—15-3, 15-6, 15-5—didn't break precedence.

Kelly Sanson added six kills. All-American candidates Jenni McCafferty and Dena Godsey led the team in kills and assists. Power player Godsey added seven to her 342 kills of the season, while McCafferty had 10 set assists. Kasi Ault had nine of 34 digs.

Collectively, the team had three service aces, 18 errors, 17 sets, and 69 total attacks.

Men's Soccer

In their last eight games, Coach Pepe Fernandez's men's soccer team won seven games and tied only one.

But it wasn't enough for a tournament bid. The men finished the season with a 13-5-1 record, and were ranked ninth in the South Region. Only the top five teams in each region saw NCAA tournament action.

Hopes were high for seniors Suan Jordalen, Ryan Riggins, Chad Brown, Todd Tompkins and Jimmy Kelly. Jordalen and Riggins are All-American nominees. Riggins, a record-setting goalkeeper, had six shutouts this season.

Freshman Chris Reid scored 15 goals this season, giving him the No. 4 spot in individual scoring in

Ladies' Soccer

When All-American Julie Dingles went on the injured list early in the season, she had only two goals to make to beat the Maryville College career scoring record.

And Coach Pepe Fernandez had two more players to lose to injuries.

The 1993 Lady Scots soccer team ended their season Oct. 26 with a win over Centre College, 3-2. But the team's record of 10-9 fell well short of pre-season expectations.

After Dingles's injury, junior Jennifer Wells and freshman Leslie Piety suffered both on and off-the-field injuries. In their absence, the team recruited Liz Helle, a softball player, to fill in as goalkeeper.

Senior Christine Neal and sophomore Jarra Griffith led the team in scoring. Griffith led the team in scoring. Griffith piled 16 goals and nine assists, worthy of Division III recognition.

Junior Lara Sibold added to her career shutouts record.

GTE Academic All-American nominees Pam Russell, Briana Brugner, and Griffith also contributed to the winning

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR...

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2148.

Dear Editor,

This letter is a response to the Nov. 12 issue of the "Echo," in which several different opinions were expressed.

The first question that I have to ask is exactly what do students want to read in a college newspaper? Excuse me, but I was under the impression that this was a LIBERAL ARTS institution, not one that forces conformity or silence upon its student body. "Dave's World," in my opinion, is the best and most hilarious column (beside Alene Day's!!) in the whole paper. I agree with many of the points that he makes. What I do not see is why so many complaints have recently been made about the material he presents and the particular way in which he presents it. Leave the man alone!

I only wish I were so talented and so inclined to take a stand on certain issues that deal with my daily life here on this expensive campus. Everyone has a need to express their opinion. But in addition to that need, if those opinions are to be openly expressed, there needs to be some sort of respect for those thoughts.

Not everybody can see life through rose-tinted glasses, and it is very easy to ignore other problems on campus if you are blessed with what you consider to be prime living conditions. More power to you, but do not shove it in everyone else's face. I have, in the past, tried to firmly state my beliefs in the same manner that was addressed in Rachel Winter's letter. I have come to realize from my experience that by doing so, I only accomplished the goal of labeling myself in the eyes of others as just another student with a complaint about the conservative and ridiculous policies of this college. Because of this, I regret to say that I no longer place any belief in any sort of system, no matter how boastfully small it may be. More power to cynicism.

So, COPE with this... I am very fortunate and proud to have Dave's radical voice gracing the pages of my college newspaper. This, to me, is the only real and genuine way that the students can be heard. It is the only way to get a reaction from preoccupied faculty members, and I think there needs to be a type of excitement generated on this campus. So just remember this favorite statement of mine—opinions are like a—holes: Everybody has one, and most of them stink.

Okay, here I am Sunday night—midnight—this column was due two days ago, and I still have yet to come up with what I'm going to write about. Oh boy... I have the Dave Disease... Watch out, it's contagious.

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

Here I am, inspirationless. Ho-hum...and you are probably really bored by now. I ask myself: Do I write about how my senior thesis is seriously kicking my butt right now? Do I write about how the day after I turned in my previous column I was almost in a car wreck (of course I wasn't driving) that most definitely would have wiped my existence off this planet, and how one of my first thoughts was: "WOW! The irony of my column?" Do I write about catching three kids at the daycare where I work playing a cute little game called "Get On Something, Or Pull Down Your Pants" (where do they get this stuff?!), and having the unique pleasure of telling their parents about it? OR, do I just sit here and write about what I've thought about writing about? Jeez...what a drag!!

1:25 a.m. I would just like to apologize to each and every one of you for having to witness this frightening process of me working through a mental block. Today, I've had a block of the visually creative nature—I've just sat in front of blank canvasses and been totally and completely unstimulated, where I usually would not be able to contain myself from diving into my paints and covering the canvas from corner to corner to corner. However, my columns have come to me so easily and naturally. Suddenly, everything has flip-flopped. I am mentally constipated as far as this column is concerned, and I keep looking at my painting in progress there in the corner, and am seeing all sorts of possibilities.

AH-HA!! I finally have a story for you guys. I don't know how pertinent it is, but it is bound to be amusing. It is about that sudden uncontrollable creative inspiration.

Earlier today, a friend dragged me from my warm, comfortable couch and a day that was to be filled with watching football and going out to lunch. Well, we ended up at this little flea market on the way to the mountains—the one with all the flags out front (my personal favorite is the one with a skull on it and the poetic words "Kill 'em all, and let God sort 'em out"—HUH?!?)—do you know the place?

But anyway, I perused the outdoor showcase of mismatched dishes and over-loved stuffed animals. (Children everywhere are asking their parents whatever happened to little Pookie, totally innocent of the fact that little Pookie is on the side of the road somewhere with a 25¢ price tag on its back.) Then I got too cold and went into the shop, unaware of what a sap I would eventually make of myself in front of its inhabitants.

Initially, I was smitten with a Congo drum that was slightly out of my price range, so I moved on. As I worked my way to the far corner of the shop, I saw IT—this badly beaten upper half of a mannequin, that was missing one arm completely and the arm she did have did not have a hand.

But I had to have that mannequin because I had an IDEA.

Uh-oh.

In a flurry I grabbed the thing off the shelf and approached the counter hugging my prize to ask: "How much?" The little group of local men around the counter were eyeing me funny. I guess that I did look a little crazy clutching this fake woman practically by the breasts, my eyes bright with inspiration, and my braids flying out behind me. I don't think that I was the type of person that they were used to—they were perfectly nice and all, but their necks were a little red. Oh well.

They informed me that the shirt and beads on my mannequin were not part of the deal. No problem, I thought. So I took off the beads and unbuttoned the shirt only to discover a blazing red, K-Mart-esque, circa 1979 bra had been put on her. Well, everyone just lost it. I was suddenly overcome with embarrassment when I realized that I was going to have to take this bra off in front of these men. Luckily, there was one woman in the bunch who came to my rescue just as I discovered the FISH BAIT TABLE!!! 12 for $1!! What a bargain!!! I began filling a bag with tons of purple and blue squirmy-looking rubber worms.

Now remember... I had an IDEA, a VISION.

At that point, the people there smartly thought just to stay out of my way, but when I grabbed a purple glittery motorcycle helmet and slammed it on the mannequin's head, they were going to call the little men in white jackets for me. But I gave them no further entertainment after that, and I left clutching my mannequin (nude except for the helmet) and my bag of worms.

Look for this creation at my senior show in May if you are curious to see in what this combination of purchases may result. Actually, I visualize a series, so if you see any other mannequins or mannequin parts for sale, PLEASE let me know!

WOW, what do you know? I do have a point: Give anything a little time and effort, and it will eventually come around, much like my creative block, and much like this column. Whew!

*From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .Editorial

Without using the word C-O-P-E, I'm going to climb on my soap box once again and respond to some of the goings-on at Maryville College.

There seems to be a big lack of respect for other people, their opinions, and their property here on campus.

First of all, I would like to make some things clear: A column, an editorial and letters written to newspaper staffs are similar in one way— they are all mediums for expressing opinions.

With that in mind, I would like to next address the letter submitted to the editor and published in this issue of the Echo. The student who wrote the letter expressed her opinion that those students who responded to an earlier Dave's World column should not have complained. Yet, in her own words she said: "...If [Dave's] opinions are to be openly expressed, there needs to be some sort of respect for those thoughts."

At this point, I would like to remind everyone on this campus that the freedom of speech holds no value if not everyone feels that he or she can say or write whatever is felt. One person's opinion is just as good as the next. And, in the words of a good friend: "Respect goes both ways." To tell the student body to "leave the man alone" is telling other students not to act on whatever reaction they may have to Dave's column.

Yet, she sent the letter in the good faith that her words would be printed. And they were. In defense of the three authors who submitted letters printed Nov. 12, I speak for them and my staff when I assure everyone that no one on this campus is attempting to silence anyone.

Unfortunately, I think this lack of respect spills over into our daily living here on campus.

by Dave Roberts

Hey kids.

Today, Dave's World isn't going to be funny or witty or wry or sarcastic or caustic or any of the adjectives in that general family. Dave is in the throes of deep depression; nay, buried in an avalanche of angst; nay, drowning in a sea of sorrow; nay, mired in existential muck; nay... well, you get the point. I'm bummed.

Why, you ask? Isn't it obvious? Life sucks a big one.

1. Relationships are transitory.
2. Connections are deceiving.
3. Love hurts.

There it is in a nutshell. I am bummed because no one can seem to overcome their essential alienation and really connect with one another on any kind of genuine level. And when any two people make steps in that direction, they simply accumulate a trunk full of psychological baggage which eventually only serves to add to the weight of their inevitable disappointment. Eventually, the choice arises: (a) force your psychic broker to cut the losses and withdraw your investment, or (b) commit him to a lifelong dependence on the Bulls and Bears of the emotional stock market (Lord, if you're there, deliver us from goofy analogies). Eventually, the road of any relationship leads to the intersection of "All or Nothing." Even when it only lurks on the horizon, it is always coming closer.

Do you ever get the feeling that your foundations are still a little too squirrly to begin laying the bricks of commitment? That your intellectual and emotional troops are not fully trained to defend against the guerrilla attacks of hard decisions? At what age are you really capable of properly advising your psychic broker? 21? 22? Have you examined the metaphysical bricks with which you have built your own world-view? How many are wishful thinking, how many are lack of experience? How many are really in sync with reality? Why ask why? Try... winging it.

But anyway.

Seniors: Alert! Is life tapping you on the shoulder? Are you suddenly being forced to decide a direction for the rest of your life, maybe before you are capable of an informed decision? Do you feel like deadlines are hurtling at you like Mack trucks? Are you ever tempted to do what those morons did in that movie "The Program"— lay in the center of the highway and hope the trucks pass you by without touching you? A couple of guys tried that in real life, you know (earth to jocks, come in jocks... we're losing you...), and now they are road pizza. Is there a moral to this story? Maybe.

The messages I am receiving from the various advisors in my schizophrenic brain are

The college's sound board was stolen and personal belongings are being taken from students' rooms.

Yes, the world is changing. But we're stealing from ourselves.

The sound board was paid for by student activities fees— money that came from your own pocket, the pockets of your parents, or the stash at your local bank. On a smaller note, I have to go in search of salt and pepper shakers when I eat in the dining hall. There's no doubt in my mind that they're being tucked into jackets, and dropped into purses and backpacks.

Yes, you did, in a way, pay for that, too. But with that mentality, do you also go into a doctor's office and lift the framed picture on the wall?

There has been a lot of talk this semester about the covenant. The idea behind it is that some day, in the future, the students at Maryville College will ultimately be governed by it, and of the rules of the handbook. Students will live together in an environment where people don't lie, cheat, or steal.

Recent criminal acts on campus are now making the ideals behind the covenant look like a farce. And that's unfortunate.

When student senate asks for signatures at spring registration, the covenant will not be in force. We will still be governed by the judicial processes now in operation. But signing it means that we hope this campus will someday function under the laws of common courtesy, and that we will recruit students who will take it seriously.

oppositely charged poles, and I'm tuned in to a lot of conflicting forces. Static. All I know is that my pastoral grazing in the school systems of Tennessee has not prepared me for the cattle drive of modern society (Lord, could you not intervene and save us from our sinfully goofy metaphors?). I've become accustomed to mellow, and it doesn't seem like America will have much room left for mellow at the turn of the millennium. Goals goals goals. Ends over means, results over process, purpose over presence, producing over becoming... am I babbling? If all the roses are paved over, who can stop and smell them?

But, then, Mack trucks don't listen to whiny objections, do they? The tax man doesn't take kindly to existential queries. He prefers cash payment. So, you face commitment or you face what can only be a temporary escape from it. You limit your choices or time will limit them for you. Woohoo. Did I mention that life sucks a big one?

But anyway.

Off the depression tip, then. Dave's World will resume its normal tone of periodically humorous, frequently offensive smart-assness in a couple of weeks. Right now I'm having some trouble choking down the bitter black coffee that the universe has brewed for me... and I can't seem to find any cream or sugar. Forgive me my pity party.

P.S. I hear vague rumors from the higher-ups on the Echo that we are considering devoting some room to a rotating guest column... in other words, once every two weeks, any one of you can bitch about whatever bugs you. You too can vent your spleen! Write to the editor and express support if you dig that idea.

P.P.S. Dave's World would like to thank an ugly friend and a beautiful stranger for giving a s**t about its existence in recent weeks. As Bartles & James say: "Thank you fer yer support." Peace.

Summer school rates drop by more than half

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

In the past, many Maryville College students would have liked to have responded to the question "What are you going to do during your summer vacation?" with the answer "I'm going to school."

For many students, that has not been financially possible until this year.

Recently, the decision was made to drop the summer school rates to $135 per semester hour. In the past, day classes during the summer were the same as they were during the regular school year. Students can compare the $135 charge with the $300 charge summer students paid in 1993.

When asked why this adjustment had been made, Registrar Martha Hess explained, that "day students get services the evening students don't have during the fall and spring semesters."

Since these extra services, such as sports and activities, are not offered in the summer, students will only pay for the courses.

This also means that the rates for day and evening summer

Alden Stuart.

Stuart hopes that this change will generate interest, get more people to take summer classes, and make the program more competitive.

The summer classes are offered in three week terms from 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. "We're trying to give our students most of their summer," Hess said.

Evening courses are divided into five week terms because they only meet twice a week.

Summer day courses are mostly general education courses, while evening classes are a mixture of both general and specific major courses. However, if enough students display an interest, a course for a specific major could be provided.

Planning and registration for summer school will take place in the spring.

courses will be the same. Both day and evening students will be able to take advantage of all courses. "We wanted to make the rate equal to the Continuing Education rate for people in the community," said Treasurer

English, history, religion and philosophy merge into new humanities department

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

HUMANITIES(hu-man'i-tiz)n. 1. Human characteristics and attributes; feelings or sensibilities common to mankind; matters of interest or appeal to men generally.

The consolidation of the English department, the history department, and the religion and philosophy department into one "humanities division" has been set to take effect Feb. 1. The idea of combining departments into divisions is not a new one. Maryville College already has a social science division and a fine arts division. The humanities division will be organized along those same lines.

Academic Vice President Dean Boldon stated that the main reasons for the change are administrative convenience and greater coordination between departments. When questioned about the timing of the decision, Boldon said that one factor was personnel. "We were waiting for the right person to head it and now we have one," he said.

The head of the new humanities division will be Dr. Susan Schneibel, presently chair of the department of languages and literature. When asked how she views the added responsibility and increased workload of the new job, Schneibel said: "I view this job as a position of service."

The chairs of the other two departments also seemed happy with the prospect of their administrative duties lightening. "I'm looking forward to less paperwork crossing my desk," said Dr. David Cartledge, chair of the religion and philosophy departments.

There are some concerns with the new division, however. Dr. Sarah McNiell, history department chair, related some of the concerns of her department: "When we become a division, we will be part of the biggest division on campus. We want to be included fully, but we also want autonomy." Cartledge also talked about autonomy: "The department will be giving up a certain sense of autonomy. On the other hand, there will be a real chance for cooperation."

"I think this will benefit the students in the long run, and if they have any concerns, I'll be happy to hear from them."

—Susan Schneibel

A hope of increased cooperation between departments is another reason the division is being created, and several people agree that it will be advantageous. "We like the possibilities of coordination," said McNiell.

"I hope to see a new focus brought to common concerns and common challenges we face in the humanities. I hope to see more opportunities for creative thinking in curricular matters," said Schneibel of the possibilities in consolidation.

Having mentioned curriculum, exactly how will this change effect students?

"I don't think it will make any difference as far as curriculum goes," said Cartledge. McNiell and Boldon had similar predictions.

In addition to having more administrative duties, Schneibel will continue to teach, but she will teach less and advise fewer students. "There will be adjustments made in my teaching load and advising load," she explained.

After Feb. 1, Schneibel will be the person to go to when students have problems with classes. "When you have problems with a class, you always talk with the teacher first. If that doesn't solve it, you go to the department chair. Since that will no longer exist, you would come to me."

Are spirits high going into this change? Cartledge says yes and no. "I am going into it in a kind of a neutral way. I am neither optimistic nor pessimistic."

Many faculty members are adopting this "wait and see" attitude.

Schneibel said she is optimistic about the change. "I think this will benefit the students in the long run, and if they have any concerns, I'll be happy to hear from them."

In addition to the humanities, another new division has been created. The teacher education department, the physical education and recreation department, and the nursing department are also being joined into the education division. Dr. Marcia Keith, who is now director of the two-person teacher education program, will be the head of the four-person education division.

Will these changes be beneficial? Students will just have to wait and see.

Echo receives criticism, advice from focus groups

by Karen Beaty
Editor

Results of the graduate research project involving "The Highland Echo" were given to Jeff Gary, Echo advisor, early last week.

Cindy Roberts, a University of Tennessee graduate student, titled her project: "Strategies for Targeting the College Age Audience." In the research, she attempted to address three questions:

"How do students view 'The Highland Echo'?"

"Is the paper useful to students in its present form?"

"What would students like the paper to be?"

To find answers to her question, Roberts organized two focus groups made up of students (none of whom were Echo staff members).

In total, the focus groups consisted of 16 Maryville College students—three freshmen, four sophomores, six juniors, and three seniors. Each focus group met once during the third week of October. At that time, "The Highland Echo" had published two issues.

During the discussions, Roberts let students compare the "Echo" with four other small college publications: Bryan College's "The Triangle," Milligan College's "The Stampede" Tennessee Wesleyan's

"The New Exponent" and Knoxville College's "The New Aurora." Roberts found that he results of Most students agreed that stories in the paper were too "academic-oriented," and that there needed to be lighter reading offered.

Roberts found that the focus groups indicated that by and large, the reporting was fair. "[The students'] consensus is that although the reputation of 'The Highland Echo' could be improved significantly, it is not overly biased."

The design of MC's paper drew criticism. (See boxes.) Most students liked the way in which the other school newspapers used photos, spot color, and cartoons. A content box on the front page of "The Stampede" was applauded by many participants.

One topic Roberts found interesting while listening to the focus groups was their opinion that the newspaper is a "recruiting and retention tool." She found that some students would like to see the paper sent to prospective students. "And, by offering valuable information specific to freshmen, they thought the newspaper might assist first-year students at a time when they are deciding whether to return or transfer," she added.

The results of the research will be thoroughly examined by "Echo" staff members during January. They hope to make feasible changes based on the student criticism.

Here's what readers said:

They like the Echo's:

- ☐ Unbiased reporting
- ☐ Tabloid size
- ☐ Follow-up stories
- ☐ "Dave's World" and other student-opinion columns

Where the paper doesn't make the grade:

- ☐ "Heavy" subject matter
- ☐ Story placement (what goes on front page, fourth page, etc.)
- ☐ Printing "old" news
- ☐ No color
- ☐ Not enough photo coverage
- ☐ No cartoons
- ☐ No advertising

the data from the two focus groups "closely resembled each other in content."

Students advised to think before they pack

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

It's that time of year again—time to pack up the gear and head home.

But what goes and what stays?

Some students don't feel the college is secure enough during holiday breaks. Mark Gerrard was a sophomore when he returned from Thanksgiving break to find his room in Copeland Hall emptied of all his property. "I got cleaned out," he said. "Everything—a computer, jewelry, luggage, stereo, and about $800 worth of CD's." Gerrard assessed his losses to be nearly $2500, but he speculated that the culprit did not break into the room. "There was no sign of forced entry," Gerrard explained. "[The thief] used a key." His one piece of advice for students who are afraid of being robbed during the holidays was: "Don't bring anything expensive to school!"

Many residents fear that theft may occur over the holidays, but college officials assure that with some precautions, items will remain safe.

Stephanie Wyatt, the director of residence life, said: "I hope things like [theft] won't happen."

Wyatt has a few tips for keeping property safe. "Any personal belongings of high value, such as jewelry or mementos, should be taken home or put out of view." Wyatt said she felt that packing up major electronics, such as television sets and stereos, is "not necessary."

The residence halls officially close down on Dec. 16, and the only people who have access to the rooms are resident directors and exterminators. Wyatt assured that the exterminators "will be accompanied by a college official."

The closing date for all offices of the college is Dec. 24.

"Someone in security will be on duty 24 hours until students return. Sometimes maintenance workers will answer the phones, but someone will be here," said

Yes, but will it fit?—

This Christmas vacation, students would do well to guard their valuables against theft.

Chief Eldria Hurst, head of campus security. He also gave some precautions for keeping certain items safe: "Bicycles should be taken inside and put into storage, and we would like cars that are left on campus to be parked in the Pearsons lot (between Pearsons and Sutton), because it is well lit and we won't have to drive to every lot to make sure cars are safe."

Mentally-challenged workers find employment with Marriott and Maryville College

Jeff Carpenter, Kevin Collins and Lori Potter look at the gingerbread houses they made during a Christmas party for Douglas Cooperative and a local children's home. Carpenter and Potter are co-op employees for Marriott in Pearson's cafeteria.

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

Jeff Carpenter, Lori Potter, Paulette Thomas, and Boots Wright have a few things in common. They each have overcome insurmountable odds, and they are all employed by the Marriott Corporation through the local Douglas Cooperative, Inc.

Carpenter, Potter, Thomas, and Wright are all mentally-challenged individuals, and they are part of the Supportive Employment Program that is operated through Douglas Cooperative.

"The biggest purpose of it is the normalization of the mentally handicapped, and moving them into the mainstream of society," explained Mike Blair, an instructor with Douglas Cooperative.

The Supportive Employment Program places mentally-challenged individuals in businesses throughout the community that are willing to employ them. It matches employees' abilities, needs, and interests with the needs of employers.

Other than the Marriott Corporation, the program has placed individuals at McDonald's, Morrison's, Save-A-Lot, Red Food, and Service Master.

"Marriott has taken them in and accepted them as one of the employees," said Billie Hembree, a job coach for the Supportive Employment Program. "I wish we had more people like Kevin [Collins], who were willing to give them a chance and see what they can do."

Collins, the Marriott manager for MC, said that Carpenter, Potter, Thomas, and Wright "are very, very hard workers. They are determined to get the job done." He explained that the entire staff has worked with them, and he said that "the staff and students have been very receptive." He commented that having them as employees has helped to get Marriott and its employees more involved in the community. Just recently Marriott sponsored a Christmas party for Douglas Cooperative, and a local children's home. "We are looking to do something like it in the summer," Collins said.

They are very, very hard workers. They are determined to get the job done.

— Kevin Collins

The Douglas Cooperative itself is a center for handicapped individuals that operates as a supervised workshop. The handicapped individuals that are a part of the center are considered employees, and they receive regular monthly paychecks according to the amount of work that they do. The employees do outside contract work, and part of the profit goes to Douglas Cooperative to keep it up and running. They typically do furniture re-finishing, but have also done contract work for Proffitt's, and have made brochures for Dollywood.

Pauline T. Smith, Thomas's mother, said: "I think [the Supportive Employment Program] is wonderful." Carpenter's mother, Mary A. Carpenter, explained that employees "work as many days as they are capable."

Hembree said the community is not as involved with Douglas Cooperative as she would like, but quickly added that "[Maryville College] students seem to have accepted our people very well."

Carpenter and Potter have been working for the Marriott since May of this year. They started out working in the dish room, and were eventually moved out onto the floor.

Thomas and Wright began work at MC just recently. "I've been working here for about six weeks, and I love it," Thomas said.

Inquiries about Douglas Cooperative, Inc., should be directed to Job Development Coordinator Joyce Mortier at 983-5522.

Willard House serves as Alumni Center, hosts receptions

by Jeff Huffman
Assistant Editor

Willard House, the third oldest surviving building on campus, was built in 1890. It served as the residence for three presidents, a Dean of Women, two professors, and students.

Jane F. Willard donated $11,000 in her husband's name, Sylvester Willard for a large house for the fourth president of Maryville College. Willard was a major donor in the late 19th century who helped the college through some of its toughest times. The blueprints for Willard House were drawn up by Beaver and Hoffmeister of Knoxville and the contractors were Knoxville's Stephenson and Getaz.

Dr. Samuel Boardman, the fourth president, lived in Willard House with his family of one wife and nine children from 1891 until 1901.

The fifth president, Dr. Samuel Tyndale Wilson, moved into Willard House when he assumed the office of president of Maryville College. The eight members of his family lived there and some of Willard House was used as a student hospital until 1909. The Wilson's lived in the house for 29 years.

Ralph Waldo Lloyd, MC's sixth president, moved into the house in 1930. It was a home to his wife and four children until Willard House in 1984. The building was in sore need of repairs and renovations 94 years after it had been built. Today it is one of the most beautiful buildings on campus both outside and inside.

This is the first heating plant on the MC campus. Built in 1893, the plant was regarded as a great addition to MC. A boiler house contained two 60 horsepower boilers which produced steam that was carried by underground pipes (the famed "tunnels") to each Hall. It was built at a cost of $10,000. In 1939, a new heating plant was built. Its capacity was doubled in 1951 to its current size today. New steam lines were added in 1959. Southern Railway Systems claimed a right-of-way for the railroad in 1953, but no action was taken as the evidence was weak for the company.

1951. The Board of Directors decided the Morningside house should become the president's new residence.

From 1953 to 1968, Frances Massey, Dean of Women, lived in Willard. She shared her residence with her father, other staff members, and students.

By 1969, Director of Development Raymond I. "Brick" Brahm resided in Willard House. He and his family lived there until 1972.

In 1973, a special project in experiential living was undertaken. Tom Taylor, a science professor, overlooked 12 students who lived in the house together. The students prepared their own meals as well as lived without hot water. They used as little electricity as possible.

The last family to reside in Willard House was the family of Dr. David Young. The professor of chemistry and his family lived in the structure for one year.

In 1981, a campaign was begun by the Alumni class of '42 to raise money to renovate Willard House. The 90-year-old structure needed extensive repairs and renovation.

The building was officially registered in the National Register of Historic Places in 1982.

With a grant from the Tennessee Historical Commission, renovations of the exterior of Willard House were finished in 1983-84.

The Proffitt, Lloyd, and Kramer families, families which have supported Maryville College for many years renovated the interior of the first floor.

Other donors contributed to the renovation of the second floor. By 1988, the renovation was complete.

Today, Willard House serves as the center for Alumni functions and as the meeting place for many receptions and board meetings.

Libby Rankin, Director of Research and Records, said, "It's used quite a bit when major donors come to campus."

Those who work in Willard House commented that it seemed students were apprehensive to visit the historic structure. Willard House is open to any who wish to visit it.

Willard House is perhaps the most beautiful building on campus. Inside, luxurious furniture, carpet and drapery adorn the different rooms. A massive dining table sits with many historic paintings lining the walls. The entire first floor is used for receptions and meetings, while the second floor is used for the Alumni and Parent's Programs Office, the Advancement Office and the Records and Research Office.

Inside the library in Willard House are yearbooks from every year since the first at the turn of the century.

There is also a third floor and a basement in the building.

Staff at Willard House invite anyone from campus or community to come and take a look at Maryville College's third oldest surviving building.

MC FACTS MC FACTS

Our apologies to Dr. Sarah McNiell, Professor of the History Department, for two errors in last issues "MC FACTS" box. McNiell said that fact #1 about Chili the dog being buried in the college cemetery was attempted, but the request was turned down by college officials. It seemed inappropriate for a pet to be buried next to former college presidents.

Fact #4 about Thaw Hall being named after a murderer is wrong. William Thaw's son, Harry K. Thaw, shot and killed a man. He was acquitted on grounds of temporary insanity.

The Echo apologizes for the inaccurate facts. We thank Dr. McNiell for her assistance in correcting these mistakes.

How you shouldn't deal with stress (and how you should) during the week of finals

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

FINALS!

They're here, and all students have to deal with them (with a few lucky exceptions). Within the past two weeks the stress level on this campus has risen dramatically, and it's fairly common to hear friends say "I'm pretty stressed out," or, "I'm stressing," in response to queries about how they are dealing with their finals.

According to senior Brian Villamueva, "finals are what separate the men from the boys. It shows how well you can deal with stress."

But what is stress? We use the term a lot, and we should probably define it so we know exactly what we are talking about.

For those of you who have taken Psychology 101, think back to the course. For those of you who have not, you're about to get a day's lecture from the class.

According to Dr. Lori Schmied, MC's resident stress psychologist, stress is "the process by which we perceive and respond to certain events that exceed our ability to cope." When asked how to avoid stress, Dr. Schmied responded: "You can't avoid stress. The key is coping."

Stress, caused by a factor known to psychologists as a stressor, can be anything from a daily hassle, such as getting up on an 8 a.m. class, to a major life event, such as graduating from college.

Unfortunately for us, stress is cumulative, and the more stressful events one experiences, the more serious are its consequences. As stress levels build up, we tend to develop psychosomatic disorders, also known as stress-related illnesses. Examples of these disorders include irritable bowel movements, migraine and tension headaches, and ulcers.

The immediate physiological response to stress is the activation of the Sympathetic Nervous System (SNS), which is basically one's fight or flight response. The fight or flight response, however, usually does not apply to the stressful events in our lives, and it certainly isn't appropriate in the case of finals. We certainly cannot run from the tests, and although it may be a fantasy of many, we can't deck our professors when they hand us our exams.

Instead, we have to cope with the stressor.

There are two types of coping strategies for stress: emotion-focused and action-focused. Emotion-focused coping strategies generally deal with ignoring the stressor. They include sleeping, biting fingernails, screaming, exercising, crying, listening to music, drinking and smoking, or just plain denial, as freshman John Reiter demonstrated. "Finals? What finals?"

The action focused strategies are those that deal with the stressor by means of conflict resolution and time management.

Cheri Torres, advisor to The Wellness Force and a counselor for Crawford House, was interviewed in relation to the "Take A Break... Stress Relievers" program series that the Wellness Force recently sponsored. The purpose, according to Torres, was "sort of two-fold... to provide stress relief, and to learn by experiencing it." She said that the programs were "guaranteed to re-energize people."

When people get stressed, according to Torres, they get too serious, basically ignore their bodies, and fail to give them what they need. As a result, they become sick, and their bodies shut down. They don't get enough sleep, and their diets go downhill. They become self-critical instead of self-supportive, and they refuse to ask for help when they need it.

Some people panic and just give up. Smokers tend to smoke in excess, and some people turn to alcohol. According to Torres, relying on alcohol during times of stress is a good indicator that one may have an alcoholic problem. Other people use marijuana, a solution that is less than ideal, especially during exams. "It scatters thoughts, fuzzies thinking," said Torres.

Torres also discussed the study habits of many students during exams. Students tend to work when they're tired, and consequently do the same thing over and over again. Torres said that "breaks are more efficient."

Schmied said the best thing to do is to "work on time management—the best coping strategy is to use space-learning."

When asked about finals, junior Rachel Winters said: "I'm ready to get them over with."

Exams are here, people—but don't wig. If you just relax, manage your time, and take study breaks, you'll be okay.

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

Yodee folks! I have a follow-up before I begin:

The Doo-Doo Smear Update: After talking to Bubba after Bubba, I finally found a blessed soul to take it off my hands. But here's the kicker...I'm getting a whole $50 for it (MAYBE). Isn't that pathetic!?!? My car and my memories—sold for less than the cost of a Big Wheel. I'll just barely be able to cover the cost of the initial towing. That trips my trigger.

And now on with the show...

HAPPY HOLIDAYS EVERYONE!!! Aw yeah, it's vacation time again at Maryville, and I can't wait. I can't wait to sleep late (but of course, I do that anyway). I can't wait to eat tons of free food. I can't wait to see old friends and be grateful that I'm am no longer in the same town and doing the exact same things I did in high school. (I love my old friends, but can we say "stagnant"? I can't wait to sit down by myself with nothing to do but reflect upon what a fantastic year 1993 has been. I can't wait to imagine what 1994 has in store for me, and decide what I have in store for it.

Let me give you a bit of history so that you can understand where I'm coming from at this point. 1992 sucked. I had a Christmas vacation last year that I would not wish upon my worst enemy. As I was partying New Year's Eve—right before the balloons fell and confetti flew, I closed my eyes and vowed to myself that 1993 would be a better year. Note I did not set unreal expectations, I did not specify how, or why, I just said "better," which wouldn't be hard to do considering.

But I had little idea exactly how much better everything would be, or that my life would make a complete turn around. Granted, this didn't happen right away, in fact it was a little rough in the beginning.

In the last week in August KABLAMMO boom...instant enlightenment. It began at my brother's wedding and has just snowballed from there. I don't know if it was the fact that my entire family was in one room and there was no bloodshed, or if it was the fact that I met some fantastic people who reaffirmed my belief that there are a lot of people in this world who are smart, funny, considerate, can party with the best of them, and who don't mind looking silly in the name of fun (I refer to my brother's friends). Whatever it was set me off on a new approach to everything that I did. I realized that if all I wanted and enjoyed wasn't here at Maryville, then I needed to do what had to be done to get out of Maryville and get to where I wanted to be. But I refused to do this as if it was a chore. I was determined to enjoy the ride—and I could not enjoy anything if I was surrounded by people that were a useless waste of my energy, people I did not understand, or did not understand me, or people who wanted nothing more than what they have right now and are content with a superficial existence, and have no goals to grow intellectually, or spiritually.

Now I have surrounded myself with people with similar goals and ambitions. I have found a new kind of peace in my life, and am loving it. I understand why I do the things that I do, and I understand why I've done the things that I've done. If I've made mistakes (and I've made plenty), I see where I went wrong and now know how to avoid doing the same thing in the future. I hold no grudges. I seldom get mad at anyone anymore. Instead, I try to understand what it is that makes them the way they are, and it makes it a whole lot easier for me to deal with. I can be objective in almost any conflict and see different angles (with the exception of a few issues). I think that I even understand men to a certain extent (though that does not stop me from getting screwed over by them—no pun intended). Of course everyone thinks that I am now Miss Pollyanna Sunshine and are tempted to hurl whenever I'm around, but I am not lacking in passion by any means.

Now none of my energy is wasted on frivolous feelings of irritation or stupid infatuations. Now I can recognize a good thing and focus my energy on that. Be it a cause, a person, a painting (or mannequin), or a column. It's an incredible feeling and one that I hope everyone has a chance to experience at some point.

Yes folks, I AM WOMAN HEAR ME ROAR! GGGRRRRRRRR!!!!

Just wait a second while I climb down off my box-o-soap...

So, what could I possibly want for 1994? Here is my wish list...

10. More of the same good stuff that went on in 1993

9. A diploma to wave in everybody's face come July

8. A ticket (or a car to get me there) to San Francisco and a job as a photographer for Rolling Stone Magazine (why not aim high?)

7. People to realize what is and what isn't important, and to act upon that realization

6. A date with Sting (like I said, why not aim high?)

5. The Serbs to leave Bosnia the hell alone

4. Three more mannequins, new paints, and paintbrushes

3. A new Fine-Arts Center, both literally and figuratively

2. Good health for everyone, especially my family

1. Cures for AIDS, Cancer, and other modern plagues

There you have it...now let's just hope that the big ball in Times Square doesn't get stuck on that pole, 'cause that would just be a bad sign...

Have a great and safe vacation everyone, let's all make 1994 a year to remember and enjoy.

Editorial

When I interviewed people for "The Campus Question" (page 4,5), I was surprised that when people were asked what they wanted for Christmas, so many answered with comments about going home or seeing loved ones for the holidays.

I guess I see the importance, too.

In my opinion, the new year should logically begin at Christmas time. That's when most people reflect on what's happened in the last year. Unfortunately, the reflection is usually on what gift was given or received, what was cooked, or how tall the tree was, but eventually, we always contemplate how we have changed or how others have changed in a year's time.

About this time last year, I moved everything out of my single in Lloyd. My clothes, my television, and my refrigerator were packed and loaded into my dad's station wagon on Dec. 15 and taken home to Oneida, TN. I would fly out for Puerto Rico and a semester abroad exactly one month later.

The rest of the holidays were spent in typical Beaty fashion. Christmas Eve was spent with my father's family, Christmas Day was spent with my mother's. I don't remember much about what I gave or received in the way of presents, I don't remember if the turkey was dry or "just right" (although I could bet that the bread was burned—my mother always burns the bread), and I don't remember what the tree looked like.

What I remember is something that happened after Christmas.

For some reason or another, my mother and I drove to Knoxville in late December to visit "Mamaw," my mother's mother. We didn't stay for a very long visit because my mother felt obligated to see another relative before we went home.

Mamaw, who was 91 at the time and lived alone, became very angry and jealous at our departure. She and my mother argued, then refused to speak. Mom and I left in silence.

When we were almost out of the driveway, my mother stopped the car and made me go back in the house and tell Mamaw good-bye, because "you never know what's going to happen."

That wasn't the last time I saw my grandmother.

But when I hugged Mamaw and told her good-bye, it would be the last time that she saw me, and knew who I was.

Not long after that visit, my family decided it was best that Mamaw came to live with them in Oneida. Within a matter of months—the time I was out of the country—her memory deteriorated.

Her stay has meant a change for my everyone at home, because her behavior is often that of an unruly child. We've learned to laugh when she calls us liars, accuses us of stealing from her, and calls us by the wrong names.

I guess that I've learned something else, too—every Christmas from here on out has the potential to be different. Any of my siblings could be married next year. Mamaw might still be with us, she might not. We could all be employed—we could all be unemployed. We might all be healthy, we might not.

Christmas Eve with the Beaty's and Christmas Day with the Frazier's isn't guaranteed. Nothing is. But I'll enjoy it while I can.

Merry Xmas, kids!

Final exams. Final exams. Final exams. Final exams. Final exams. Final exams. Final exams.

Yeah, me too.

But don't mope, it's Christmas time! A time of myths and magic... mysteries and miracles... a time of ceremony and ritual... a time when a long-haired, non-conforming Jewish rabbi and a big, fat, jolly, bearded, white philanthropist fight for public attention... a time when you run downstairs one morning in your underwear and find that a bunch of cool stuff just appeared there under a tree for you... a time when soothing carols are being piped at you in malls to keep you from flipping out and fagging as many of the stampeding shoppers as possible with a submachine gun before the cops get to you... a time when advertisers race to see who can be the most bland, sappy, sentimental, and, of course, profitable... a time of warm love and deep depression... togetherness and loneliness... a time to remember what you have and struggle to forget for a while what you don't have... half a month or so when you are supposed to imagine peace on earth and good will towards men... Christmas—fear it.

Not to say that I don't have a list of stuff I want like everybody else.

DAVE'S CHRISTMAS LIST

1. I wish the "senior slide" would be factored into my GPA.
2. I wish classes would begin every day at noon, no earlier.
3. I wish a team of internationally renowned chefs would take over our cafeteria.
4. I wish we had something as modern as an elevator in Anderson.
- 4.5. (And one that worked in Carnegie.)
5. I wish this school could be a completely harmonious place, where everybody could do their own thing, where everybody could learn a lot about life without the pressure of competition or the threat of refection. I wish this college could be a place where everybody finds out something that completely amazes them, about themselves or the world. I wish they could pursue it until they felt like it had become a part of them and they a part of it. I wish nobody had to learn anything, but everybody wanted to learn everything. I wish everybody here knew each other and felt no suspicion, fear, or contempt towards anybody else. I wish that there was humor and understanding, not one or the other. As the Jane's Addiction song goes:

I wish I knew everyone's nickname,
All their slang and all their sayings,

Every way to show affection,
How to dress for the occasion,
And I wish we all waved...
We all waved...
We all waved...

5.5. Wait, what am I talking about? I don't care what happens to this podunk school. I want a free plane ticket to somewhere as far away from the pick-up-truck-infested foothills of the Smoky Mountains as possible, like Bora Bora or Australia. Or Amsterdam.

5.75. Maybe I want both.

6. I wish neither the politicians nor the majority had any say in what women take out of their bodies. Or what motorcyclists put on their heads. Or what young people put into their brains. Or what lovers put into each other. Or the artists put into their work. Or what it means to be an artist.

7. I wish all those celebrities making these tear-jerker commercials surrounded by starving kids would give the kids some of the sushi and filet mignon they have waiting on them in their dressing rooms.

7.5. I wish those kids didn't need anybody's sushi or filet mignon.

8. I wish everybody had their cake and could eat it too.

9. I wish God would put up or shut up.

10. To paraphrase Tom Robbins:

I wish nobody believed in anything; everything is sacred.

I wish everybody believed in everything; nothing is sacred.

I wonder if Santa can deal with that.

All right, kids: don't stress too hard about finals. Don't stress too hard about anything. And remember the true meaning of Christmas: If one day can be free and happy, why can't the other 364? Anyway, I will talk to you next year. Peace.

MC hoops missing fan support at home

by Karen Beaty
Assistant Editor

Dean Walsh, the assistant coach for the Maryville College boys' basketball team, is embarrassed when he coaches games at home.

It's not because of his team's performance — it's because of low student turn-out at the basketball contests.

"After a game, we've had coaches from the opposing team ask us: 'Are your students in school?' It's embarrassing," said Walsh.

As of last week, the men's team is 8-5, and the women, 10-3. Coach Cook's women's team is still ranked second in the South. "[The men] are winning games we're not supposed to be winning," said Walsh. "The community gives us great support for both programs. I have no idea why students don't attend — they get in free. It's not a cost factor."

Walsh himself has seen student activities from three angles — as an MC basketball player, as a resident assistant, and as a coach. "I guess I'm biased in the program. When I was an RA, I always heard students complain 'There's nothing to do...' These games are exciting, fun to watch, and they get students out of the dorms. And, of course, it helps show support for the school."

As a basketball player in the '85-'86 season, Walsh remembers "The Corner," a sort-of "cheer leading squad" comprised of football players and other athletes. The students would dress up in unconventional style, sit together in one corner of the bleachers, and stir up the crowd and players.

Gone, but not forgotten—

"The Corner" often gave MC hoops the home court advantage during basketball games. Pictured is the corner at a 1986 basketball game.

According to Walsh, "The Corner" probably drew a lot of students to the games. "My first year here, I sat the bench. But it was fun watching them."

Walsh explained that because the behavior of the student-athletes involved in "The Corner" was not always in good taste and sometimes disruptive, the football coaches' office and Dr. Richard Ferrin, the president of the college at the time, worked to disband the group.

Student turn-out didn't drastically change following the fizzle of "The Corner," and Walsh was quick to refer to the high student support of two years ago. Since then, he has seen student interest "here and there."

"I don't think [students] under-

Physical plant staff calls for patience, caution

Campus students may pray for snow and ice, but Maryville College Physical Plant Director Andy McCall doesn't exactly look forward to the complications bad weather presents.

"Patience and caution — we urge people to be patient and use caution," said McCall.

When snow blankets the campus, measures are taken by priority to insure safety. First, steps are cleared of snow, sidewalks are shoveled, and then roads are made passable, according to McCall.

Unfortunately, the problems multiply and intensify with ice. The

While the campus sleeps under a blanket of snow (and maybe ice), Maryville College Business Manager Alden Stuart is out on the road surveying their conditions. Stuart, along with Academic Vice President Dean Boldon, make recommendations to the president as to whether or not the college should be closed. The president, Dr. Gibson, ultimately decides.

Before the recommendations are made, Stuart travels the local roads, talks to state policemen, calls security on campus (for knowledge of the conditions of campus roads), and listens to the local weather forecast.

Student Senate cafeteria survey draws little interest, few comments

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

About 260 students may remember receiving a food survey in their mailboxes last semester.

The survey asked questions about the effectiveness of Marriott, the food service provider which works for Maryville College. Marriott's contract is up for renewal at the end of the '93-'94 school year, and the administration and the student senate's Food Service Committee wanted student input in making the decision whether or not to extend Marriott's contract.

The students selected represented approximately half of those on a meal plan. According to Kristin Kant, sophomore senator on the Food Service Committee, response to the survey was minimal.

Overall, the committee only received 30 completed surveys. Kant emphasized that although student senate would like to include students in the decision-making process, such poor response prevents such interaction from occurring.

Opinions expressed in the surveys toward Marriott and its services range from extremely favorable to very unfavorable. This wide inconsistency makes the Food Service Committee's job more difficult, because there appears to be no clear pattern expressed in the returned surveys.

The committee placed a chart in Pearson's Dining Hall which would give students the opportunity to make comments about the food and service. Kant said that there were comments made. However, many of these were derogatory while offering no real suggestions for improvement.

The committee also implemented a hotline for comments and suggestions about Marriott. The hotline had no response. Kant expressed disappointment in the lack of interest from the students regarding this issue.

The student senate must quickly reach a conclusion about whether or not to keep Marriott as the food service provider for Maryville College. Kant said they hope to have reviewed the surveys and come to a decision regarding further action by the beginning of the spring semester.

Some of the alternatives for the current food service include a self-operating cafeteria. Under such an arrangement, the college would hire an outside cook and staff who would report directly to the college instead of to an intermediate, as is now the case. Another option would be to extend Marriott's contract while making changes in the service provided.

Senate would appreciate any comments or suggestions students would like to make, and urges anyone interested to contact a member of that governing body.

Literacy Corp teaches community illiterate

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

We hear about it almost every day. From Hooked-on-Phonics, to America's Libraries' READ campaign, to bumper stickers which jokingly state, "Illiterate? Write for help," we are constantly being sent messages urging us to be literate. Why does there seem to be so much publicity about this issue?

"Functional illiteracy" has been a problem in the United States for many years. However, most people have only recently become aware of the problem and the need to help those who are struggling to read.

The questions regarding the causes and problems of illiteracy were focal points in a new interim class called "Literacy Theory and Practice." The class was taught by Linda Clark, director of the Maryville College Student Literacy Corps program.

"A lot of these people have missed a few crucial steps in their education," said Clark of the functionally illiterate. "It's not that they can't learn."

This area of the country is no exception. According to Clark, 31 to 32 percent of the people who make up Blount County's adult population do not have a high school diploma or a GED certificate.

Members of the faculty became aware of this and wanted to start a literacy program that would involve MC students and the community by giving the students the chance to be literacy tutors.

The school was successful in securing federal grant money to initiate the program. The grant is for $24,865 and is a four-year program, depending on the Congress' decision to appropriate the money each year.

Clark said that her position as director of the program entails "a lot of coordination with literacy professionals in this area."

For the spring semester, she is teaching the classroom education and literacy theory section of the class as well as organizing sessions with the Blount County Adult-Based Education Center. These sessions include speakers (including two seventeen year-old high school dropouts) and tutoring training.

The literacy program is open to all members of the student body, and a wide range of students are already involved. While anyone is encouraged to join, Clark did say that it is better if those who join have ability, interest, and are dependable. Her interim students agreed. "It's meant for people who are serious about it," said Elaine Gibbs, MC freshman.

The spring semester class is expected to be challenging as well, although it will not be as intense in terms of time as the two sessions a day during January term. "It will be better as a semester class," said freshman Rena McCulloch. "You'll have more time."

Clark hopes to be able to focus more on writing and thinking skills, and said that as tutors, students also need to understand why they do what they do, and the universal ramifications of their decisions.

In spite of all of the adjustments that had to be made, Clark said: "Overall, I'm very pleased with the responses (of the students)." She said that she is excited about the benefits the program can bring to Maryville College and Blount County.

Eventually, a student literacy corp and a student advisory council will be formed from the students who took the course in January and are taking it this spring. These groups will provide major direction for the Maryville College Student Literacy Corps.

Clark said that the community's response has been positive, and the program is receiving much support.

Water Aerobics offered

A class in water aerobics for those who want to stay fit with the excellent benefits of swimming is being presented at Maryville College under the direction of Coach Kandis Schram.

The aqua aerobics class meets 5:30-6:30 p.m., Monday and Wednesday, and 10-11 a.m., Saturday at the College Pool in the Physical Education Building. The cost is $2.50 per lesson for the community. MC students can attend free of charge.

For additional information call Schram at 981-8290.

Scholarship deadlines fast approaching

Deadlines are fast approaching for a number of scholarships at MC. Deadlines are Feb. 1 and March 1 for over $250,000 in scholarships.

Many of the scholarships are provided by gifts over the years from alumni, foundations, and others. Applications are available from the College by calling 615-981-8092 locally, or 1-800-597-2687, or writing to the Admissions Office at Maryville College, Maryville, TN, 37801.

■ Presidential Scholarships, which provide full tuition for four years, are awarded to potential student leaders among entering freshmen. Candidates must have at least an 1100 SAT or 27 ACT composite test score and a 3.5 grade point average. The application deadline is Feb. 1, and applicants must participate in a scholarship weekend. The scholarships are renewed annually based on the student's maintaining a 3.25 cumulative grade point average at Maryville College.

■ Dean's Scholarships have requirements similar to the Presidential Scholars. They provide half tuition for four years, and are also renewable annually provided the student maintains a 3.25 grade point average. The deadline is Feb. 1.

■ The Bonner Scholarship program, recently established at the College, provides $2,870 per academic year. Annual renewal is based on maintaining a good academic standing and a recommendation by the College Chaplain. The scholarship is provided for entering freshmen, and requires that the student be actively involved in community service and demonstrate significant financial need. Recipients are required to invest ten hours weekly and 240 hours each summer in community service. The deadline to apply is March 1.

■ Maryville College Scholarships provide $2,000 per academic year. Annual renewal is based on maintaining a 2.5 cumulative grade point average. Entering freshmen must have a score of 21 on the ACT or 900 on the SAT and a grade point average of 3.00 cumulative grade point average.

Other scholarships are:

■ The Music Performance Award—open to music majors and made on the basis of individual talent demonstrated by audition. It provides $1,500 to $2,000 per academic year. Annual renewal is based upon good academic standing and recommendations from the department chairperson.

■ The Instrumental Music Ensemble Award—for non-music majors awarded on the basis of individual talent demonstrated by audition. Recipients are required to participate in a music ensemble. The scholarship provides $1,000 per academic year. Annual renewal is based on maintaining good academic standing and recommendations from the department chairperson.

■ The Choral Scholarship—provides $1,000 per academic year for freshmen who have been a member of a high school chorus for at least two years and transfers who have been a member of a college choir. An audition is required. Renewal is based on good academic standing and faculty recommendation.

■ The Theatre Scholarship—provides $1,000 per academic year for students who have participated for at least two years in high school or college theatre productions. Annual renewal based on good academic standing and faculty recommendation.

■ The Art Competition Award—provides $1,000 per academic year, awarded on the basis of individual talent demonstrated by portfolio evaluation. Annual renewal based on maintaining good academic standing and a recommendation from the Director of Church Relations. The scholarship is for freshmen and transfer students who are active members of the Presbyterian Church (USA). Recipients are required to invest about three hours each week in a ministry program. Deadline is March 1.

■ The Church Matching Scholarship—A scholarship from the student's home church may be matched by Maryville College within certain guidelines. Provides $1,000 maximum matching contribution from the College. Deadline for application is April 1.

In addition to scholarships, Maryville College has several grant programs to aid students:

■ A Maryville College Grant is offered to full-time students who demonstrate financial need. The grant is for $500 to $6,000 determined by financial need.

■ A renewable Blount County Graduate Grant of $1,000 per academic year is offered to graduates of Alcoa, Heritage, Maryville, and William Blount High Schools.

■ The dependent children of ministers, missionaries, and other full-time professional church workers are eligible for a renewable grant of $1,000 per year under the Minister's Dependent Grant program.

Other grants available include:

■ Pell Grants for students who demonstrate exceptional financial need. They must be U.S. citizens or permanent residents. Grants for full-time students during the 1993-94 ranged from $400 to $2,300.

■ Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants are available to U.S. citizens or permanent residents who demonstrate financial need. The $4,000 maximum is determined by financial need and funding by the U.S. government.

■ Tennessee Student Assistance Awards are given to Tennessee residents who can meet the financial need requirements. The program is administered by the Tennessee Student Assistance Corporation. Awards for 1993-94 ranged from $1,554 to $1,890.

■ Teacher Loan/Scholarships of $1,898 per academic year are available for entering freshmen (3.0 grade point average, 21 ACT), full and part-time students other than freshmen, and current teachers (2.5 college grade point average) who intend to teach in a Tennessee public school. The program is for Tennessee residents only, and is administered by the Tennessee Student Assistance Corporation.

PHYSICAL PLANT

storm that invaded the area last week paralyzed the campus, as well as Blount County. Problems with for steam froze, and the college had to depend on gas for heating. Because MC purchases gas under a contractual agreement of "interruptible supply," the gas company has the right to cut the supply once demand goes up, because the college is not a regular customer and uses gas only as a back-up. McCall's last alternative was to use oil, which he burned for four days. As the physical plant director since 1988, McCall has never before had to use oil for heating purposes. And, he quickly pointed out that the ordeal has "blown up" the college's energy budget.

If icy conditions and heating problems were not enough to handle, McCall had only 50 percent of his staff at work, the rest were snowed in.

In the event that electricity should go out, heat will also go out. "The boilers [in the steam plant] have to have pumps, and that takes electricity," explained McCall. The threat of no electricity is not a real concern of McCall's, because of the college's location within the city. "We're in a lucky place. Electric companies tend to take care of the metropolitan areas," he explained.

While urging students to be patient and cautious, McCall called on students to conserve when the energy supply is strained.

Whether the campus likes it or not, getting through the winter weather may, at times, prove to be a "community effort," when we all flourish or flounder—together.

Of course, "closed" never means totally closed for a college campus. According to Stuart, everything is closed except for the steam plant, security, food service, and maintenance.

Stuart said he realizes that not everyone is going to be happy with their decisions, but he doesn't have to make those decisions often.

"In the past four years I have been here, we've only had two closings including this one," he said.

players hate it when the crowd is against them. They worry about that," said Walsh.

The Boydson-Baird Gymnasium will accommodate approximately 1,500 people. Currently, the men are drawing crowds numbering 500-700 fans — the women draw less. Facilities of opposing teams tend to be smaller, but Walsh has noticed that for the most part, "they get good student turn-out."

"Every school we go to has something [to draw students out]. Emory and Henry has good student support. So does Covenant, Rhodes, Oglethorpe...,," he explained.

The coach is looking to student development and the staffs of resident halls to promote game attendance. He said that he would like to see a revival of something like "The Corner," but also sees possibilities in resident hall competitions. Dr. Bob Ramger has suggested that appearances by a pep band may bolster school support.

"This is not a complaint. We just want students to get involved," Walsh added.

Two school rivals — Emory and Henry and Centre — will be played Feb. 6 and Feb. 22, respectively. Both are home games. Tip-off against E & H is set for 3 p.m.; Centre will be played at 7:30 p.m.

Letter to the Editor . . .

Dear Editor,

Recently I experienced something that made me begin to worry in earnest about the state of humanity. Oddly enough, I experienced this event in the MC dining hall of all places. The event happened as follows:

It was Sunday bunch and seeing as how the biscuits were hard as bricks, I went skipping up to the cereal ("skipping" was just a figure of speech!) Anyway, I was busy making the oh-so serious decision of what cereal to get when I happened to notice a rather loud conversation occurring at the milk machine. One guy was inquiring of another whether or not he was planning on attending the girl's basketball game scheduled for later that afternoon. When Guy #2 responded that he would definitely be there to support the team, Guy #1 piped up — and I quote — "Oh yeah, that's right. I forgot your bitch was on the team!" Guy #2 then responded that it was not a good idea to call his girlfriend that to her face. (I guess behind her back was alright ???)

Now, just to clarify things for those of you who many not see what I'm so worried about: I have never heard a male refer to the opposite sex as "bitches" while someone of the female persuasion was only one foot away. I would hope and pray that males on this campus and in the world at large do not refer to women as "bitches" at ANYTIME!! I know that my friends and I do not sit around and refer to each other's boyfriends as "dicks"! This incident made me question what type of person would casually refer to women in such a manner. Seeing as how I'm not a big feminist type (I don't scream at men who hold open doors for me and I even allow men to foot the bill once in awhile), I also questioned why I was mad. My answer is quite simple — I expect a little respect, that's all. I would think that the girlfriend being referred to would definitely not appreciate the comment. Neither would any other female! I can't believe that in such a supposedly "modern" time that someone would actually be so rude as to use that language in public. Now I find myself wondering whether this person referred to as Guy #1 picked up this wonderfully expressive language from his obviously pious background (HA!), or from his very gentleman-ly friends here (double HA!). What is happening in society ??? I guess that question has a rather simple answer, too: nothing worthwhile.

Sorry if this letter has dampened some feelings, but I simply had to get it off my chest. I am not "bashing" all men, only the one who made the statement. And I am not trying to start some "male vs. female" thing. I only wanted to make people aware that there are still some very obnoxious, uncouth sexists out there, and some even inhabit the MC campus.

Sincerely,
Chris Rapp
Senior

Once again we're back at good old M.C.!! After a holiday season of good tidings and cheer, and the ringing of the New Year, we also have to deal with the entertainment of relatives that you haven't seen since the last year at this time. I escaped the horrors of my relatives telling me how much I'd grown and that I'm not eating enough by going to the movies. I know I've seen almost every holiday movie that came out and believe me many are not worth it.

Let's begin with the sequels of the season:

WAYNE'S WORLD 2

What can I say? This was not the best movie ever made, in fact it wasn't even funny. Yes it had it's moments, but I expected a lot more from this that I received. The plot is simple: A year has passed and Wayne and Garth are at crossroads in their lives. Wayne decides to host a concert called "Waynestock," and hopes to book some major groups. Cassandra is being courted by a big record producer (can we say "too much of the first movie showing up in the second!"). The movie does have it's moments especially when Wayne meets Cassandra's father and they duel it out KUNG FU MOVIE style. I say don't waste your money on this one. This movie receives the first DOLLAR MOVIE rating which means don't waste any real bucks on this one.

SISTER ACT 2

I actually enjoyed this movie, especially the singing. For those of you who enjoy a good time, and don't expect Oscar performances, go and see this movie. Whoopi Goldberg returns as Delores the Las Vegas singer and (how amazing!) all the sisters from the previous movie are place in the same school that's in danger of closing unless the school shows some sort of merit. Delores is recruited to teach the music class and the kids form a choir. Of course, this is very unbelievable, but it's fun. This movie receives the FOOTHILLS CINEMA BEFORE 6. It's not worth over 5 dollars, but it's good enough to waste 3 bucks on.

TOMBSTONE

Carnage, carnage, and more carnage! For all you action movie fans this western was "the bomb" (for those who don't speak slang that means it was great!). I was expecting some sappy documentary on the life of Wyatt Earp and his brothers, instead we get "Unforgiven" with a group of men instead of just a lone rider. I can't count how many people died in this movie, but the action was terrific.

If you're not into action, see this movie for the comedy. Val Kilmer's portrayal of Doc Holiday will have you rolling in the aisle. This movie receives the CARNAGE rating, go see it!!

THE PELICAN BRIEF

If you're into storyline and plot development then this movie's for you. The movie was very slow moving at first, but the pace does quicken and the action is very suspenseful. Julia Roberts plays a law student that comes up with a theory as to why two supreme court justices have been murdered. The brief floats around Washington and everyone that reads is ends up dead. Denzel Washington is a reporter that is recruited to help Roberts solve the mystery of all the deaths and keep her alive. The suspense factor on this one was incredible. I give it the FULL PRICE rating.

MRS. DOUBTFIRE

If anyone ever said that Robin

Williams is not one of the funniest men alive shoot them! This was the movie to end all movies. I have yet to laugh like this at anything. Robin Williams plays an out of work actor who decides to portray a nanny in order to spend more time with his kids. Sally Fields plays the mother of the kids and the fed up wife of Williams. The transformation of Williams into the old lady was one of the best scenes in cinema. This movie also marked the return of Pierce Brosnan from T. V. 's "Remington Steele" (I still think he would have made a great James Bond!), he plays the new love interest of Fields. This movie was really good because of it's realistic depiction of divorce and the bitterness shown between the parents. It does have a happy ending, but the one that everyone expects. This movie receives the FULL PRICE rating.

UNTIL NEXT TIME, THE CONCESSION STAND IS CLOSED!!!!!!

Bartlett began brick by brick by students

Student determination made Bartlett a reality

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

Bartlett Hall has one of the most colorful histories of all of the campus buildings. Finished on Feb. 4, 1898, Bartlett originally served as a combination YMCA building and gymnasium.

The construction of Bartlett is well-known. Kin Takahashi, one of the first Japanese students at MC, joined with a group of students and faculty to campaign for the construction of Bartlett Hall. Takahashi was perhaps the most dedicated to the erection of the YMCA building. He and others joined together in campus meetings and proposed the idea for Bartlett on March 23, 1894.

Takahashi led a group of students to use money donations to run kilns for brick-making. Over 300,000 bricks were created by students.

Construction began on May 28, 1895 and continued for three years.

During this time, Takahashi graduated and went on to campaign after his graduation for more funds to finish the building.

Five foot two inch Takahashi is not only well-known for his efforts in raising Bartlett, but also for his contribution to MC sports by helping to start the football team and for being the first captain and for playing quarterback for the team.

Bartlett originally had two stories, with a third added shortly thereafter.

The building served as the gymnasium for MC athletics until the construction of the new physical education building and Boydsen Baird Gymnasium. The Alumni gym's regulation-size floor made Bartlett's gym floor obsolete in 1921.

Today's athletic complex took MC sports out of Bartlett in the 1970s and the building was converted to house the maintenance and security departments.

The Print Shop was moved from the CCM to the bottom floor of Bartlett. The Graphics office is also located on the bottom floor.

Bartlett viewed from behind Fayerweather Hall. Used as the YMCA building and gymnasium, Bartlett was a dream come true for many who had wanted a sports building in the late 1800s. The building next to Bartlett housed the swimming pool, another dream Takahashi had strived for, albeit it came 20 years after Bartlett was completed.

Fayerweather changes function over the years

Home of Student Development once the science building

96 year-old Fayerweather Hall was the first fully equipped science building for Maryville College.

Built at a cost of $12,000, Fayerweather was erected out of funds donated by Daniel B. Fayerweather in his will. Fayerweather donated over $2 million to 14 colleges and universities in the country, including Yale, Cornell, Dartmouth, Princeton, and Harvard. His will was executed on October 2, 1880.

The plans were developed by Baumann Bros., Knoxville architects. David Jones was awarded the contract for the construction of Fayerweather at an expected cost of $9,334.

Fayerweather Hall originally had two floors; a third was added for the Home Economics Department created in 1913. The roof was jacked up and the wall was bricked in.

Fayerweather served as science building until 1968, when Sutton Science Center was opened. The post-office and bookstore moved out of the Lamar Memorial Library (CCM) and into Fayerweather. The office of student affairs and the student center was opened along with these offices on the first floor.

Counseling services, a day-student lounge, and a painting studio were opened on the second floor. The painting studio was later removed and the rooms became the offices of the Chilhowean and the Highland Echo.

The third floor became the home of the Appalachian Ballet Company. It remained so until 1991, when the third floor was judged in poor condition and condemned.

Fayerweather was renovated in the 1985-86 school year. The revamped student center was named in honor of the woman directing the renovation, Sharon Crane. The student center was dubbed "Isaac's."

Isaac's was a snack bar until the fall of 1993. The bookstore gained control of Isaac's from Marriott and transformed the space into a convenience store/student lounge.

Current plans are being made to move the offices of Student Development upstairs to the second floor and renovate the first floor into a student center complete with games and meeting rooms for different clubs on campus.

The Chilhowean and Highland Echo offices will be moved to a different section on the second floor.

The renovation is scheduled for later this year. There are currently no plans for any renovation of the third floor.

Lady Scots' and Scots' maintain winning records

by Elizabeth Waggoner
Staff Writer

Basketball season at Maryville College is underway with a winning women's team and men's team.

The Lady Scots' record for the season is 10-3 with their latest win against Roanoke College, final score 92 to 67. Honey Brown contributed 18 points of which 15 were three-pointers.

The Lady Scots also hosted a tournament earlier this month, The Lady Scot Invitational. The teams that competed were Beloit College, Marymount University, Ferrum College, and Maryville College.

MC played Ferrum in the first round and won 93 to 59. Jamie Parrott scored an impressive 26 points.

Maryville played Marymount in the Championship game and was able to come from behind to win 92 to 86. After scoring 29 points it was no surprise that Parrott was awarded

Most Valuable Player for the tournament.

The Scots are also faring well this season with an eight to five record thus far. The Scots are strong at home, having won their last two home games against King College and Ferrum College. Wayne Norman had a fantastic game against Ferrum, being the high-scorer contributing 19 points.

The men's next home game is Feb. 6 at 3 p.m. against Emory and Henry College.

The next home game for the Lady Scots is on January 29 at p.m. against Sue Benneu College on Jan. 28 at 7 p.m.

Mountain Challenge improves program inside and out

Climbing wall undergoing improvements, additions

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

The Maryville College climbing wall has been expanded and is undergoing improvements in its belay system. The wall has "grown" 20 feet in length and 16 feet in height.

Originally built in 1991, the wall has attracted many students and climbers from the communities of Maryville, Knoxville, and cities in the surrounding area.

The Eastern Tennessee Climbing Club, disbanded in 1993 and gave its climbing wall to the Maryville College Mountain Challenge Program. The new additions include two slightly angled overhangs and one major overhang. The new addition has already been installed and handholds will be bolted in later this year.

New handholds have also been acquired which enhance the climbing options available on the wall.

The belay system, an arrangement of heavy-duty wire loops which hold climbing ropes when someone is climbing, is being improved to make the system more efficient and less cumbersome. On the most far-reaching overhang, for instance, the belay system tends to get in the way once the climber has reached the top. Some climbers have accidentally scratched their faces on the old system. Cheri Torres, director of Mountain Challenge staff, said the changes will make the wall "safer and simpler."

The Maryville College Mountain Challenge climbing wall is one of the largest in the area. The University of Tennessee also has a large climbing gym.

Located in the Alumni Gym, the climbing wall provides opportunities for regular climbers to keep themselves in climbing shape during inclement weather. It receives heavy use in the cold months of the fall, winter and spring seasons. The wall also provides a ready opportunity for beginning climbers to learn the ropes with the assistance and supervision of Mountain Challenge staff.

The biggest advantage the climbing wall affords is convenience. It is currently open on Tuesday and Thursday nights from 6-8 p.m.

Torres emphasized that in order to belay anyone on the wall, climbers must have had ground-belay instruction — either by

World-class climber shares experience

World-class climber Tom Hargis visited the Maryville College campus Jan. 16-17 to instruct the Mountain Challenge staff on mountain climbing and rock climbing skills.

Hargis leads expeditions to the mountains of the world. His past exploits include the mountains of the United States, Russia, Ecuador, Bolivia, Canada and Pakistan, the home of the famed Himalayas. Hargis has scaled Gabelsham IV and will be climbing G2 in the Himalayas this year — the ultimate test of mountain climbing. G2 is one of the highest mountain peaks in the world, and one of the most difficult to climb.

Hargis instructed the staff on lead-climbing techniques. Lead-climbing is rock climbing that usually involves multiple climbers and very high climbs. Hargis went over the basics of using "friends"—climbing tools hooked into a rock to keep the climber from falling great distances.

He demonstrated climbing techniques on the Maryville College climbing wall and went over proper stretching exercises for training.

Hargis shared his experiences with the staff and gave new insights into climbing and mountaineering.

Hargis is a Vietnam veteran and has worked a number of different jobs, his most recent being a mountain guide in the Pacific Northwest in the late '80's.

A record of Hargis' Gabelsham IV expedition was published in "Mixed Emotions: Mountaineering Writings of Greg Child."

completing ground-belay school with Mountain Challenge or by experience that must be demonstrated to Mountain Challenge staff.

"Come on over and climb," encouraged Torres.

Cost for members of the community is $3 per session. MC students can use the facility at no cost.

Hey kids. How the heck is it going?

Well, it's 1994. Energy continues to express itself as light and matter, subatomic particles continue to whirl around in chaotic and unpredictable patterns, the universe continues to expand and contract, and little human animals scurrying around on the surface of a chunk of rock flying through space continue to consider themselves and their inventions oh so significant. Just another year. Did you make any New Years resolutions? I resolved to do more of the same, only differently.

For some reason, kids, I am in a foul mood. Maybe it's the wet, dreary, overcast weather that just won't quit. Maybe it's the numbing boredom that I suffered during January term. Maybe it's the prospect of enduring my last semester in Maryville without going nutty and taking an uzi into McDonald's. Maybe I just hate cops. Yep. I think that's it.

Let me tell you kids a story. It's a true story, a story about Maryville College and the men we pay to protect it.

Once upon a time, the surface of our campus was covered in ice, which naturally made things pretty slippery. One night, a group of students were returning home from a friend's apartment to Carnegie, where they all lived. It was extremely late—almost five o'clock in the morning. The student that was driving was completely sober, although a little giddy from being so tired. While driving behind Wilson Chapel towards the back parking lot of Carnegie, his car began to slide a little on the ice. With the encouragement of his friends (who were not so sober), the driver began to swerve back and forth a little to slide around the parking lot. The sliding lasted about thirty seconds, and the driver was never out of control. Laughing, the group parked beside Carnegie and began to walk towards the door.

Suddenly, our cute little blue security truck whipped into the parking lot behind them with his cute little blue lights 'flashin' and his cute little horn 'honkin'. His intention was obviously to give them some grief about their driving. The students, naturally, ignored the display and walked on into their dorm to go to bed. Apparently, this infuriated Mr. MC Security Guy.

Then, an unfortunate coincidence took place. A few minutes later, another student (who was not among the students in the swerving car) walked out of the dorm and down to his roommate's car to get his roommate's cigarettes. He was having trouble sleeping, and he needed a cigarette to calm his nerves. The student had had a few drinks earlier in the night, but had pretty much sobered up and only wanted to smoke a cigarette and go to sleep. But it was not to be.

Our faithful security guy had driven his cute little truck around to the other side of the dorm and waited there, thinking for some reason that the students in the swerving car would return for another session of ice-sliding. Using his years of rent-a-cop training and his lightning-quick reflexes, he ran around the building and apprehended the groggy, cigarette-craving student, who was naturally bewildered. Security guy demanded to know who had been driving the swerving car, for the driver was obviously a menace to society and must be apprehended at any cost. The groggy student answered that he didn't know, wondering what the hell was going on. Security guy got belligerent, repeatedly grabbing the student's arm and getting in the student's face. He demanded to know if the student had been drinking. The student answered truthfully that he had been drinking earlier and just wanted to go to bed. The belligerent security guy, still using his years of rent-a-cop training, continued to grill the

by Alene Day

Updates...

My wonderful and fabulous Dad brought me down my new car last week — just in time for me to watch it frozen in a cocoon of ice for three days. The Smear is truly history now. Somehow as fond as I was of that car, its attributes (few as they were) faded fast when I got a new set of wheels to scoot around in (psst...it even has a tape player!! I am giddy with delight!). Watch out world — I AM MOBILE!!!

My fourth and final interim here at Maryville just ended, and I thought that I might reflect upon my four brief (yet schizophrenic) interim experiences with you, my peers. Perhaps you will share some of my joys. Perhaps you will share some of my sorrows. But I pray you do NOT experience any of my periodic agonies.

Freshman Year. Interim: Creating Creativity. Instructor: Dr. Robert Bonham. In Class Highlight: Drumming with wild abandon. In Class Drawback: Dr. Bonham's voice is so soft that it's like a lullaby. Zzzzzz... Extra Curricular Highlight: Turning 21 on the last day of class. Extra Curricular Drawback: I was a 21 year-old freshman while all of my friends were 18, AND I lived in Davis. Additional Comments: I got to use most of the 9,763 (approximately) xeroxed readings as sources for my I.S., but then I changed my topic so...I guess I can say that I can look at just about anything and see a drum in it... i.e. a bucket full of can tabs; or my head; or even better, a buddy's head.

Sophomore Year. Interim: Universal Traveler. Instructors: 1992 Mountain Challenge Staff. In Class Highlights: 1. Hiking forty miles of the Appalachian Trail in January. 2. The cheesburger at the gas station after six days of tuna and bagels (I have yet to eat another bagel). 3. Getting to see all those guys bundled up in harnesses and hanging by ropes. In Class Drawbacks: 1. Hiking forty miles of the Appalachian Trail in January. 2. ME in a harness hanging by a rope! (Those things hide no secrets. As I mentioned above, men... (you know what I am talking about.) But women, you know that if you've got any sort of rear end (and I've got one and then some...), it doesn't even look like you have a harness on at all — just an invisible rubber band strapped under your butt.) Attractive. 3. Sleeping in a tent with five guys after a meal consisting of refried beans, cheese, and of course...bagels. The only good thing about this was that we no longer had to smell our socks. Extra Curricular Highlight: The sheer joy of porcelain as opposed to a tree. Extra Curricular Drawback: Apparently missing the party of the year while on expedition (yeah folks, WAY back in 1992, Maryville actually had parties...whoever thought that those would be the good old days?!). Additional Comments: This interim is not for the faint of hearts, but the further away it gets, the better the memories become. You begin to forget all the misery (well, not all of it), and you remember the humor...i.e. Brian Lewis drooling all over someone's sleeping bag while being "fingered" (this is not as obscene as it sounds), or the night that I was so delirious with cold, hunger, and fatigue that I sat there for five minutes calling to "Al" and trying to get his attention, until finally someone reminded me that I was Al and he was Ed. Or the idea of anyone on that trip spooning with anyone else. What a trip!

Junior Year. Interim: Eurythmics. Instructor: Sally Shoen. In Class Highlight: Watching certain football players and basketball players flit around Wilson Chapel clapping their hands and stomping their feet. Some of them were actually quite good. Some of them were not. But all of them were entertaining. In Class Drawbacks: 1. Everyone being able to see my bare feet. 2. Seeing everyone else's bare feet. 3. Bare feet on a cold wooden floor on cold January mornings. Extra Curricular Highlights: I know that I went to The Underground every night that it was open, but I don't remember much else, so it must have been good. Extra Curricular Drawbacks: Muttering "Anapest, anapest, dactylic, anapest" everywhere I walked. Additional Comments: This class is actually not as easy as it sounds. Okay, okay... there are no books and no homework, but try rubbing your stomach with one hand and patting your head with the other all in time to Mozart and you will get a feel for what Eurythmics is like. Personally, I sucked at it.

Senior Year. Interim: East Asian Studies. Instructor: Dr. Wally Lewis. In Class Highlights: Taking notes on all that Wally says...ALL. Did you know that Wally wants to be cremated and that his father didn't like neckties? In Class Drawbacks: 1. The colossal amount of paper that this endeavor takes. 2. Having to memorize the entire history of Japan in one week. 3. Having to memorize the entire history of China the next. Extra-Curricular Highlights: 1. I got a prank call just when I thought that once you moved off campus you were forgotten. (No, this is not an open invitation to all you freaks out there to call me up.) 2. We got two days of class canceled due to the glacier that moved over Maryville (that's like two weeks on interim scale!). 3. I actually had some visitors to my apartment...and I didn't even have to pay them! 4. Of course, I got a car. Extra Curricular Drawbacks: 1. I broke my toe in a rather ugly encounter with a doorjamb. 2. Someone got arrested on campus for doing something that at least 50% of the campus was doing the same night (or any night for that matter). 3. My best friend wasn't here for our last interim of our college career — she was off in Ohio doing something GOOD for her major and herself. What a wench! Additional Comments: None.

So there you have it, "Four Interim's in the Life of...Alene Day." There are actually a lot of interims that I would still like to take, but I don't think I'll stick around for any more. I always wanted to take Human Sexuality, not only for the minimal cost, but also for the simple fact that upon arrival everyday, everyone gets a massage. Now there's an interim. Then there's the Virgin Islands interim...getting credit for swimming around the Caribbean looking at psychedelic little fishies and drinking good cheap rum underneath a palm tree — rough! THEN, there's the Model U.N. interim...NOT!! I didn't even eat in the dining hall and those kids still pissed me off. All those young boys running around in neckties make me feel like I'm trapped on the set of "Head of the Class" (I can't imagine how uncomfortable Wally Lewis' dad would have been!). Well, I've been sitting here for about 30 minutes trying to decide how to conclude this column, and all that I have come up with was to make up what would be my dream interim...but I figured that none of you would want to hear about "Three Weeks With Eddie Vedder and a lot of Finger Paint", so I'm just going to end this with a few of my favorite Wally Lewis quotes, and go home to eat some dinner. Talk to you next month...see ya'!

"I have an all-plaid outfit that I like to wear to comedy occasions."

"I don't know about you, but gods and spirits don't appear to me everyday...I stand around waiting, but nobody shows up!"

"I can hurt myself with tools."

P.S. Dr. Lewis, if you're reading this, I hope that you already gave me my grade...if you haven't, I really did enjoy your class.

*From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . .Editorial

Ah, Christmas holidays! Like an alarm clock, the usual christmas commercial blowout hit, with fa la la and ho ho ho! For me, like everyone else at MC, classes were over, thank God, and I could relax until January (February for some). As soon as I got to Chattanooga, I saw what was playing at the dollar movies and called up old friends and relatives to come along.

My 13-year-old cousin and I went to see Jurassic Park in a moderately crowded theater. Then the feeling suddenly hit: someone, anyone might just pull out their gun and start blowing us all away.

Shortly before we all left for home for Christmas break, some of us heard about the angry man which decided to work out his frustrations through a Ruger 9mm semiautomatic into commuters he had never met before. On December 21 in Chattanooga, a man took a large cache of high-powered rifles and explosives and took his position in his own handmade concrete bunker in the motor store he worked at. The standoff lasted six hours and a half-mile of a major Chattanooga artery was closed off. The man was ready to fire and threatened retaliation if any action was taken against him. Fortunately, negotiators calmed him down and he gave up and no one was hurt. He said he did it to protest the Brady Bill, a recent gun control bill passing through Congress which will put a waiting period on handguns being bought in the United States.

A December 23 article in a Chattanooga daily reported the alarming rise in the nation of the purchase of guns of all kinds as a result of the recent shooting sprees and the passing of the Brady bill. People were rushing to buy semiautomatic rifles for protection. Visions of Lebanon danced in my head. I wondered how many of these purchasers knew what they were taking the responsibility to yield. Pure reason makes me ask why semiautomatics are legal or necessary in the first place.

I watched those wonderful Christmas movies, Die Hard, Die Hard 2, and Lethal Weapon. Guns were the way to your goals. I wonder how many of those purchasers of guns saw themselves as a sort of Bruce Willis, Arnold Schwarzenegger, or Mel Gibson. Don't they know its just make-believe? These guys would never actually handle guns that well. Does it look that easy? I watch many movies like everyone else and I noticed a preponderance of guns. The guns seem more important than anything else. In these movies I see the bad guy and the good guy fighting. The one wielding his gun loses it; it slides to a distance. Instead of ending the fight right there with skill and strength, everyone dashes for the gun.

When I traveled to Japan last year, I was so relieved that handguns were outlawed. People used guns there for one reason: hunting. Japan has one of the lowest murder rates in the world, yet it is one of the most developed countries in the world. It was so strange to realize no one in all probability would shoot you to death.

But I was shot, shot by bullets of a different kind. I often traveled by myself by commuter train, the main mode of transportation in Japan. I was a minority and looked very different. Everyone knew I was an American, which for the older folks translated into violent, harmful foreigner who might kill you. Some people's eyes shot glances at me; some wouldn't even sit next to me. I don't blame them. The stereotype of the violent, aggressive American wielding his gun is preminent in Japan. American movies, especially the violent ones, are the most popular films, videos, and television movies in the nation. I was regarded with automatic suspicion, and it hurt. Was this how most of the world saw us?

I'm not speaking for any political motive. I'm not speaking for gun control. I'm speaking for responsibility. Every time a person, or even a child, shoots someone because they get angry, I realize we aren't so high up the evolutionary ladder. We are more savage than most animals; they kill out of necessity if at all.

I'm speaking for my own safety, the safety of my family. I expect to be a father in the next five years or so, and I don't want my child shot because his/her angry classmate had a bad day. When I sat in that theater last Christmas break, I realized that the worry that there was someone with a gun at my head was not temporary. I realized that one of the most dangerous places in America was in social gatherings like this. It scared me to death.

I'm not being pessimistic, everyone who knows me can testify to that; I'm being realistic. I will be leaving the country in August for my job in Japan. I can't help feeling it will prolong my life as soon as I get off the ground.

student about who had been driving the swerving car. The student, no longer so groggy, began to get a little irritated.

The student had propped the door open with his pocket knife, since he didn't have his late key with him. Telling security guy that he was going to bed, he reached for the door. Security guy, well-trained defender of the public that he is, kicked the knife out of the door and slammed it shut, almost severing the now-furious student's fingers. The student said that he would go to the outside phone and call his roommate to come and let him in, and the roommate would explain the situation to security guy. Then, he began walking around to the other side of the dorm.

Mr. Security Guy, sensing danger, quickly called the Maryville city police force, who arrived in white, unmarked trucks within seconds. The Maryville city policemen sprinted around the dorm and apprehended the increasingly-amazed student, also demanding to know who was driving the car. Not surprisingly, the student still didn't know. The Maryville policemen told him that, alright, he was going to jail. They told the now-completely-baffled student that if he had only cooperated with them that he would be in bed right now. Without reading him his rights, they put handcuffs on him and took him to the drunk tank in the Maryville city jail, where he sat on a cold concrete floor for five hours (at one point, while the student was chanting and meditating, having given up on going to sleep, a Maryville police officer charged into the cell holding a bottle of mace and threatened to use it on the student if he didn't shut up). Although he had never been offered the luxury of a breathalyzer test to determine whether he was actually intoxicated, he was charged with public intoxication and had to pay $85 to get out of jail.

This pisses me off. I mean really, really pisses me off. Taking someone to jail for not giving information? Isn't that illegal in the United States? Charging him with public intoxication when he is standing three feet from where he lives and the stupid security guy won't let him in? He could have been in bed in thirty seconds... what possible threat was he to anyone? I mean, this poor student wasn't even involved in the car swerving (although that would not justify the Orwellian tactics used against him). Why did that dumbass security jerk feel the need to call the Maryville police? Did he really feel that a car sliding around on the ice was worth these ridiculous Gestapo tactics? Are we students now supposed to stay inside at night, fearful that some overzealous security jackass is going to have us arrested if we happen to wander outside?

Let me be blunt about Mr. Security Guy: I would like that bastard to lose his job. I don't know his name, but he knows who he is. This kind of stuff is unforgivable.

We pay these security officers to drive around in their cute little blue truck and protect us. When was the last time you heard about security apprehending some rapist or stopping an assault? I mean, every time the students go home for a break somebody has a bunch of stuff stolen from their room. It's gotten to the point where the R.D.'s simply tell the students to take their valuables home because the college can't protect them. Where is security when our rooms are being looted?

I feel about campus security the same way I feel about police in general. Instead of protecting us, I feel like they are hunting us. They are supposed to be here to keep us from getting hurt, not to see how many of us they can bust. Like many of my friends, I feel tense and threatened every time I see a police car. Not one single officer of the law has ever helped me in any way, but plenty of them have given me sh*t for doing things that don't hurt anyone. I've had campus security tell me that I'm not allowed in the college woods or onto Lloyd beach after dark. I've gotten a ticket for "irregular parking" when I parked straight in a crooked parking spot (even though I was clearly between the lines). And now security is getting my friends arrested for public drunkenness after preventing them from getting out of public (if you could call a dorm parking lot at a private college "public") simply because he is pissed that a bunch of students ignored him. What the hell? Leave us alone, for Chrissake!

I don't mean to imply that all of our security officers act this way. Some of them treat students like human beings and friends; they try to help them, not apprehend them (particularly the female officer). However, there are also those who strike me as tight-ass, power-hungry, pompous blow-hards that are intoxicated with the authority they have been given and use that authority to compensate for the insecurity and powerlessness they feel in other areas of their life. To this select minority, I would like to say this: "Listen, brother, you're not Rambo. This isn't Lethal Weapon. Nobody is scared of you. Despite your snappy blue uniform and your snappy blue truck with real honest-to-God police lights on top, all you are is security at a tiny little liberal arts college in the backwoods of the bible belt. Find something to occupy your time other than hounding the students you are supposed to be caring for."

To the Maryville police force: "Congratulations. You apprehended a tired college student who was outside trying to find a cigarette so he could go back to bed. Another menace to society neutralized by our men in blue. Get a life, you assholes. Ice-T was right."

During registration, we were asked to sign the new student covenant, pledging to treat one another with respect and dignity. Maybe we should have asked security to sign it too.

Peace, everyone... and watch your backs.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

Sorry, love is too bitter a subject for me to discuss.

Being a senior, I've discovered the symptoms of senioritis, a realization that I'm going to be out of here in around three months.

A couple of weeks ago as I was walking to Anderson, I looked up and it seemed as if I hadn't looked at the building in a long time. My nose had been in my books for the last five years; I had casually gone in and out of the building on the average of seven times a day for the last five years. Suddenly I had a new perspective of being at MC.

I looked around the grounds as if I hadn't been on campus for a long time. Everyday objects suddenly had novelty. I wouldn't see these things much longer.

A friend and staff member in Fayerweather said to me regarding graduation, "it all goes by so fast. You'll feel this way," she told me. I disagree with her, but I see her point. To our young eyes five years is a lifetime in itself. So many memories are here, so many good ones, and some bad ones. This is the place where we have finished, or at least attempted to finish, our transition into adulthood. You never forget a place like that.

After twenty, thirty, forty years, though, maybe Maryville will feel like a blink in life's eye.

Another pal o' mine had different thoughts on leaving, "I can't imagine having a totally different life! Everything will be different." I thought about what she said. The finality of it all is humbling. There are teachers I will never have the chance to learn from; these courses are the last ones I will ever take here; my address will change, no more MCP.O. Box; no longer will I see the faces on campus and in the offices that I'm accustomed to everyday; the fact that it will all be over in less than three months—suddenly graduation, the ultimate goal I've been striving for, fills me with a sense of sadness.

If the senior class seems rather somber or desperate, now you know why.

All of you graduating seniors out there, LOOK around at the campus. Soak it in. You all are on your way out. Take pictures of those special places. Spend extra time with your pals. A new beginning is fast approaching.

Look back and look ahead. Think of the first shock you got as a naive freshman. Think of how MC will look when you come by as an alumni on the 25th anniversary of your class in 2019.

This is your last chance to catch the essence of being a Maryville College student. You're headed out the door; this is your last chance to do anything you haven't done but wanted to do as a student. LOOK.

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

Happy Valentine's Day to all you lovers out there and all you lover-wannabes.

My gift to you this year is this little ditty...if any of you ever felt like you've put your foot in your mouth because of the one you adore, this might make you feel a little bit better...

Here's the true story of a stupid columnist who was really, really hung up on this guy. She thought he was the cat's meow. I mean as far as she was concerned, he hung the moon. Well, one afternoon this man was leaving this columnist's apartment I mean as far as she was concerned, he hung the moon. Well, and as she watched him walk away, he turned around to say something to her (of which she heard not a word — but I'll discuss that later), and when he did, he was drenched in that wonderful late afternoon golden sunlight, and she was overwhelmed by his magnificence. His hair became luminescent, and his eyes appeared even more piercing and heart-melting than before. (Hey, I could write for "Harlequin" romance novels, couldn't I?). As the woman in the doorway looked at the vision before her she thought: "God Alene, he is sooooo gorgeous. Why is he even talking to you ?!?" She parted her lips to do the natural thing — to tell him how absolutely attractive he was, but as she did, some evil spirit possessed her brain and made her sputter the unforgettable words: "Your hair's a mess."

YOUR HAIR'S A MESS?? WHAT'S UP WITH THAT?! Jeez — his hair looked great, I mean, how bad can a guy's hair look anyway?

Fools for love... that is the topic that I have chosen to discuss during this season of hearts, flowers, and chocolates (by the way, thanks Dad for the card — it's good to know I have a Valentine somewhere out there).

I can't believe that there is anybody out there who has never done anything really stupid in the name of adoration, infatuation, or anticipated stimulation.

Since this particular column has been my own personal hell for about two weeks now, I have asked a lot of people what has been the stupidest thing they have ever done in the name of love, like, or lust. Here are a few of the responses: Laughing at his/her jokes that really weren't funny, sleeping with him/her, staying in a relationship long after the flame is out, the usual stalking/following him/her around like a wounded little puppy dog, attributing qualities to that person that do not actually exist, preparing a gourmet picnic for someone and then not getting anything in return (sometimes selfishness is a hard pill to swallow), giving someone a book of original poetry when the individual wasn't even involved in a relationship (that is called blind love), having your hair cut like Tom Cruise's, and not being able to say "no" to anything that person asked of you.

Although I am tending to use the word "love" in this column, most to what I am referring happens before you hit that point. Love — true love — is such a rare, mysterious, and elusive event that I can't even begin to decipher my approach to it. As Dave pointed out, (and I tend to agree with most of what he said), men and women speak two different languages — Lord knows that we sure as hell don't understand each other and could often use an interpreter! — and it is a miracle within itself that two people manage to fall in love at all. I guess if it was easy it wouldn't be so wonderful and desirable, now would it? What I am talking about is that crazy state of limbo that we call "like." A silly little word that is overused, often abused, and has an overwhelming role in our society (i.e. Do you like him, or do you like him?... Well, I think I like him.... Was it a friend kiss, or was it a like kiss?... I like pizza.... Do you think he likes me?... What do you mean like?...).

What the heck is up with these four little overwrought letters?!?! I'd be willing to lay down $20 right here and now and say that the majority of my male readers (I hope that there are at least a few out there!) have NO clue as to what I am talking about here. I guess this "like" business is a female phenomenon.

I believe that for men it is different. (Let me be safe here and say that I could be wrong and that I am making broad generalizations.) I think that once a guy "likes" a girl he no longer talks about it with his friends, as opposed to the "lust" stages when it is openly discussed amongst friends — empathetically shared between buddies. When it's "love," the man is usually so far down the road that he's the last to know he's in love and all of his friends have already accepted the fact that he's in deep.

But "like" is some sort of unsettling shaky middle ground. When we are in "like," we tell ourselves that we should treat this person just like we would anyone else — like one of our pals — so that they don't catch on to us right away and think we're overzealous. But in this vain attempt to treat this person just like everyone else, we only further broaden the gap that distinguishes that person from being "just a friend." No matter how much our logical side tries to prevent it, our emotional side is admitting that this person is not just a friend — this is someone whose hand you want to hold, whose lips you want to kiss, and whose thoughts you want to share. Consequently, for some reason, this unexplainable event causes a lot of us to go into idiot shock. The beliked one is talking to us but we don't seem to hear a word they are saying. We are simply watching their lips move, and nodding our heads trying to appear calm and interested. Meanwhile, the neurons in our brains are spraying out in all directions like a spastic garden sprinkler. "Do I look interested?... Do I have a booger hanging out of my nose?... I like his laugh... He's a lot smarter than me... I'm a lot smarter than he is... I wonder what it would be like to kiss his ear... WOW! This is great!... Jeez, I really have to pee right now, but I hate to leave now, he might be gone when I get back.... His breath stinks — should I say anything about it?" Etc...etc...etc...you know what I mean.

Behaviorally, suddenly things become life threatening that had never before even been considered. For instance, a woman will, out of the blue, start shaving her legs not only on a regular basis, but an inch higher everyday. (As if the beliked man is going to notice that her legs are silky smooth as opposed to retaining an inch and a quarter of winter stubble.) Maybe she sees him once a day, and that is when he is much more concerned with which kind of hot pocket to choose rather than the state of her legs.

Now not one of you women, no matter how virtuous you are, and no matter what your intentions may be, can deny this one: Upon the initial tinges of smitten-ness, the granny panties are a no-no. Bad underwear at this point is not an option, whether or not the enamored one is at all likely to see them.

Men may suddenly decide that their socks ought to match, or they begin to wonder if that lonely condom in their wallet has expired yet, or all at once cologne and showering become a desirable option!

This may all sound a bit superficial, but admittedly, no matter how seriously our thoughts and emotions run around the topic of the delicate interactions between men and women, we all have our moments when we are just plain dorks about it...and I deemed that upon myself to cover. I left the deep side of the matter to Dave and his articulate insightfulness. However, I must point out that in retrospect, I can point out that my column has been rather square (by Dave's scale), while Dave's is under the rather circular persuasion. This is not a cut on either of us, it is just to point out that there is a little of both sexes in all of us, and that is nothing that ought to be denied — it is something to appreciate.

My final point is that we simply all want to be loved and appreciated for who we truly are, and none of us want to get hurt in the process. We are all actually looking for the same thing but we all go about it in many different ways. So next time somebody shows an interest in you (and you don't feel the same), remember that unrequited love can be torturous, and be kind. And for goodness sake...let's all try to be a little optimistic (I know it's hard, but try). And don't try too hard too figure it all out, because there are really no answers to the ever mysterious LOOOOVE.

"Love is the blank card in your destiny pack...it is not meant to be known." — Stephanie Manning

"The supreme happiness of life is the conviction that we are loved." — Victor Hugo

P.S. Please respond to my column and Dave's. We are curious if anybody out there agrees with us or thinks we are completely off-track.

Community Forum focuses on athletics

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

The Community Forum for Spring 1994 will take an eclectic look at sports in America.

Dr. John Perry, chairman of the department of physical education, is the coordinator for the lecture series that began Feb. 3. He said that he wants people to realize that there is more to sports than what is recapped on the evening news.

Perry emphasized that people should "broaden their scope of knowledge" about sports. The series involves a sociological and psychological analysis of athletics.

Dr. Andrew Kozar, professor of the department of human performance and sports studies at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville and former UT champion athlete, opened the series with "R. Tait McKenzie: Sculptor of Athletes."

McKenzie was an artist, sculptor, and craftsman who died during the early 1900s. He worked for universities in America and overseas, often sketching athletes while they were playing.

Kozar showed the audience photographs of four masks which McKenzie had sculpted.

Each of the four masks was representative of an athlete's face during stages of exertion — effort, breathlessness, fatigue, and exhaustion.

Kozar then showed the audience a photograph of a runner taken several years after the masks were made. The mask's expression matched the runner's expression almost perfectly.

McKenzie designed sculpture, statues, and medallions as well as masks. He worked with proportions and scale in order to use the ideal dimensions of human beings in all of his work.

McKenzie designed statues of several different kinds of athletes, including high jumpers, sprinters, skaters, and football players.

Many of his medallions are still used as sports awards.

This lecture showed the grace, strength, and artistry embodied in sports, as well as demonstrating that people do not have to be on the playing field to make a contribution to athletics.

The second lecture will be held Feb. 10. Dr. Craig Wisberg, another professor in the department of human performance and sports studies at UTK, will speak on "Sports Psychology: What Is It and Where Is It Headed?"

On Feb. 24, Haywood Harris, the associate athletic director for media relations at UTK, will speak on "Sports Media and Relations with College Athletics."

On March 10, Knox County Board of Education Chairman Sam Anderson will discuss "Evolution of Black Coaches As It Pertains to Desegregation of Public Schools."

Anderson will discuss, among other topics, some of the reasons and thinking behind the fact that, as of last year, Knox County's only African-American head coach worked at Austin East, a high school whose student population is predominantly black.

On March 24, Bob Kessling, sports director for WBIR Television, will speak on "Sports: The Good, The Bad, The Ugly." He will give some insight to the actual world of sports as opposed to what a television viewer often sees on the evening news.

Kelli Casteel-Cook, Maryville College's Women's Basketball Coach, will finish the series on April 7 with her lecture "Cultural Perspectives on Women and Sports."

All lectures will take place at the Fine Arts Center. Game time is 11 a.m. for each discussion.

"Uh, not in the last year" —

The campus gave its blood Feb. 7 for Medic Regional Blood Center's annual blood drive. A total of 65 students, faculty and staff went through the rigorous questioning, finger-pricking, and bleeding. Fifty-one of those who came could give, 14 could not for various reasons. Here, Josh Hogan answers the sometimes personal questions asked by Medic personnel.

Claudia Chambers, Liscensed Practicing Nurse for Medic, said of the turnout, "it was really good. I think we got less than 20 the last time we were here."

Medic made away with seven gallons of MC's hemoglobin.

Nelson Johnson invited to speak

February Meetings address "Beloved Community"

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

Since 1877, February Meetings have been a part of Maryville College. Although the format has greatly changed over the years, the tradition continues.

At one time, February Meetings were held for 12 days.

Today, the meetings are only held for three days, and all classes are not canceled for that time, as they once were. Attendance for February meetings has been, and continues to be, a concern of the College.

This year the speaker is Rev. Nelson Johnson of Greensboro, North Carolina, where he is currently serving as pastor at the Faith Community Church.

Nelson will be speaking about the "Beloved Community" in his three keynote speeches. These talks will begin at 11 a.m. the mornings of February 15, 16, and 17.

Each afternoon at 3:30 p.m. there will be a series called "Deepening the Discussion."

This will provide the opportunity for interested students and faculty to discuss the topic of the day in greater detail with Nelson.

When he is not speaking, Nelson will be meeting with groups such as Bonner Scholars and community leaders.

Nelson stated that he hopes his visit at MC will be "a meaningful time of sharing."

Scholarships for returning students available

by Kristin Johnson
Staff Writer

With the cost of college increasing steadily, now is the time to begin applying for scholarships and grants for the 1994-95 academic year. The following is a list of available money for returning students.

Presidential Scholar: full tuition
Requirements: Three semesters or 45 hours completed at Maryville College with a cumulative grade point average of 3.50. Application guidelines available in the Financial Aid Office.

Deadline: February 28

Dean's Scholar: half tuition

Requirements: Same as Presidential Scholar.

Deadline: February 28

Senior Leadership Grant: $1,000 room grant

Requirements: Senior standing and demonstrated leadership. Students who already receive full tuition grants or scholarships are not eligible.

Application guidelines available in the Student Development and Financial Aid Offices.

Deadline: March 11

Academic Achievement Award: $500 to $1,000

Requirements: Current full-time students who have achieved a cumulative grade point average of 2.75 or better who are not currently recipients of a Maryville College Dean's, Presidential Scholarship or other full-tuition grants or scholarships.

Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA) required; award based on spring semester cumulative GPA.

Tennessee State Assistance Award: up to $1,890*

Deadline: March 1

Maryville College Grant: up to $6,000

Requirements: Need-based grant awarded upon receipt of the FAFSA. An additional $150,000 will be distributed to families with increased need due to increased costs or changes in family circumstances.

Deadline: July 1

New Community Service Scholarship Program

A program is being developed for returning students who would be interested in working in the adult literacy program in exchange for a scholarship. The scholarship funds would be in addition to the student's current financial aid award. If you would be willing to participate in such a program, contact Venita Jones in the Financial Aid Office for further information.

*A possible increase in the Tennessee State Assistance Award is under consideration by the State Legislature. If it is approved and funded, the maximum award would increase to $2,322 adding as much as $432 to awards. Don't miss the March 1 deadline; these funds run out early every year.

Spring holds many environmental events and activities on campus

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

On March 14, 16, 18, 19, and 20th an environmentally oriented play for elementary and secondary school students will be presented at Wilson Chapel on the Maryville College campus. T.H.E (Trying Helping the Environment) Club Fair is a musical produced by the Blount County Children's Playhouse, performed by local students in graded K-12. The play encourages children to get involved in helping the environment by showing that is something everyone can do, no matter what his or her age.

There will be various exhibits and activities provided by local organizations before and after each performance to educate both students and adults about environmental issues. These will include puzzles for the students to complete, airplanes made from newspaper, and a demonstration of how to use recyclable paper to make new paper. Information about composting and recycling will also be available.

Help is needed in designing and setting up displays, as well as directing the children's activities. Anyone interested in volunteering is urged to call Beautiful Blount for more information.

Since the play is during Spring Break commuters are especially asked to consider helping on those days.

Beautiful Blount is sponsoring River Rescue on March 26 from 8:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. This is a massive effort to clean up the banks of Ft. Loudon Lake. In the past years debris has included everything from soft drink cans and Styrofoam cups to food wrappers and fishing pole lines. Equipment and refreshments will be provided.

Earth Day will be celebrated on April 22. There will be various activities including a litter pick up cumulating in a picnic for all volunteers.

Anyone interested in these activities is urged to call Beautiful Blount at 681-4809.

Learn to live debt free

Dave Vaccaro, educator and entrepreneur from Norris, TN, will offer his popular course in Debt Free and Prosperous Living Feb. 8 and 15 at Maryville College. The course is part of the non-credit Community Education program.

The class will meet in Sutton Science Center, Room 231, from 6:30 to 9 p.m. Pre-registration is required by calling 981-8116.

The two sessions are designed to teach individuals how to eliminate debt, including a mortgage, and operate on a 100 percent cash basis.

MACCO features Valentine's Day performance, art

Jane Zopff, harpist, and Elizabeth Goode, flutist, will be featured with the Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra in their Valentine's Day Concert Monday, Feb. 14, at 8 p.m. in the Theatre Complex at Maryville College.

The guest artists are adjunct faculty members of the Music Department of Maryville College. They will play Hamilton Harty's "In Ireland," a fantasy for flute, harp, and orchestra, with the orchestra under the direction of Bill Robinson.

Opening the program will be Schubert's "Symphony in B Minor," the "Unfinished" symphony.

Following intermission, the orchestra will play "Dances for Strings and Harp by Debussy, Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" by Mascagni, "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings," by Howard Hanson, and "Ballet Parisienne" from "La vie Parisienne" by Offenbach.

Goode is a doctoral candidate in Flute Performance at Yale University School of Music. Since leaving Yale in 1990 she has performed numerous recitals in the southeast. This past summer she was solo flutist at the Tamworth Music Festival in Tamworth, NH. She is Principal Flutist with the Oak Ridge Symphony Orchestra and performs with the Knoxville Symphony.

Zopff has performed with the Oak Ridge Symphony and the Kingsport Symphony. She is currently studying with Cairiona Yeats, Principal Harp with the Cincinnati Symphony. She has played in England and Austria, and in performances with the Louisville, Chattanooga, Nashville, Cincinnati, Lexington, and Miami University orchestra.

She is a founder of the East Tennessee Chapter of the American Harp Society and supervisor of the harp ensemble.

The art show in the lobby for the Valentine's Day performance will be work by Mary-Louise Hunt, professional glass painter and designer. Her paintings of casein and gouache on paper are the basis for her flat-glass designs.

Ms. Hunt lives in Gatlinburg, where she is involved in programs for children. Her work was included in the juried exhibition of Sevier County art at the Southeast Craft's Conference show at Arrowmont last winter.

Tickets, available at the door on the evening of the performance, are $7 for adults, $5 for students and senior citizens, and $1 for children under 12. The concert is free for Maryville College students.

Pearsons Hall soon after it was built. Standing in front of the prominent new dormitory of 1910 are the students of Maryville College. The 1972 fire made news across the country.

Pearsons' long history proves eventful

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

With only a $20,000 donation by Dr. Daniel K. Pearsons, Pearsons Hall was finished in 1910.

Housing the dining hall in 1935, Pearsons had grown in height from two stories to three in 1912 and to four stories in 1918.

On the second floor was a front lobby, behind which were two large meeting rooms for two women's clubs, Bainonian and Beta Epsilon.

The second floor lobby was also regarded as an official meeting place for men and women students on campus after the sun had gone down or when the weather was inclement. Couples were allowed to be together there until 7 p.m. That policy lasted into the 1970s.

Probably the biggest event in the history of Pearsons is its most recent destruction by fire. On the night before Valentine's Day 1972, a fire broke out on the fourth floor of Pearsons.

At that time, Pearsons was a women's dorm. On that historic night, all of the women in the building were on the second floor at the weekly hall meeting at 10 p.m. One of the residents went upstairs around 10:30 p.m. and discovered smoke on the fourth floor.

The building was quickly evacuated. Chief Eldria Hurst went upstairs to determine the source of the fire, originating in room 426. Unable to open the door, Hurst made sure all were out and escaped the fire.

All 91 residents exited the residence hall unscathed physically, including the resident director for 37 years, Margaret Ware.

Lasting several hours, the fire was eventually extinguished by a combination of efforts of Maryville and Alcoa Fire Departments. They kept spraying water into Pearsons until 7 a.m., Valentine's Day.

After the fire, the damage was inspected. The fourth floor was gone, the third floor was badly burned, half of the second floor was burned, and the other half was damaged by smoke and soaked in water. The first floor, the dining hall, sustained similar damage.

An inspector of the damage found a peculiar path the flames had taken—the fire had gutted one room while leaving the one beside it unscathed in parts of the second floor. The flames had traveled down the hallways and stairways into the rooms.

The homeless residents had not been able to recover anything when they escaped from Pearsons. Fellow students shared rooms, clothes, books, class notes, and other daily necessities with the residents. School was closed for the day and dining services were set up at Wilson Chapel. Four hours after the fire trucks left, a campus meeting took place to explain the situation.

Dr. Ramger, biology professor at MC, said of the time: "So many people came to help them. I think the kids were amazed." He went on to try to explain the feelings of those who did not live on campus, "We didn't get much... as a feel... for the loss."

Arthur Bushing, an instructor of English at MC at the time, remembered the personal note the fire struck with him. While surveying the damage, he peered into the what had been the room of his daughter in the previous year.

Bushing also remembered the story recollected by an alumni neighbor on the night of the fire. Living on Court Street, she had no inkling of the fire until the national news broadcast from New York pictures of the burning Pearsons. He also commented on the generous outpouring of support from the community. "The town rallied around—started providing food."

The senior class collected $300 and donated the money for emergency relief efforts.

Suffering the third major fire in MC history, only three floors of Pearsons were rebuilt.

The dormitory and dining hall have been renovated since the rebuilding.

Voorhees Chapel served as center of campus life

From 1906 to 1947, the Elizabeth Voorhees Chapel was the center of campus life. Funded by a $100,000 donation from Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Voorhees of New Jersey, the Chapel was located where the current Wilson Chapel is today, and was the place of worship every morning and Sunday night.

The immaculate chapel contained a large half moon stage jutting down at a slight angle toward the audience seating. Very large stain glass windows adorned the sides of the walls.

The seating in the chapel was not much different from Wilson Chapel—683 seats divided into four sections—each section having 26 rows. An additional 124 seats were on a gallery above the rear of the main floor. Sixty additional seats accommodated the choir.

The sidewalk leading from the front of the CCM to the front of Wilson led straight to the front doors of Voorhees. Stairs, instead of descending as they now do to Wilson, ascended the entrance to Voorhees.

Most every college program or function was held in Voorhees. "It was a very functional building," said Arthur Bushing, a former English professor and student at MC. He remembered several of the plays held in Voorhees, which took place three or four times a year. Bushing also noted the difficulty in putting on a play in Voorhees in comparison to the efficiency of the theatre in Wilson Chapel. "It was quite an operation to put on a play there," he said.

Bushing also remarked on the daily morning prayer services that every student and teacher was expected to attend. "We'd march out row by row... seniors were always out front. The classes were seated according to rank."

There was a small fire in Voorhees Chapel on November 23, 1946, but the flames that engulfed the building ignited four months and three days later on the night of March 26, 1947. Two boys who were working as janitors in Voorhees and had living quarters in the basement escaped the fire which had broken out inside the building. The chapel was completely destroyed within an hour.

In a letter written by President Ralph Waldo Lloyd to the MC Board of Directors, he said: "Nothing was saved, even the clothes of the two boys."

All of the music and drama departments' equipment was destroyed in what was, for MC history, the second major fire to take place.

Prayer services were moved to the Alumni Gym and area churches responded to the needs of the college. Classes were rescheduled for music and theatre at the home of the Lloyd's, New Providence Presbyterian Church, Anderson Hall, the Chilhowee Club House, First Methodist Church, Bartlett Hall, and Broadway Methodist Church.

Insurance settlements totaled $73,762.01.

Pro soccer a possibility for MC grads

by Karen Beaty
Assistant Editor

If anyone would like to argue that soccer isn't a life time sport, he obviously didn't attend the Maryville College Indoor Soccer Classic held in the Alumni Gym, Feb. 4-6.

The tournament, coordinated by Maryville College Soccer Coach Pepe Fernandez and assistant coach Ben Sohrabi and sponsored by Lotto sports equipment, drew 24 men's teams and 14 women's teams to the MC campus. Of the five teams representing the college, two teams were composed of alumni soccer players.

In all, Fernandez boasts nine MC graduates and current students who have played in or are presently playing in semi-professional leagues. The popularity of soccer, which has been gaining momentum in the last ten years, has the potential to explode after the United States hosts the World Cup Games this summer. "The World Cup will make soccer aware to everybody," said Sohrabi. With that, he predicts that semi-professional and professional teams will not only increase in number, but the salaries and benefits for players will increase, also.

"In semi-professional soccer, all expenses are paid — that's all your equipment and travel," said Sohrabi. "Some teams in leagues are already getting paid. It's the next step up from any amateur soccer."

As of now, there are two divisions of professional soccer in the United States. Division III of the United States Inter-regional Soccer League (USISL) is the first level of professional play. Fernandez likened it to AAA Baseball. Division II soccer is played in major cities like Ft. Lauderdale, Tampa, Washington, DC, and Los Angeles. The average salary for a player in Division II is $22,000.

"One of the contract agreements the US had to meet before hosting the World Cup Games was that we had to have a professional league in tact," explained Sohrabi. He also went on to say that although the dates are "sketchy," the president of the United States Soccer Federation (USSF) has approved the formation of Division I soccer. Top players should expect to earn approximately $60,000 annually.

If the "trickle down" theory applies to athletics, the growth of professional soccer could be beneficial to the Maryville College soccer program. With nine players already in leagues around the South (and one who played in France), the college's name is being heard. Sohrabi, who plays for the Knoxville Impact indoor soccer team, said he thought approximately 500 fans show up to watch each home game. "It's quality soccer. Maryville College is putting out better players than any other school or university around," he said.

"The younger players look up to the older players. This publicity is getting kids excited about Maryville at an early age," added Fernandez.

For the players graduating from colleges (and maybe those who choose not to attend post-secondary institutions), the leagues enable them to play at a high, competitive level for years.

Fernandez said he feels like the goal of the leagues — to promote the on-going interest in the sport — is not different from the goals of his own program. "We not only want to have good teams, but also turn out players who love soccer."

College Republicans attempt to stir political debate

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

Whether we realize it or not, decisions that influence our lives are being made each and every day. Do we as citizens know how our government works? The newly founded Maryville College Republicans are doing their best to see that the answer is yes.

The Republicans officially received their charter in April of 1993. The co-founders of the group are Kristin Kant and Chris Noe. "We were discussing the need for a political club on campus," Noe said that the club's goal is, "to make people politically aware."

The Republicans first major activity was the NAFTA debate last spring. According to Tobias Grant, the club's secretary, the NAFTA debate "went very well for our first event."

The other officers of the college Republicans are Aaron Sentell, vice Chair, and Todd Anderson, chair. The College Republicans expressed their appreciation for the U.T. College Republicans. "The U.T. College Republicans were a great help to us in getting organized, especially their president, Jack Temple," stated Noe.

Feb. 1, the Republicans had a discussion on Senator Bob Dole's rebuttal to President Clinton's State Of the Union Address. It was held in the Commuter Lounge of Fayerweather Hall. The turnout was not as good as the members were hoping — less than ten people showed up for the discussion.

This was not the first activity that the Republicans participated in this semester. Many students remember that during registration a few weeks ago, the college Republicans were registering people to vote in the November 1994 Tennessee elections.

The meetings are currently held on Thursday's in the Center for Campus Ministry at 1 p.m. The club is in the process of restructuring and reorganizing. Many more activities are planned for this semester, including a debate (similar to NAFTA).

The members also plan to have several guest speakers this semester, possibly Congressman

John Duncan. The members want to stress that their meetings are usually informal. The meetings are open to non-members and any faculty that wish to come as well. When asked if staunch Democrats were also welcomed, Grant said: "Yes — the stauncher they are, the better the debate."

Club Section

The Echo has asked the organizations and clubs on campus to tell our readers about themselves and their upcoming activities. The clubs listed are the only clubs which submitted to this section. If you want your club included, send a description of your club and/or activities to P.O. Box 2407. The next deadline is February 21, 1994.

Humanities Club

Purpose:

The Humanities Club is designed to allow students to more fully support humanities programs at Maryville College through activities which may range from formal, structured meetings to informal social gatherings. The club also is designed to establish unity in the Humanities division. Please come!

What's happening:

This month we plan to go as a group to see Spielberg's Schindler's List and then host some follow-up activities and discussions led by campus professors in the Humanities division. For more information, contact Angela McLemore at P.O. Box 2587.

Environmental Club

Purpose:

The Environmental Club works toward promoting a healthy environment on campus and beyond. The club meets regularly every Thursday at 12 noon in Pearsons second floor lounge.

What's happening:

On February 12 we will be having the Court Street cleanup. Meet in Pearsons lounge at 10:30 a.m. For more information, contact Nikki Masters at P.O. Box 2439.

Class features execs

Dr. Mary Kay Sullivan studied in Italy as a Fulbright Scholar and has a Ph.D. from the University of Tennessee, but what she does not have is a high school diploma. The school she attended to while growing up in AR closed because of racial problems. So Sullivan went on college after grade 10.

For those not acquainted with Sullivan, she is the associate professor of management at Maryville College, and the recipient of the 1992 Outstanding Teacher of the Year Award. She came to the college in 1989 as the first Ph.D. in the Management department. One of the courses she teaches is Business Policy 401. The course has been designed to be a "capstone" course for Business/Management majors in their senior year.

What really sets this course apart is the executive presentation. This is where the students are required to make presentations of a real company with CEOs, presidents of companies, non-profit organizations, etc. present in the classroom, and acting as panel members. In the past, Thomas R. Bell, President of the East Tennessee Natural Gas;

Mr. James P. Roddy, President of the Roddy Coca-Cola Bottling Company have come, just to name a few.

Sullivan got the idea from Skidmore College in NY, where there is a similar course for Freshmen. She "drew ideas from there, but saw more potentials as capstone course." This is where the students "integrate what they have learned in all their classes with a real world experience."

There are basically three things she does to prepare the students for this presentation. The first is that students make another presentation to the class as a group-the same group of people who work together for the executive presentation (the format is still the same except the executives are not there). The second thing is that Dr. Sullivan gives feedback to the class on what makes a good presentation. Finally, conferences are held with each group a week before to answer any questions.

So what are some of these "real" companies? Walmart, DDT Lumber Company, Only a Hanger, Lands' End. Real enough.

Concerns for environment grow

Powell gives advice for caring for Earth

by Josh Hogan
Staff Writer

The media has given quite a bit of attention to such environmental terms as global warming, ozone layer depletion, and deforestation. What do these terms mean? Are they merely catchphrases or real environmental problems? If they are real problems, what can we as students do to help solve them?

Mr. David Powell, one of MC's English instructors, is very active with environmental concerns. Besides helping with the Environmental Club, Mr. Powell teaches a January Term class entitled Save the Earth. Powell believes that the key to saving the earth lies in each individual taking the initiative to educate themselves on the very real problems facing our planet's environment. In regard to Global warming, the ozone layer and deforestation, he asks, "What are these things? Very few students can tell me, really." So, according to Powell, education is the way to change people's minds and attitudes. It is also important to remember, he reminds, that the education is a lifelong process that requires one to constantly keep up with new problems and ideas for solutions. Powell himself is a member of four environmental groups in order to keep him abreast of all the environmental news.

Powell also reminds us that no one thing can save the environment. He says that may disappoint those who expect to do their part by simply turning off their light switch or throwing a can into a recycling bin. Fortunately, according to Mr. Powell, "Recycling plus dozens of other things can, in fact, have an effect." Individuals can make a difference; but, it's the corporations and the governments of the world that can make a large difference, he thinks.

This though is where our real power as students lies. Powell says that our greatest power to change the environment is our economic power. Our economic power consists of our ability to either not buy products from companies that do little or nothing to help the environment or to buy products from companies that have made a real effort to improve environmental conditions. The best thing that we can do with our purchasing power, Powell says, is to "close the loop," that is, buy products such as recycled garbage bags or paper. It is good to recycle things, but it is even better to buy recycled products which creates a larger market for recycled products. Powell says this will in turn create more of a demand for recycling efforts. Mr. Powell says, "It is easier to use your purchasing power to buy recycled products than to boycott products that may be harmful to the environment." If you do buy environmentally sound products, this sends a message to companies that you want more of these products. The corporations, always concerned for their future in the business market will respond. This is what Mr. Powell says students can do with their purchasing power.

One problem Powell sees in getting people to respond to environmental concerns is this: "People don't respond to processes, but people respond to events." People, then, are more likely to cry for greater environmental controls after an Exxon Valdez disaster or the like. Why does Powell think this is the case? This again ties back into education. He says people are not wholly aware of the processes that are breaking down our biosphere. Most people have not really heard enough hard evidence for things like global warming to react. Powell thinks that if the temperature of the globe rose to 100 degrees tomorrow people would respond. However, we hardly notice a degree or two every couple of years. In other words, the more aware people become of the actual processes that cause the events, the more we can do to control these processes.

Powell's final point, and one that he thinks is one of the least important, was individuals need to change their habits. It is very important to change habits, but Powell points out that if one educates oneself first, habits will change naturally. If you are aware of your power as a consumer and of the processes that harm the environment, you will automatically make the decision to change your habits. Powell urges that the best habit one can change is to buy products that "close the loop." He says to buy recycled garbage bags, buy recycled paper. This is why Mr. Powell thinks it is not very helpful to tell people specific things to do to help the environment. He says it all ties into educating oneself; if you are educated, you know what has to be done. And to be educated takes your own initiative.

If students are interested in finding out what they can do, there are four major areas in which Mr. Powell says that students can be most helpful. These are: Deforestation, global warming, ozone depletion, and contamination of fresh water. The best way to begin one's education is by joining and supporting national and international environmental groups. Powell stresses that supporting is more than financial. Environmental groups publish very useful material that is up to date on the latest environmental developments. One such publication that students may be interested in is Students Shopping for a Better World published by The Council on Economic Priorities. Powell is quick to remind, though, that educating yourself and changing your habits "is a never ending occupation."

Women's interim studies "Smurfette Syndrome"

by Lance Klosterman
Staff Writer

Why is one in five girls at college involved in a violent relationship? Why do women make 68 cents to every $1 that their male counterparts make? Why is a strong or assertive female often classified as a lesbian? Why is feminism often thought of as something for unattractive women?

Dr. Marti Craig, instructor of the Women in Society class, said people are being socialized by the age two.

The class is designed to analyze societal issues of specific importance to women. Issues like the role of a woman in society to be dependent and less powerful.

"Little boys learn at an early age to be strong and mean and macho and little girls have little, pink, frilly dresses with the ribbons that are 'cutsie'." The main thing is that women are supposed to depend on the man," a class member stated.

This "Smurfette Syndrome" is reinforced by cartoons (the stupidity of Olivoyl and the weakness of Minnie Mouse), children's stories, music videos, and movies.

"The idea originated with a group of women concerned about some decisions that some of our women students were making about relationships and abusive situations on campus with boyfriends and such. You think 'why are they making these choices?'" Craig asked.

Women in business is a subject that also warrants much discussion.

"Right out of high school, it's not the same thing for a woman to go to college as it is for a man," Craig said.

Concerning sexism in the classroom, most of the women in the class thought it was not that bad. Unfortunately, there is a large difference off campus. Traditions and socialization cause sexism to flourish in this area of the United States of America.

"Outside of class... in the cafeteria is where you see it," class member Lacy Compton said, but did not further explain in what way.

"I am interested in how students tend to evaluate a professor differently based on his or her gender. They look for different things. Research shows we expect different things based on the professor's gender," Craig stated.

The Women in Society class has a reputation for being a man-bashing group of women.

"I don't think we degrade men in any way," said Traci Marcum, another class member.

"It's about us, women, getting closer and supporting each other," said Compton.

"I think we're just comparing how women and men are brought up socially and what we can do to change that," Marcum said.

Some, like freshman Allison Pryor, even advocated the formation of an all male class: "Maybe we should have an all guys class and an all girls class that was separate. And by the end of the term, they could join and talk about issues."

Campus Question: Is There Sexism on campus?

"How they design residence halls—I'd call that sexism. It inhibits communication between the sexes inherently."

-Thomas Janeka,
Junior

"Yes. Some guys play jokes about sex and use lots of curse words about a woman's parts. . . Sometimes I feel so embarrassed."

-Soo-jeong Shin,
Freshman

"I see students who come in with a sexist interpretation of the world . . . it takes a process of adaption to remove that."

-Dr. Scott Brunger,
Associate Professor of Economics

"I think that Maryville is full of it, but not the campus."

-Mary Beth Foxall, senior

"Somewhat there is. It's not that prevalent. I'm sure it happens because it happens everywhere."

-Nick Schell,
Freshman

"I don't see any blatant sexism. There is unprecedented sexism."

-Garth Lovvorn,
Sophomore

"To a certain extent. It's everywhere."

-Melissa Lewand,
Freshman

"On campus? Yea. Like sports. I don't think its a problem-not worse than anywhere else."

-Todd Anderson,
sophomore

"I'm not eating in the dining hall . . . From the commuter's perspective, no. In a sense, I see women pushing the issue too far. I do see it in the classroom. My professors use inclusive language."

-Greg Heisler, junior, commuter

"Sure. Everywhere you go there's sexism. I don't see it in the classroom. The only place I really, really see it is at the women's basketball games, or any girl sports. The boy's games get more fans."

-Lisa Hill,
senior

"I see hints of it here and there."

-Jenny Cummings,
junior

"No, I don't see it."
-Tuti Fernandez,
CELL student

"I have not really noticed any kind of sexism on campus. I think this college is very liberal in its thinking. Women are equal to men mentally, socially, if not religiously."

-Tobias Grant,
sophomore

"The only thing we hear is a lot of language. We don't see anybody pinching each other, kissing each other . . ."

-Catherine Cobb, cafeteria employee

"I think its here, but I haven't seen any sexism."

-Amy Fenner, junior

Letters to the Editor . . .

The story behind Humphries . . .

Dear Editor:

Maybe it's "cabin fever" that motivates me to pen this letter in response to Dave Roberts' column in the October 29, 1993, issue of the HIGHLAND ECHO. My first mental composition was a sarcastic epistle filled with exaggerated indignation at the lack of gratitude Roberts expressed in his ramblings about the flower gardens and sidewalks. (I had nothing to do with the water fountain!) With dramatic flare I was going to threaten to quit my job, my family, my dogs, and run off to Australia to take care of the remaining koalas suffering since the fire. I planned to announce that I was kidnapping Jenny Cummings, my staunch defender, because I was sure everyone would suspect a scandal when they found out she was raised a mile away from my home and used to babysit my children in her pre-college days!

I chickened out of penning that letter for fear the humor would be lost. Besides, I was afraid Dr. Gibson would take me seriously and I would miss all those free meals I get during the Board meetings!!!

So, the purpose of this letter? I still remember aspects of being a student at MC several decades ago. Things (good and bad) would happen on campus without much explanation, resulting in suspiciousness and conjecture. We students often complained of the lack of communication. With that in mind, here is the real story of Humphreys Court.

It did not begin by me telling the president to put a garden in the middle of campus with my maiden name on it!!!! It began, actually, 24 years ago when my parents were generally pleased with the education I received at MC. Thereafter they made contributions to the college. After my father's death in 1981, someone (no one in my family) suggested honoring him with a flower garden near the CCM. Mark Ebersole, during his first stint at MC, envisioned expanding this garden to a courtyard in the middle of campus for aesthetics and gatherings and requested that various members of the Humphreys family donate toward that cause. That project did not materialize quickly and was dropped soon after Dick Ferrin's arrival due to the college's bleak financial condition.

A few years later Dick Ferrin approached me about financing the Humphreys Court project which I agreed to do over a period of time. Projects like this usually evolve rather than move in a straight line. Thus, due to some unexpected budgeting situations and careful use of gifts and campus resources, Humphreys Court with its new sidewalks and water lilies was completed in 1993 just in time to be dedicated with all the other projects. There you have it—the complete history, as I know it, of Humphreys Court.

I, like Dave Roberts, dream of a complete renovation job for Anderson Hall. Perhaps I will help with that someday. Perhaps, if Dave Roberts turns his "poison penmanship" into Michael Crichton success, he might do the honors!

Security matters . . .

Dear Editor,

I would appreciate the opportunity to acquaint your readers with the individual members of the security department:

Eldria Hurst is our Chief of Security. He is a soft-spoken, patient man who has for 31 years served the students, faculty and staff of Maryville College with a wise and gentle attitude.

Mr. Hurst and his wife Etta have been substitute Dad and Mom to scores of students. They have given loving counsel and care to many who in times of discouragement would have walked away without seeing graduation day.

Mr. Carol Pratz came to us after faithfully serving 20 years with the United States Air Force. He is an intelligent, professional individual who is constantly looking for ways to improve the safety of our students. He is concerned that the growing trend of hurt and harm that he has witnessed will find its way to our small campus community.

Mrs. Debbie Harmon has been in law enforcement for over 16 years. Even after seeing many of the vile things that man can do to his neighbor, she has not become hardened, but approaches everyone she meets with a friendly, helpful demeanor. Mrs. Harmon is full-time member of the Blount County Sheriff's Department and works part-time at Maryville College.

My name is Don Henson. I have been a minister for 23 years. My wife and I have served as home missionaries in several states. While building churches, I have been a Chaplain to nursing homes, police departments, and helped prisoners and their families with their physical and spiritual needs.

For a while I taught soul-winning and counseling for the Billy Graham Association.

Each one of us would put our personal safety on the line to protect the students of Maryville College. But we hope the only need you have is help in starting your ailing auto or entrance to your room when you've lost your key.

Thank you.

Don Henson

Dear Editor:

Dave Roberts' comments on our campus security officers were off-base and out-of-line: off-base because untrue—our officers exhibit exemplary professional behavior and attitudes, in my view; and out-of-line because columns of personal opinion should not be used for attacks on individuals or groups who cannot respond in kind. If Roberts witnessed an incident that he thinks warrants investigation, it should be handled in a news story, in which questions can be asked of all parties.

Our security officers—ALL of them—do a super job, and the campus is fortunate to have their protection.

Yours very truly,
Joan H. Worley

Bosnia letter . . .

Dear Editor,

Did you know 68 innocent civilians were killed in Sarajevo on Saturday, Feb. 5? Do you know why?

It happened because of the UN Security Council's Resolution 713 that imposes an arms embargo on the former republics of Yugoslavia. This arms embargo prevents the Bosnians from defending themselves. They have no heavy arms which are needed to remove the criminal Serbs from the hills where they continue to shell innocent civilians. This embargo is UNFAIR, UNJUST, IMMORAL, and ILLEGAL according to Article 51 of the UN Charter.

Bosnia is a member of the UN and has the inherent right to self-defense. Yet under Clinton's policy this right has been denied. Bosnian President Ali Izetbegovic said: "Those who deprive us of the right to self-defense will be accomplices in the crime." The blood is on Clinton's hands. They bury their innocent men, women, and children in what the people of Sarajevo call "Clinton graves."

If we turn our backs on the people of Bosnia and refuse to come to their aid, (even though we went to Kuwait, a non-democratic state, and Bosnia is a democratic state), we should at least allow them to arm themselves. Izetbegovic said: "We are condemned to death, denied the right to defend ourselves." Why do we send humanitarian aid if we leave them to die defenseless?

What happened on Feb. 5 was not unavoidable because of "ancient hatreds," but was predictable. If the Bosnian government had arms and the international community had stood up and refused to tolerate the aggressive Serbs and their criminal leaders Milosevic and Karadzic, this wouldn't have happened. But for 22 months we have done nothing, expect issue hollow threats of action.

The Serbs have gotten the message — we don't care. So they continue to kill and flaunt it in our faces. They do not even try to hide it from us anymore. The ethnic cleansing — which means mass murder, mass rape, and mass relocation of people to make Bosnia ethnically pure of non-Serbs — is genocide.

Sarajevo is the largest concentration camp the world has ever seen. Clinton's policy states that the atrocities in Bosnia do not violate the International Treaty on Genocide. To call it genocide would require a policy response. Do we have to wait until they build gas chambers before we call it genocide? Did we learn anything from W.W.II? Our government didn't recognize the Nazi's atrocities during that war, either.

It's interesting to point out that during W.W.II, Nazi Germany declared Serbia the first state to be "Juden Frei" (Jew Free). We are the "good Germans" of the 1990s who have turned our backs as people are marched to their graves. Who carries a heavier burden of guilt — a German who was unaware of the gas chambers or you and I who know and see everyday on television.. everyday the systematic massacre of the Bosnians? Are we an ethical and moral nation if we have the power to stop this bloodshed and yet, do nothing? An ethical and moral president doesn't need a consensus of his allies in order to act against something he finds reprehensible. By remaining neutral, we have chosen the side of the aggressor.

When six girls sledding were intentionally shelled and killed, it was avoidable. When some teenagers playing soccer were intentionally shelled and killed, it was avoidable. When the Serbs intentionally shelled and killed nine mourners at a burial ceremony, it was avoidable. When the Serbs intentionally shelled a market place where 68 people were killed and more than 200 others were injured, it was avoidable. The tragedy is that all of this was all too avoidable.

We have tried to forget Sarajevo for 22 months and hoped it would just go away, but our policy mistakes came back to haunt us on that Saturday. If there ever was a time to use force, it is now.

The UN Resolution 836 authorizes the use of force in response to bombardments on designated safe areas, and allows that "all necessary measures" be taken through the use of air power to support UN forces in and around the safe havens. Sarajevo was declared a safe haven in UN Resolution 824.

Our credibility is on the line. Will we allow the Serbs to continue defying international law? How long will the Serbs continue to get away with murder? Why do we appease the Serbs? What will the cost of continuing inaction be?

These are questions that will have to be answered someday.

Hey, kids, how's your love life?

It's Valentine's Day, or close to it. The forty-fifth day out of the 365 that make a year—that's the day our society has selected to celebrate romantic love. As such, it is naturally depressing as hell. Nevertheless, as a special treat for all you little whippersnappers, my illustrious fellow columnist Alene Day and I have both agreed to apply our, uh, less-than-legendary literary skills to the subject of "the guy-girl thing."

I've mulled this idea, and I've decided that a column can not begin to cover all the things there are to say about the subject...in fact, after thinking about it for a while, I've come to the conclusion that virtually anything one says about the mystifying dance of the sexes is either reductive or romantic, dissecting or generalizing, too little or too much. Love is not merely a facet of human experience; it redefines human experience. It is not experienced in one particular part of the human being; it involves the entire body and soul. When it is real, love is life... a lover who tries to deny that fact is like a fledgling that folds its wings after being pushed from the nest. Love is a filter through which the entire range of human activity can be seen anew. Love is crisis and celebration, pain and pleasure, terror and joy, chains and wings...

It can also be a fetid, reeking crotch of doo-doo.

So how do you write a column about it?

What's that you say? An incoherent collection of broad, sweeping generalizations leading to dubious and possibly offensive conclusions which do little to shine any new light on the topic? Sure, I can do that.

It seems to me that too much of the social interaction between guys and girls is obscured by layers of misunderstanding, deception, manipulation, and suspicion. This can all be traced, in my opinion (what, a generalization?), to the basic difference between males and females. I have struggled for a long time for an effective way to express this difference; everyone understands it on a gut level, but no one seems to be able to articulate it without offending someone or another. Luckily, offending people is not on my top five list of things to avoid.

The human psyche has to fundamental poles: on is intellectual, rational, linear, logical... square, we'll call it. The other is emotional, instinctive, irrational, intuitional... circular. Every individual psyche has both poles (perhaps it would be best if the mind worked as a balanced whole), but in general one pole tends to dominate. The main source of the problems between men and women (not that I'm generalizing) is that guys tend to be predominately square and girls circular.

Or let me put it in the words of a beleaguered, confused high school friend fresh from being toyed with: "Girls are psycho, man."

A guy's circular side, his intuitional apparatus, if you will, is relatively small. One might think of it as a behind-the-scenes operator, always influencing decisions but rarely acknowledged, much less respected, in the light of the conscious mind. A guy's tendency (whether this results from nature or nurture is anybody's guess) is to think that he should look at a situation objectively and argue his points logically. He wants to talk about the facts as he perceives them, not his feelings about the facts. And let's face it, since men have pretty much dominated Western civilization for centuries, this model has become the paradigm, a situation which has resulted in the unfortunate need many women feel to "liberate" themselves from some of the most fundamental aspects of their nature.

A girl's circular side is like the 500 pound gorilla; it sleeps wherever it wants to. Where a guy's emotions are like currents and eddies that push his boat from side to side, a girl's are like the moon to the tides (that the moon has monthly cycles is no coincidence, methinks). Where a guy's capacity for connection has boundaries, a girl's is as deep as the soul itself. Girls perceive the world very differently than guys. They are like psychic weathervanes, sensitive to the subtly shifting winds of human feeling to a degree that tends to mystify men. Women live life below the surface, where every word and look speaks a hidden message, where the emotional vibrations that two people send each other are as important as the words they speak. This can be a source of joy or anxiety, this resonance they have with psychic reverberations, but it is powerful either way.

This is not to say that a woman's circular side limits her square side or that a man's square side limits his circular side; however, the unfortunate reality is that a man's square side will try to limit the mysterious circular side of his mate, and vice versa.

The old stereotype that "guys are afraid to talk about their feelings" has some truth, but it must be pointed out that maybe feelings aren't busting to get out of guys like they are for girls. Guys like to be straight up with each other; they tend to fear, or at least be uncomfortable dwelling on, the subtle body language and... well... vibes that girls are so fluent in (here, again, you could argue whether this fluency is genetically or culturally imposed). I've noticed that a lot of women like to make fun of "male bonding," trying to characterize it as simplistic, macho, and hormone-based. That's just because men tend to find a connection more simply than women, who must always be conscious of ulterior meanings and motives... if the person who is talking to you is carefully paddling your emotional streams to avoid hitting any of your rocks, how do you know what they really think? (Note: if that last sentence sounds a little down on women, excuse me. I certainly don't intend it that way, but hey, I'm a guy, and I'm just as clueless as any guy about females, you know?)

Okay, back to the love thing: Guys are supposed to be macho, strong, stoic... the hunters, right? When you're in love, you pretty much have to show your guts. Well, trying to be a big strong stud dude and having someone ask to examine your guts can be alternately angering and bewildering for a guy. Some guys feed on it like their mother's breast milk; it feels like coming home for them and they become slaves to it. For some, opening up their guts for somebody else to care for is like having somebody jerk their shorts down at a public pool. Love, which involves so much surrender, so much exposure, so much risk—and which is so often beyond the power of the square male psyche—scares a lot of guys to the point of fouling their britches, and don't let their back-slapping, genital-scratching, chest-beating, "bitch"-saying, breast-gawking, sex-obsessing posturing fool you.

BUT, and it's a big but, don't think that women escape blame for the screwed up state of affairs. Women tend to avoid the ego-bolstering competition that men seem so fascinated by (hey, how about those Cowboys?), being more nurturing by nature (generalization number what?). I don't say this in the condescending way that it might sound—it is a platitude that is directed towards feminists frequently to justify some pretty ridiculous assumptions—all I mean is that women tend towards what should be a natural relationship between the sexes: one of care and support. They have a deep need to care for and to be cared for.

However, their circular psyche may occasionally lead them in circles. Many women receive great joy by making others happy (an exquisitely beautiful and vulnerable quality), but their instinct can blind them and lead them to grasp at straws. The reason that so many women characterize men as "pigs" (aside from the obvious) is that they want so badly to believe they have found a good thing that they frequently deceive themselves. Often, guys are somewhat unwitting pawns in this game, simply be-bopping along in their usual clueless fashion, little knowing that they are lead actors in a girl's fantasy play and rarely getting their lines right. (Before I get lynched, I must admit that this situation obviously happens to both sexes.)

In other words, a woman's need to be in a close, caring relationship can blind her and lead her into goofy patterns of behavior ranging from slightly irrational to downright psychotic. I mean, we had some chick over here beside Carnegie the other night trying to beat the hell out of a group of football players because her boyfriend had chosen to hang out with them instead of her. And girls wonder why guys are scared of commitment! I don't know about guys in general, but I personally am terrified of the boundless depths of emotion that can cause a girl to do things that I wouldn't do on PCP.

Okay, so the cultural practices and attitudes that have developed around the experience of love cause as much pain as pleasure, they prevent love as often as they foster it, they obscure communication as much as they encourage it, etc., etc., etc. It doesn't matter, and I'll tell you why: love is just like religion (I promise, that's my last generalization). Though they both are sullied by ignorance and hypocrisy, both are unavoidably powerful.

Both originate with an experience—an intense sense of complete participation. A religious experience involves a feeling that one's entire self has been touched by divine presence, that the essence of divinity and one's own essence are so intertwined that they are no longer distinguishable. The initial experience of love is equally transforming; it is the sense that one's soul has quite suddenly been connected to another's, that one's psychic health suddenly involves two lives instead of one. Both experiences are striking in their contrast to our more customary state of separation. Both involve a somewhat frightening self-examination. Both have saved lives and both have destroyed them.

So there you have it: all the clumsy, frustrating groping we endure up to and away from the moment can never destroy the moment. When you sit with your lover under the glow of a candle, in free contact with one another like curious children, when restraint finally seems pointless, and the feeling that you are communicating your innermost thoughts without speaking holds you to one another's eyes like deer in headlights... well, that's why you live, you know? That's what makes you alive. Moments like that. With a little effort and a little trust, moments like that can sustain a love forever. Or they can sustain it for a night. Love is subject to disease and death; it is connected to that peculiar mix of physical, intellectual, and spiritual chemistry that gives it birth. Everything changes, always.

Regretfully, such moments are made rare by the weirdly passive-aggressive attitude our society has towards love. One only need watch a night of television to see that love has been made either maudlin or tawdry, and sex doubly so.

We live in a peculiar time. Women are through taking s**t. Ethnic minorities are through taking s**t. Handicapped people are through taking s**t. Fate people are through taking s**t. Rush Limbaugh and his followers are through taking s**t. Rich people are through taking s**t. Poor people are through taking s**t. Young people are through taking s**t. Nevertheless, in this, yet another great age of giving-s**t-in-the-name-of-not-taking-it, we overlook that tiny minority that gets the most s**t of all: lovers. On February 14, remember them. Try to create an atmosphere of openness and honesty. Awaken yourself to the possibility of love, but don't try to force it. Above all: don't forget that freedom and love are equally important, but they needn't conflict.

Sorry, kids, I sort of wrote a novel. Thanks to the three of you who finished this. C-ya next time, and remember: love is rare, and so it should be. Tolerance and respect are as plentiful as you make them. Peace.

TO THE VIRGINS, TO WAKE MUCH OF TIME

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day
To-morrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the Sun,
The higher he's a-getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first,
When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst,
Time still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time;
And while ye may, go marry;
For having lost but once your prime,
You may forever tarry.

For me to profane it;
One feeling too falsely disdained
For thee to disdain it;
One hope is too like despair
For prudence to smother;
And pity from thee more dear
Than that from another.

Increased student fees OK'd by MC board

by Karen Beatty
Assistant Editor

Students should expect to see slightly higher figures when billing statements go out this summer.

A 7.49 percent total increase in tuition, room, and board was approved by the board in the January meeting of the Maryville College Board of Directors.

The breakdown of the 7.49 percent increase is the combined total of a nine percent increase in tuition, a five percent increase in room rates, and a three percent increase in meal costs.

The numbers translate into an increase of $1,084 for the full board resident student. The total cost for a Maryville College student (living and eating on campus) next year is expected to be $15,558 — up from $14,474 for the 1993-94 school year.

The approved increase for next year is the lowest of the past three years which ranges from 15 percent for the 1991-92 school year to 7.8 percent for the 1993-94 year.

Maryville College Vice President and Treasurer Alden Stuart estimates that the cost increase will generate slightly more than $400,000 for the upcoming year.

"We wanted to provide for scholarships," said Stuart. "Forty percent of [money generated by increase] will go into scholarships. Most of the remainder will go toward faculty and staff increases. They were given no increases this

Phonathon goes beyond goals, sets record

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

More than $120,000 was raised for the Maryville College Annual Fund by students and alumni during the 1994 phonathon.

Over the course of eight evenings, 147 students and alumni completed 3,190 calls to alumni, parents, and friends of the college, bringing in a total of $129,944.50.

Jane Gilbert, the director of alumni and parents programs, spearheaded the operation. "I'm truly impressed and overwhelmed with student dedication," said Gilbert.

Senior Will Richardson, one of the top student callers, raised $5,385. "It was really an example of a group effort," he said.

The efforts of the phonathon volunteers and staff brought about an increase in the average gift, and surpassed the goal set at the beginning of the event. (Callers reached 118 percent of the goal.)

The phonathon was conducted on the first floor of Willard House, where a special bank of twenty phones was set up for the students to make their calls. The advancement staff worked out of another room, filing and processing a large amount of paperwork each night. They kept a running total of pledges made and offered support and encouragement in many other ways.

"The advancement staff did an amazing job, and I would like to thank them for their efforts above and beyond the call of duty," said Gilbert.

In eight nights of calling, 1,407 pledges were made from across the country. Students participating were awarded prizes for netting the most pledges received and dollars pledged. Campus organizations also competed for the top total of pledges received and dollars pledged. The Church and College Scholars won with 719 pledges and $41,192. The Fellowship of Christian Athletes (FCA) came in second with 151 pledges and $12,570. The Student Programming Board (SPB) came in third with 142 pledges and $8,630.

The actual calling was memorable in itself for many participants. Some student volunteers came in early to call alumni from the classes of the 1920s and 1930s. Responses ranged from friendly conversation about the college, to people hanging up at the mention of Maryville College. The majority of the alumni

FIPSE plan could add a whole new dimension to Student Activities

by Lance Klosterman
Staff Writer

If Maryville College were to receive $250,000, where would it go?

That is essentially the question the people at the Fund for the Improvement of Post Secondary Education (FIPSE) are asking Cheri Torres. FIPSE is supporting proactive prevention of drug and alcohol usage on campuses across the nation by granting each selected institution up to $250,000 over two years. Student Wellness Force and Torres, the organization's advisor, are responsible for writing a proposal explaining a comprehensive, institution-wide program designed to shift the social environment away from drugs and alcohol on campus.

"They're looking to fund 100 proposals. Last year 95 out of 275 proposals were accepted. That's better than one in three, and the average grant was $110,000," said Torres. "We are applying for $196,500 this year and $53,500 next year."

If the college is selected to receive the money, the only requirement the college has to meet is to follow through with what the proposal states. The proposal is a four part plan aimed at changing the social life on campus so students have options for fun other than those that are drug and alcohol-related.

The proposal includes four programs:

1. The Community Exploration Program is designed to bring faculty and students together outside the classroom. This section of the proposal is asking for money to purchase three vans next year and two vans the year after. The vans could be used for anything from a trip to a Braves game in Atlanta to conferences that certain groups would want attend.

"The idea is to make them available to student groups first," said Sue Wyatt, vice president of student development. "As long as they invite a faculty or staff member, they would get the van free of charge."

"The purpose is to get more community interaction and provide an expansion of activities of things to do for fun," stated Torres.

2. "The Club" at Fayerweather Hall would provide a central location on campus designed specifically to establish an effective social environment that is drug and alcohol-free. This money would be used to turn Isaac's into a non-alcoholic bar, grill and coffee house. A deli with various foods that students would like to buy is also in the proposal. Money would also be used to build a dance floor and purchase a movie screen for the third floor. Additional meeting rooms could also be constructed for student groups. Programming would include comedians, musicians, dances, and perhaps getting the faculty involved with poetry slams and other academically stimulating programs.

"I am determined to have a late night Isaac's . . . some place for people to go," said Wyatt.

3. Expansion of the Mountain Challenge Program would include doubling the gear and equipment and doubling the trips. Currently, Mountain Challenge trips fill up very quickly and leave some students on waiting lists for future trips.

4. The Student Community Program is designed to build community and foster spirit in the residence halls.

"There will be a fund of money available for residence halls or a community of students to do programs that build a sense of identity and bonding within our community," said Torres.

"It is a pool of money . . . where students can come in with program ideas and request funds. This will help the students do what the students want to do. This will take student activities and programming to a whole new level," said Wyatt.

The proposal must be mailed to Washington D.C. by March 25. Results should be received by mid-July.

"There has been an overwhelming response and great amount of enthusiasm. Even if we don't get the funding, we will make progress, regardless," stated Wyatt.

NFL players visiting on campus this summer

NFL superstars Craig Colquitt and Fuad Reveziz will hold their sixth annual Kicking and Punting School at Maryville College from July 7-9.

Colquitt was an All-SEC punter for the University of Tennessee in 1976-77. He also was the punter for the Pittsburgh Steelers and his career included Super Bowl victories in 1978 and 1979.

Reveziz, a former University of Tennessee place kicker, is a nine-year NFL veteran and is now one of the premier place kickers in the league. He played for the Miami Dolphins and is presently kicking for the Minnesota Vikings.

The two NFL stars will be running the instructional camp with emphasis on fundamentals in all phases of the kicking game. Their objective is to develop and improve each camper's skills by providing a three-day blend of video analysis, one-on-one attention, practice, drill work, and competition.

The camp is for ages 10-18.

For additional information call the football staff at 981-8281.

MC Concert Choir to perform

The Maryville College Concert Choir will perform its Homecoming Concert in the Music Hall of the FAC Friday, March 25, at 8 p.m. The public is invited to attend.

The Concert Choir is a competitively chosen touring choir. This year's spring tour takes the group through parts of Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, and Georgia.

The complete program includes a cappella and accompanied sacred and secular music. Part I features sacred music by Pitoni, Byrd, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, Rachmanioff, Durufle, Thompson, Berger, and Nyustedt. Part II features madrigals by Farmer and Vautor, three spirituals — "Let Me Fly," "precious Lord, Take My Hand," and "Ain't Got Time to Die" — novelty pieces about cats by Rossini and Copland, and a medley from the Broadway hit "CATS." The program closes with the Lutkin Benediction, a long-standing tradition in which all Maryville College choir alumni are invited to participate. The particular pieces to be performed are selected in accordance with the local occasion.

The Concert Choir is directed by Dr. Daniel Taddie, Chair of the Division of Fine Arts, and Sheila Hunter, Professor of Music.

The Concert Choir consists of 28 members, all of whom were selected by audition.

contacted were interested in the college and how it was functioning, and some students found themselves talking for 20 or 30 minutes to alumni.

"I spoke to many alumni and we had a lot of fun comparing the past with the present," said sophomore Beckie Heckler.

The overall attitude of the alumni was one of support. "I was impressed by the fact that alumni were willing to support the college despite the many changes that have occurred since they were here," said Dr. Fred Burkey, vice president for advancement. "We deeply appreciate the very positive response from our alumni."

Heckler, along with Lydia Cobb, worked as co-captains in charge of recruiting students to work the phones. "There is no way any other group could have done it," said Gilbert. "I'm deeply grateful."

Telephone Services ready to help with crossed signals

by Josh Hogan and Sharon Rena Graves
Staff Writers

Reach out and touch someone—but for Maryville College students and people trying to contact them, it's a lot easier said than done.

There have been some concerns expressed among students about problems with their telephone services. What should they do if they are having problems with their telephones? What if a person cannot receive off-campus calls or place a long distance call? These questions have been asked and are proof that some students are worrying about emergency calls, whether an emergency call is coming in or if one is trying to place an emergency call from his dormitory room. The person to contact about these concerns is Brenda Binder in Telephone Services.

Since 1989 Maryville has had its own switch which, as Binder explains, means "we literally have our own phone company." Telephone Services directs all on-campus and local calls through 38 trunks. Trunks are essentially lines used by a phone service to direct calls. Of these 38 trunks, 12 are known as DID, or Direct Inward Dial trunks. These trunks handle only incoming calls. The other 26 are known as Combination trunks. They can receive and send out calls. Long distance calls, made through MCI, are handled by 24 T1 cards.

Since we are essentially our own phone company, we are responsible for keeping up our own telephone service. And, of course, problems can arise. These problems can be solved, however. For instance, it is very possible that all 24 T1 cards could be tied up at once causing one to have to wait to place his or her long distance call. It is also possible for all of our trunks to be tied up at once, but this should not last long because of the high turnover rate. To help this situation, Telephone Services runs trunk activity studies every hour on the hour to make sure we do not need anymore trunks. When all trunks are tied up, callers receive busy signals.

"I did not know that there was a problem with the phone giving off a busy-line signal. No one has ever come to me about this problem, directly. The last I heard of a problem such as this was once or twice within the last four months. There is a possibility that the trunks could be tied, but with the number of trunks this school has, it is rare that it should get overloaded," said Binder.

Binder also added that if people are having recurring busy signal problems, they need to notify her as soon as possible. If there is a major problem with busy signals, she needs to know in order to determine the problem. If the college needs more trunks, she can be aware of that only if she is aware that people are having problems with their calls.

"If students are having a true emergency, they should call security on campus or dial 9-9-1-1," said Binder. "An individual calling on to the campus has more than one route to go in the case of an emergency. An individual has two main numbers to call—SMOD or security. These two numbers allow emergency calls to come through at all times."

Binder said she wants all students on campus to be pleased with their telephone services. "If you are experiencing any kind of trouble with your telephone, please call me at extension 8143. If I do not answer directly, please leave a message on my voice mail. Please do not hang up. I check all phone problems that students or faculty present to me, and I do follow-ups on all phone problems," said Binder.

"Odyssey of the Mind" promotes solving problems creatively

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

On March 12, the population of Maryville College will more than double.

Nearly 900 students are expected to attend a regional tournament of "Odyssey of the Mind (OM)," a worldwide creative problem solving competition for kindergartners through college students.

Vandy Beard Kemp, the director of the Maryville College Learning Center, explained the "Odyssey of the Mind" program. A school that wants to participate needs at least seven students and at least two volunteer coaches and judges willing to work as a team. The group registers with the National OM in New Jersey. They then need to register on a state level, and attend coaches' training sessions as well as regional, state, and international tournaments.

The program originated during the late 1970s in New Jersey. It soon spread nation-wide as well as world-wide. Alcoa Middle School was the first school in Blount County to implement an OM program. Although college teams do participate, none will be at Maryville's regional tournament.

Each OM group trains extensively, working both on being able to think creatively as a team, as well as working on solutions to specific problems. The teams work on six problems (see box).

During the competitions, each team is given one of these six problems. After each team finds a solution to its problem, it is given another problem of which it has no previous knowledge.

Kemp stresses the benefit of the team's preparation in solving this spontaneous problem. Even though members of the group have not had the opportunity to work on the problem beforehand, they will be able to work together to find a creative solution because of their combined practice.

The events will be taking place in Sutton Science Center, the Fine Arts Center, Wilson Chapel, and the physical education building. Kemp said she urges any interested person to come and observe.

PROBLEMS TO BE SOLVED IN "ODYSSEY"

MTV (Mini Terrain Vehicles). The team must design, build, and run at least three vehicles to achieve certain tasks. The vehicles must overcome a number of difficulties.

OM — Believable Music. The team must design at least three devices that, when combined, will play a tune.

Furs, Fins, & Feathers. The team must present a humorous skit about the life of an animal from its point of view.

Classics... "The Iliad." The team will perform one scene from Homer's "Iliad" which must be chosen from a given list. In addition, the team will present a twentieth century historical event that will incorporate one or more god or goddesses from the previous "Iliad" scene.

Set It Free. The team must build a structure of balsa wood and glue. The design must allow for a ping pong ball to be placed inside the structure and must support the ball as weight is being placed on the structure. The design must allow the ball to drop when the structure breaks.

Masquerade Party. The team performs a scene about a masquerade party. (This category is open to elementary school students only.)

Career Day '94 offers career opportunities

by Karen Beaty
Assistant Editor

On March 3, Maryville College's Office of Career Services will be holding its annual "Career Day" in the Proffitt Dining Room and alcove of Pearsons Hall.

"Career Day is a time when representatives from fields of employment come to campus to show students what's out there for them in the different careers," explained Jane Richardson, director of Career Services.

Richardson said that although some students are interviewed on

"It's good networking for students. They can meet people and have names when they are ready to begin the job search."

Richardson

Career Day by employers looking for graduates, the main emphasis of the event is education. "It's good networking for students. They can meet people and have names when they are ready to begin the job search," she said.

Thirty-three organizations are committed to Career Day '94. Six are planning interviews. Among those businesses interviewing include: American Rug Company, Tennessee State Environment and Conservation Department, and the Marines.

Richardson said that while all of the representatives are eager to talk to students, it doesn't always mean that they are eager to offer job interviews.

"This is not a job fair. Students should come with the perception that Career Day is to help them understand how their majors could help them in major job opportunities," she said. The director also said that students might be surprised to find out the correlations between majors and careers of the representatives.

Richardson advised students to dress nicely, especially seniors who are looking to enter the job market. The director also said that bringing resumes and portfolios is acceptable, but advised that students don't offer them unless asked.

Career Day '94 is open to all Maryville College students. In past years, Richardson said that she has noticed that student participation is equally distributed among the four classes.

"This is a real opportunity for all students to get into touch with the working world," she said.

Students can talk to the professional representatives from 11:30 a.m. — 1:30 p.m.

Characters Brian and Beverly, played by cast members Michael Hatcher and Julie Walker, discuss the dynamics of love and life in Michael Cristofer's "The Shadow Box."

Dramatists open "The Shadow Box" Thursday

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

"We've really enjoyed working on this show," Dr. Jill Bergeron said. The director glanced at the cast of Maryville College's spring main stage production of "The Shadow Box" and smiled. The actors and crew were taking the last few minutes before rehearsal officially began to practice lines, gather props, and adjust costumes as they tried to avoid the rain leaking through the ceiling.

"Places!" Bergeron called.

Within seconds, the cast began its transformation from students to characters of all ages struggling with the realities of life and death.

This Pulitzer Prize-winning script was written by Michael Cristofer. Set on the grounds of a hospital in California, the play deals with the experiences of three families, each of which has a member who is dying of a terminal illness.

"I think it's taught us to cherish what we've got," said Bergeron. Indeed, the play does speak more about living every day to the fullest and facing the unknown without the fear of dying.

"We've gotten really close working on this play," Bergeron added. "And, we've had some very interesting philosophical discussions."

Cast members include Melody Alexander, Nancy Allen, Andrea Brutscher, Michael Hatcher, Scott Kiser, Eisha Neely, Erin Rice, Julie Walker, and Mike Wilson. Brian Prather and Tiffany Rudicil are stage managers.

"The Shadow Box" will be presented 8 p.m., March 3-5. Admission is free to all students upon presentation of the college I.D.

building of Davis, Copeland, and Gamble, and the renovations of other facilities—were financed largely through bonds issues that entail long-term pay-back.

"Our debt ratio is really not that low compared to other colleges our size," Stuart added.

When budgeting for next year, Stuart and the Presidential Advisory Council's subcommittee on budget priorities figured dollar allocation based on this year's enrollment.

An increase in enrollment would give his office extra money to spend on items such as: deferred maintenance, the restoration of departmental budgets, and safety facilities.

"If we can get more students, I think we can do really well," Stuart said in relation to budget. "And, I don't see how the college will need to keep increasing the costs if the enrollment grows," he added.

MARRIOTT WORKERS PRAISED . . .

I wanted to write a letter to the editor of the Echo earlier this year but haven't done it, as you obviously know. This is better late than never, though.

I would like to commend the staff of the Marriot food service for their efforts "above and beyond the call of duty" during the heavy storms in January. I think all students, staff and faculty should be aware of the lengths that some of these fine people went to to keep the cafeteria open. Even though the weather was extreme enough to force the school to close down (and during the January term, closing for even one day is a more drastic step than it would be during the semester), the cafeteria staff worked so that students stranded on campus had no break in their meal service. My understanding is that this was not accomplished easily, but only because some of the staff of the cafeteria slept at school, rather than risk going home and being unable to return to school the next day. I think that shows an amazing dedication to their work and deserves the highest praise! Anyone can say what they wish about the food service throughout the year, but I hope those same people who might badmouth certain aspects of the service will at least realize what an exceptionally devoted and caring staff works there, and how grateful we all should be for their efforts in a very difficult situation.

-Kelly Franklin, Director of CELL

BASKETBALL ATTENDANCE . . .

As a basketball player, I want to express my extreme gratitude to the Highland Echo for the recent article on basketball game attendance in years' past and to the students, especially a certain group of football players, who have turned out in the past two months for the women's games. It is so much more exciting when there is a loud and rowdy crowd enjoying our games, cheering for the spectacular plays, and giving the referees a hard time rather than just nine girls on the bench trying to generate enthusiasm for the players on the floor. Don't get me wrong—we greatly appreciate faculty, staff, and parental support; but let's all face it, they are not near as outrageous, crazy, or downright bold as students can be. I just can't picture Dr. Wyatt and my mother standing up and chanting "hey, hey, hey—goodbye!" to an opposing player who has just fouled out. So, thanks again to all those who have been attending. And for those who haven't been to one of our games, you'll see some lively action both on the court and in the stands.

Sincerely,
Laura Ellis

RECOGNITION OF PRESIDENT'S DAY . . .

Dear Editor,

I think it is a sad state of affairs when an institute of higher learning such as Maryville College or any other. American institution values the Martin Luther King, Jr. holiday over Presidents' Day and George Washington's birthday. This may seem like a trivial issue, but it's one worth looking into.

Martin Luther King, Jr. did much to advance the civil rights movement for blacks in America. There is no disputing that. And he did it in a very honorable and admirable way, shunning violent methods and instead choosing peaceful protests. His death was certainly a tragedy.

But is the death of one leader of greater importance than honoring the highest position in this land and our first leader? President's day is set aside to honor all U.S. Presidents, past and present. And there have been many great men who have served this country proudly in this all-important, respectable position. Specially noted and celebrated on this same day is the birth of our first holder of the executive office, George Washington.

Surely the sum of all the Presidents of this great democracy and the birth of our first President demand more notice and respect than the birth of one civil rights leader. So next year I hope the administration will consider giving us President's Day off in addition to or instead of the Martin Luther King, Jr. holiday.

Sincerely,
Aaron Sentell

Winter weather saps energy budget

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

How easy it is for students to forget about money when turning on a light switch or taking a shower. But the reality is that the annual bill for electricity, natural gas, water and sewer, wood, and oil for Maryville College runs into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. And with one more month of winter remaining, the physical plant has already spent its budgeted allocation of dollars.

Although the college must meet students' energy needs, it sometimes has trouble finding reliable energy sources.

For example, in the last three years the college has been unable to get an adequate supply of wood during the winter months. During the recent ice storm the remaining wood froze. As a result, Maryville College Physical Plant Director Andy McCall had to make the decision to use oil, putting them over this year's budget. He said he is urging students to be aware of their energy usage, and asks that they conserve whenever possible.

"I realize that there's not one particular thing an individual can do [to conserve] but every little thing can add up if everyone is cooperating," said McCall. He said he would like to see resident directors encourage residents to cut back on energy consumption. And, he said he feels organizations such as the Environmental Club and the Environmental Concern Committee are doing a good job of bringing conservation to students' attention.

McCall broke down last year's budget as follows: The college was allowed (and approximately used) $265,000 for electricity, $32,000 for natural gas, $84,000 for water and sewer, $45,000 for wood, and $5,000 for gas. In addition, it costs the college approximately $10,000 annually to dispose of garbage.

The electric bill pays for indoor and outdoor lighting, air conditioning, major mechanical pumps and fans, on top of the wattage used for personal conveniences such as hair dryers and computers.

In 1982, the college remodeled the boiler system and switched to burning wood as an energy source. MC spends five times less now than they would (and did) burning coal, oil, and gas.

In the winter natural gas is used to heat water for showers as well as domestic uses such as heating students' rooms.

The residence area of Pearsons is heated solely by electricity. All of the other residence halls are heated by wood. McCall says that this came about while Pearsons was being rebuilt after it burned in 1972. It was during the oil embargo, and the college chose electricity as the most efficient and economical alternative. McCall says that this has not been the case — the residence area of Pearsons is, in fact, an "energy hog."

Not singling Pearsons out, McCall suggested that all residents of all residence halls do the following things to eliminate energy waste:

□ Turn off the lights, heat/air-conditioning, and unused appliances when leaving the room.

□ Turn off unused lights in the building—i.e. lights in the lounge, lobbies, parlors and bathrooms. (McCall did make the distinction between necessary lights—those left on for safety reasons—and those not crucial for passage into rooms and buildings.)

□ Be aware of hot water usage. Showers are not meant to be saunas. Water does not need to run while brushing teeth.

□ Close windows when leaving a room for an extended period of time.

□ In the summer, "don't make rooms an icebox."

□ Report maintenance

problems as quickly as possible. "In a lot of the problems I see, we're wasting energy by not correcting the maintenance problem," McCall said. He emphasized that such things as leaky faucets can make a difference in a water bill.

However, McCall's staff is limited and must prioritize its tasks. For example, recently they had to spend most of a day taking care of a residence hall's sink which had been ripped out of the wall by a student. That left little time to do anything else.

In the near future, McCall hopes to make improvements to the physical plant facilities of the campus that would save money in the long run.

"I would like to apply for an energy grant to convert Pearsons to another energy system," said McCall. "And I would like to turn over our [privately] owned electric system to the Maryville Utility Department."

Going places with Gevin

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

Valentine's day has come and gone, and my budget won't allow me to go to the movies as often as I'd like to, I decided to write about something that I realized I know nothing about.

On Feb. 5th I had a date. I know you're saying "HE had a date!"

"Who's crazy enough to go out with HIM!" Well a very beautiful, intelligent young lady took enough time out of her busy schedule to indulge me for a day (okay I've sucked up to her enough!).

When I first realized I actually had a date, a few thoughts came to my mind; I had no idea where we were going to go and what we were going to do, and I haven't been on a date in four years. I'm not saying that I've been sheltered for the past four years, but I have been occupied. The first two years were spent with a fiancée and the other two years have been occupied with college. I have been "out" with females, but they haven't been dates.

Now my definition of a date may be a little different from everyone else's definition. I believe a date is two people mutually agreeing to go out and do something in the hopes that romantic relations may begin. Obviously, I had no idea what to do to get romantic relations started between my date and myself. Now that I've studied the psychology of dating I can give everybody a few hints as to what to do and how to do it, so that if it doesn't work out at least you've got a new friend.

The first thing I did was ask her what she wanted to do. The conversation turned into some "Abbott and Costello" type scene where the question was given back to me, then to her, then to me, then... you get the picture.

We decided upon the atypical "dinner and a movie. I'm curious as to why people want to go to the movies for a date. If the two of you are busy watching the movie, how are you going to find time to get to know each other. What if he/she likes the movie and you don't, you might end up in your first argument. The movies are fine if that's what you're in to, but how can romantic relations begin in a dark theater, where no one is paying attention to you or your date... I'll skip that. The dinner part sounded wonderful, but the dilemma arose as to where we would go. Once again a rhetorical conversation began and we decided that we would just go anywhere that we all (I asked her best friend to come along too) agreed on.

As fate would have it, she had to work during the day and I had to work at night so we only had a few hours to do whatever it was that we were going to do. The movie was tossed out the window (Yes!) and we decided to shop. If you ever want to really get to know a person, GO SHOPPING WITH THEM! When you shop with someone you immediately learn their likes and dislikes and you find out if you can tolerate all the little quirks that they might have. It was refreshing to shop with a woman and know that I didn't have to buy her anything (not saying that if she would have asked, I would have been more than willing. So chivalry is not dead!). We such had a good time just talking and shopping that we went to the movies the next day (friend included). We saw Philadelphia and everyone cried. I'll review it in my next At the Movies column.

All in all this "date" was very successful and I'll probably ask her out again, sometime soon. If anyone has a better definition of a date or better ideas for great dates I'd love to hear them, send them to the editor's box and we'll be sure to respond. C-YA

The renovation of Thaw in 1986 improved library storage and added offices to the second floor.

Thaw Hall filled with stories

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

One of the most frequently used buildings on campus, Thaw Hall has housed everything from a sewing shop to maintenance offices. But the name it carries lends itself to interest beyond the function of the building.

Built in the years between 1920 and 1924, Thaw Hall was contracted by Graf and Sons, and used student carpenters to help construct the building. The building was named in honor of William Thaw (1818-1889), a major benefactor to the college who helped in the college's recovery efforts after the Civil War. Upon his death, his wife, Mary C. Thaw, donated a large amount of money that facilitated the construction of Thaw Hall. Construction cost a total of $154,000. Mary originally intended the building to house a dining hall. Plans included the main floor to be the dining room and the rear of the building to be the kitchen. Mary wanted the structure to serve as a dining hall even though the college had no need for another one.

Thaw contains many elements of the Greek Revival movement of the 1890s. The parapet end walls have double false chimneys. The main entrance is made of concrete and limestone that supports the well-known three-story fluted Corinthian columns. The end porches on both sides of Thaw are three double-high Romanesque arches.

By 1921, preparatory classes filled the classrooms on the second floor. After preparatory instruction was phased out of Maryville College in 1925, the psychology and education, modern language, political and social sciences, and history departments moved into Thaw.

By 1924, the Lamar Memorial Library (housed in the CCM) was too small for the growing number of books and publications being retained, so the library moved into Thaw's first floor. Back rooms were used for the home economics practice house and the YMCA meeting space.

"For a great long time, the library portion was bigger than the library needed. . . There were faculty studios, and offices for the 'Highland Echo' and 'Chilhowean' were housed on the main floor," said Joan Worley, library director. She added that art exhibits were frequently held in the large amount of unused space the library had.

Later, the basement was used for campus maintenance. Worley sketched a picture of how maintenance would drive down ramps to the basement level. "What used to be the drive-thru is the AV(audio-visual) room and the library archives," said Worley.

Until 1986, the college infirmary was located in the back rooms of the library after being moved from the Ralph Max Lamar Memorial Hospital (now the International House).

Worley said the College Maid Shop was also housed in the library. Because women of the college were not permitted to work on the college farm, the effort was made to give women on campus useful employment to help them pay for education costs. The women in the group made many garments that were sold all over the country. Worley emphasized the significance of their name—it was "maid," but it seemed like it should have been "made." "Made was their label," said Worley.

Probably the most intriguing feature of Thaw is in its name. Harry Kendall Thaw, one of William and Mary Thaw's ten children, was an interesting figure.

Harry Thaw married Evelyn Nesbitt, a showgirl that had left another man, Stanford White, for Thaw. On June 25, 1906, Thaw and his wife were attending a play at Madison Square Garden. White was also at the play. Thaw, who was said to have a major jealous streak, rose from his seat, went to White's table, and shot him point blank in the head three times. The scene was portrayed in the movie "Ragtime."

After the murder, Thaw pleaded insanity. His mother, Mary, spent millions in his defense, even getting a medium to testify that Thaw's deceased father approved of the action taken by Thaw. Thaw stayed in the New York State Asylum for the Criminally Insane until 1915,

College infirmary now the I-House

People from all over the world have visited Maryville College's International House, formerly known as the Ralph Max Lamar Memorial Hospital.

Built in 1910, the building was constructed in memory of Thomas Jefferson Lamar's son.

With the nearest hospital miles away, the college infirmary served the students' health needs. There was no Park Med Walk-in Clinic, no Blount Memorial Hospital.

"The college had a registered nurse who lived there with her family," said Professor Arthur Bushing, a former instructor at MC.

If a student got sick or slightly injured, he or she would walk over to the clinic and get the care needed from the nurse. He noted that the nurse's daughter succeeded her.

Bushing added: "A doctor would come every morning who would come by and see students."

(One of the women in the family, according to Bushing, became the wife of Dr. Earl Crawford, the man responsible for selling Crawford House to the college.)

The infirmary stayed in the Ralph Max Lamar Memorial Hospital until the 1970s. It was later moved to Thaw Hall, and later completely phased out in the 1980s.

The hospital building, unused, fell into some disrepair until the 1988-89 school years, when it was renovated into classrooms and offices for the Center for English Language and Learning (CELL).

The building was renamed the International House after the renovation. Today, upwards of 70 international students—almost 10% of the campus population—use the building on a daily basis, taking classes Monday thru Friday, 8 a.m.-3 p.m.

The building at night provides students with many study rooms and also has a kitchen for students who want to cook their country's foods. It serves as a gathering place for international students and American students, fostering more communication between nationalities.

Many changes have altered the former infirmary's appearance.

was released for one year, and readmitted. In 1922, he was re-released.

In his autobiography, "The Terror of Tellico Plains," Ray H. Jenkins writes of the young Thaw visiting MC. According to Jenkins, Thaw received preferential treatment, such as smoking in front of President Samuel Tyndale Wilson when smoking was against school policy.

Thaw Hall underwent renovations in 1986, changing some classrooms to offices on the second floor and expanding the library from the main floor to the basement and putting a mezzanine in the rear to house bound periodicals.

"There had been fluorescent hanging down to eight feet from the floor, so the beauty of the ceiling was hidden," said Worley. After the renovation, Worley said: "We had students come in and say, 'You have a whole new ceiling,' when in actuality, the ceiling was the same one that had always been there."

Baseball Scots begin season with hopes for the national tournament

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College Baseball Team, led by Coach Eric Etchison, is prepared and anxiously awaiting its Friday opener against Adrian, MI.

The Scots enter the contest with only six returnees, but a very talented group of freshmen that is expected to contribute to the program.

Adrian will come into the game with 10 games already under its belt. Last year, the Scots defeated Adrian, but are expecting their opponents to travel south well prepared this season.

David Forster, sophomore pitcher and first baseman, said he expects big things for this '94 season. He said the team goal is to win at least 25 of the 37 games and go on to play in the national tournament. Forster said that he is very optimistic about the team's potential. "With our pitching staff and hitting, I feel sorry for any team we play," he said.

At the start-up, the '94 season does look to be a successful and exciting one.

The team opens the season against Adrian at the baseball field, 2 p.m. March 4.

MC's new stadium will make the Baseball Scot's home games more comfortable and safe.

New stadium ready for Baseball Scots' season opener

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

This year, fans of the Maryville College Baseball Team can leave their lawnchairs, blankets, and pickup trucks at home. Finally, safe and comfortable bleachers have been provided for spectators following America's favorite game.

Funds for the facility were donated by the Maryville community, with Anderson Lumber Company being the major contributor.

The facility is near completion and should be ready for use in time for the season opener March 4.

Head Coach Eric Etchison said he feels that the construction should rank the college's baseball facilities in the top five of the South region.

Student support at home should be boosted, as well as attendance and support from the Maryville community. Etchison also said that he hopes the bleachers will aid in recruiting local players for the Scots' program. Another bonus, according to the coach, is the possibility of MC hosting future tournaments.

A name for the facility has not been decided, but will be chosen at a later date.

The new facility can be put to the test at 2 p.m. Friday in the Scots' season opener against Adrian, MI.

Lady Scots receive tournament bid, play this Saturday

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

The Lady Scots won a bye in the NCAA Division III Tournament Feb. 26, and will appear in the competition for their fourth consecutive year. They end regular season play with a record of 22-3.

The women played Berea College's Lady Mountaineers in a contest that ended 98-59. Leading scorers included Jamie Parrott with 26, Leah Onks with 22, and Lisa Campbell with 14 points and seven rebounds. Freshman guard Jennifer Buck gave 16 assists and Jama Cameron made seven rebounds.

Onks is the all-time leading scorer with 2,182 points so far. Many more points are expected in the tournament.

"I'm very pleased with the overall season," said head coach Kelli Casteel-Cook. "They've adapted very well."

The team will play the winner of tonight's game between North Carolina Wesleyan and Roanoke College. The Lady Scots will play in the second round of the tourney at 7 p.m., March 5 in the Boydson-Baird Gymnasium.

Cook said of the tournament, "I think we are more busy in anticipation—scrambling to get prepared. I think mentally we're ready, they're working hard. They have a lot to be proud of."

Cook emphasized the importance of fan support. "We want to draw a good crowd for [Saturday's] game. It would be good to have a full crowd there to support the team," she said.

Men's season ends better than expected

The Maryville Men's Basketball Team ended its season Feb. 26 with a record of 18-7. Opposing the Martin Methodist Indians, the Scots barely pulled the eighteenth win with a score of 96-94.

Scoring leaders Jeremy Burgess, Rusty Wilson, and John Robinette contributed a combined 56 points in the game.

The winning point was made by Wilson, who shot to give the Scots their ninety-sixth point against the Indians' 94.

Challenging the Scots, Martin shot an amazing 75 percent of its three-pointers in the game.

The following day, the NCAA Tournament Committee announced the byes for the NCAA Division III tournament. MC was not one of them.

Bob Gay, chairman for the NCAA Tournament announced in a news conference that all sixth ranked teams were eliminated from selection in the eight geographic regions. The men ended their season ranked sixth in the South region.

"We've exceeded all expectations," said assistant coach Dean Walsh. "This was supposed to be a rebuilding year. We'd hoped to win 14 or 15 games, at best. To wind up 18-7 and ranked sixth in our region is a major accomplishment."

The ability of the Scots to perform well in the face of adversity has helped in recruiting. "We're having a very good recruiting year so far. We expect big things next year," said Walsh. "We expect big things, anyway, with the players we have returning."

Leading scorers for the season include Wayne Norman, Jeremy Burgess, and Rusty Wilson who averaged 15.3, 14.4, and 13.8 points, respectively.

Norman, a graduating senior, is the only player expected not to return to the line-up next year. "It was the perfect way to end my career—to play with a team with that much togetherness," said Norman of the season. "I really enjoyed playing with all of those guys."

Bikers to spend spring break pedaling across state

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

A few weeks ago, a group of eight people went up onto Foothills Parkway, not in their cars, not in Maryville College vans, not in alien spaceships—on bicycles.

These people are members of Maryville College's Bike Tennessee '94 trip during Spring Break. The members of the group have been training since last semester to prepare for the 450 mile-long trip across the top of the state.

There are 20 members in all, the bulk of whom are students, staff and faculty, and some staff-members' children. On Friday, March 11, the group will load up their 20-odd bicycles onto a trailer before hopping into vans headed for Memphis. The trip will begin in Cordova, TN, near Memphis, and head up the highway through small Tennessee towns for the first few days. The group will ride a total of 165 miles in the first two days of travel. Covering many miles is planned and expected because west Tennessee is relatively flat.

"Our longest days will be the first two days—Saturday and Sunday," said Bruce Guillaume, director of the event. Vans will be driven ten miles ahead of the riders so that they can stop if they need help.

Taking state route 70, the group will encounter highway traffic, highway shoulder litter, and perhaps dogs without leashes.

Megan Norris, a member of the group, said about the trip: "I hope somebody shuts the wind off! It's worse than the hills."

"And the hills aren't going to gust on you," added Jamie Robbins, another student member of the Bike Tennessee crew.

They will travel through the heart of Nashville and onto the Cumberland Plateau. By Sunday, March 20, the riders will reach Maryville College.

"The training has been hard. I'm looking forward to the trip because I won't have to do anything but ride on my bike," said Amie Myers, another Bike Tennessee participant.

The group has set up accommodations at churches in the cities where they will stop at the end of each riding day. The group will speak at one church Wednesday to share their experiences with the church community.

Preparation for the trip has included several group rides and individual rides. Foothills Parkway to Look Rock and back down by Montvale Station Road, Hwy. 321 to the "Y" fork to the Smokies and Cades Cove, and back road rides of 25 miles or more have been the practice routes for the group.

"I'm excited, but I'm scared because we only have a week," said Robbins.

"I know it will be fun," said Norris. "I just have to remind myself that I'm going to live through it."

Robbins added for the members preparing: "Make sure everybody packs the padded underwear."

Editorial

Tensions run high as we begin doing those 12-page papers assigned four weeks ago due tomorrow. Tests and midterms are coming, adding joy to everyone's life. An overall sickness with differing symptoms of fever, stomach pain, sore throat, congestion, and early release of digested food have swept the campus. All of these combined give some of us major attitudes.

Spring Break is one week away.

Ah! Spring Break. It's within our reach. For some, it is the chance to go wickedly crazy hundreds of miles away from here. It's a sort of reward for the two agonizing weeks we are currently having.

It's a chance to recover from colds. It's a chance to go home and see some people that have missed you. There are countless movies and videos waiting to be watched. There are untold hours of sleep just waiting for you wherever you go.

For some, Florida is out. Whirlwind tours of major metropolitan areas is in. The choir will spend the entire week singing in different states. There's another group riding their butts off on a ten-day bicycle trip.

Winter's cold will probably be gone after the break, but spring fever will come in with a vengeance. After the break, time will fly. We will barely have time to remember the break before its time for finals.

Many professors have told me that spring semester at MC is gone before you know it. The reason, I speculate, is the MC cycle. In the fall, things are just beginning. The campus gradually gets into gear, adjusting to changes and new faces. The semester is full of holiday breaks. Then interim zips by in three short weeks. Bam! Spring semester rockets by at Mach 3 and we can barely see where we're going.

To all of you during Spring Break, have a safe one. Go crazy and riotous, but don't die; we want to see everyone of you in two weeks.

P.S. For you seniors, Graduation is two months away.

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

Hey guys...brace yourselves, this one may not be so pretty. Apparently I've developed senior-itis in a BAD way, and it is shining through in all that I do. Namely this column. After Dave and I received a letter from our editor saying that our columns were much too long and wordy and were always coming in late (now I don't know about you, but I would think that anyone taking Dave or myself on for anything would anticipate wordiness and tardiness, but maybe that's just me...), we both seemed to have lost our zeal for writing in this issue. I don't know if it was a direct affect of the letter, or whether it was simply due to the colossal amount of crap that we have to do at this point of the last semester of the last year of our college careers. Unfortunately for me, Dave is not on such a friendly level with the newspaper staff that they can call him up and tell him to "get his ass over to the Anderson computer lab" and write his column. But they feel comfortable enough to do it to me, so you folks get to enjoy a column about nothing except for my irritation with having to write this column. Lucky you!!!

Do you ever get the feeling that you are living the life of a character in a movie? I do—lately, everyday of my life, it seems. I hate to play up to this image of the twenty-something angst member of the X-Generation, because I hate to play into peoples hands that we are all alike. But I am beginning to get a sense for this overwhelming anxiety that so many of us seem to be experiencing...and for what!?!?

I am working my butt off right now—a seventeen hour course load, including my senior thesis, my senior art exhibit (into which I have already sunk about $300, and continually questioned why there are not any grants or funds available to me), working five days a week at a daycare center, trying to pay my bills (they are shutting off my heat tomorrow—let's all hope for warm weather from now on), I blew a tire the other day (only I would blow a tire on I-40 at rush hour traffic with 6 mannequins in my hatchback that I had to lie on the side of the road to get to my spare tire...only me), and had to get all my tires re-aligned in addition to buying two new tires.

Blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah...Nobody wants to hear me whine anymore. But I know that there are a lot of you that are right there with me, and most of you have been somewhere close and know how this feels. You wonder what the light at the end of the tunnel is, and you hope it will be a fantastic job offer upon graduation, or perhaps a millionaire art collector decides that he has a hankerin' for an eccentric mannequin for his living room...but until that does happen, you just hope that flying a kite for an hour will provide the necessary relaxation and sanity to get you through one more long night of studying or painting, or at least get you through one hour of writing a column that you don't want to write. I flew a kite yesterday, by the way. And the day before that, too.

I'm thinking about going to see the movie "Reality Bites" soon. My mother said that she didn't like it, that it was depressing, and that all the characters seemed to do was sit around and smoke a lot. Anybody around my age with whom I have talked has seen it has said that it was great, and right on the money. Uh-oh...does that mean that we are all depressing and sit around on couches smoking? Or does that mean that my mom (who is actually VERY hip) didn't get it, and that this generation gap business is not a bunch of nonsense? Hmmm...I think that both choices are very possible. If I go see the movie soon, I'll let you know what I think.

Meanwhile we all know that reality really can bite, and that eventually it will stop biting—it has to. Who or what will make it stop biting, or when it will happen is a great mystery, but when it happens, you damn well will appreciate it. In the meantime...

"Go fly a kite." — A. Day

P.S. I hope this was short enough.

Seniors! Seniors! Seniors!

TO: Graduating Seniors and the Class of 1994

FROM: Lori Schirmer

DATE: 24 Feb. 1994

I hope the semester is going well for you and that you are not too stressed yet. I didn't want to mention it, but comprehensive exams are soon and with them, the wine and cheese party afterwards. In addition to that, we have CIV and our gift to the college. (Now is the appropriate time to say "What? I gave them $15,000 a year for four years and you want me to contribute to a gift fund?") At this point, the Class of 1994 has no money. We must generate our own funds to pay for CIV, wine and cheese, and the gift to the college. One way to pay for activities is to host a booth at Blister in the Sun and some plans are in the works for that event (any ideas are welcome). Another way is to ask for a $5 contribution from the class and request that parents match the donation. More information about donations will follow within the next few weeks. According to the most recent figures from the registrar, the class has about 140 members. We have been tossing ideas around about a gift that will last and be used by future students (again, any ideas are welcome). The best option so far is to set up an endowment fund (only the earned interest could grow with our annual giving after we get jobs!?) We would need to raise at least $1000 and the gift would be selected for its value to the maximum number of students. We could also plant trees, but they did that last year.

You can still order your cap and gown from Josten's on Alcoa Highway, but please do it soon so that there is time to exchange it, if necessary. Caps and gowns will be distributed on March 28 and 29 from 1-2 p.m. in Fayerweather Hall.

Bookstore begins selling condoms

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

Maryville College has undergone a new, and somewhat severe, change. Although in several ways this is a liberal arts school, the word "liberal" cannot be attached to this institution when it comes to several aspects of student life.

In a bold move to change all the talk about not being liberal, Beth Stewart, who operates the bookstore and Isaac's snack bar, made a move that has shocked the student, faculty, staff, and alumni populations — especially financial contributors.

On April 1, the bookstore will begin selling condoms on a full-time basis. This decision came about as the result of a student survey on what they would like to see the bookstore sell. Stewart decided to try it first to see how people would react, but the condoms that she placed on the shelf with the hygiene products received little attention until Garth Lovvorn saw them and purchased a box of 12 for the small price of $2.95.

When asked how he felt about being able to purchase prophylactics in the bookstore, Lovvorn said: "It's cool!"

Stewart said she felt uneasy about all the controversy surrounding the box of condoms and refused to comment, but one of the employees of the bookstore said: "I'm glad they're [students] using something."

At the forefront of the entire battle is donor Leonard Pike, who never actually graduated from Maryville, but attended this institution for "a small amount of time—enough to

Spring Fling to be held at the Underground, Red Hot Chili Peppers play

by Karen Beatty
Assistant Editor

It's not unusual for Maryville College students to accidentally "bump into" their campus friends at the Underground, the alternative hot-spot in Knoxville's Old City. What will be unusual is that on April 30, the only people to "bump into" at the Underground will be Maryville College students, staff, and their dates.

The Student Programming Board (SPB) has reserved the Underground for the college's annual Spring Fling dance. And if that isn't hard enough to believe, the SPB has made it known to the "Echo" that the Red Hot Chili Peppers have agreed to perform for the dance.

"The rental was really reasonable. [SPB] was able to work out a deal since we're bringing in such a big band," said Anne Becconsall, SPB coordinator. "Students are going to have to pay $10 per person for the rental of the facility. [SPB] used all of [its] money for one event."

"We've always been given a lot of suggestions about bringing someone 'big' to campus. Then we thought, How much bigger could we get than the Underground and the Red Hot Chili Peppers?," said Chris Rapp, SPB co-chairperson.

While the plans have been — until now — a well-kept secret, the campus is getting wind of the news. Student response was expected to be, and is, good.

"Wow, it will really be up close and personal. We'll really be able to talk to the band," said senior Julie Walker.

The night's theme will be "It's Red Hot at Maryville," according to Becconsall.

She said she wants to make it clear that if the Red Hot Chili Peppers' music doesn't appeal to everyone, they will be playing a cross-mixture of songs — R & B, jazz, pop and alternative — during the band's break.

In the past, locations for college events have been limited to the Maryville/Alcoa area because of concerns over drinking and driving.

Student Development and the SPB think they might have found a solution. Throughout the night, students may take advantage of free limousine service into Knoxville. Sign-up sheets will be posted around campus for students to reserve their ride.

"Nothing but the best for our students," explained Becconsall.

Security goes on strike, leaves campus unguarded

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

Students at Maryville College are going to have an opportunity to find out what life would be like without the little blue truck on campus. Recently, negotiations between security and the college fell through and security has announced its intention to go on strike.

Campus security wanted to set up an interrogation area for questioning suspected offenders here on campus. The interrogation rooms would feature flashing disco lights and blaring elevator music.

The college refused saying that this was cruel and unusual punishment and would not be allowed.

Chief Hurst and the other security officers requested the room saying that the mere threat of being subjected to the interrogation room would drastically reduce crime here on campus.

The interrogation room would have included Barry Manilow songs and the "Saturday Night Fever" sound track for the more hardened criminals.

After reaching an impasse on the issue, security announced their strike late Friday April 1. "The strike will last until we either get the interrogation room or the college offers us a reasonable substitute," said Chief Hurst.

The strike will begin Monday, April 4. Basically, security will still lock up buildings and guard the college, but they will no longer respond to reports of thefts or vandalism.

Now all reports of theft, vandalism, or similar occurrences will be reported directly to the Maryville Police Department.

Fire trucks arrive to an alarm, while an empty security truck sits. There has been no security for three days and already several counts of armed robbery, vandalism, and rape have hit the campus; the mysterious "kneeling man" has also frequented the library three or four times a day.

Pike also feels that the selling of condoms on campus might lead to them selling other products that may be inappropriate. "Like those feminine napkins that they sell—how would you feel if they started selling those, huh?"

Face of MC dorm living changing next year

by Gevin Simpson
Staff Writer

Students should expect several changes when they return to Maryville College this fall. Absent will be resident directors (RDs) from Davis, Lloyd, and Pearsons. In their places will be head residents that are fifth year seniors or graduate students. Instead of payment, these students will receive free housing and a ten meal plan.

The rules of Carnegie and Lloyd Halls have also been changed. Lloyd will be a 24-hour visitation hall, and the bottom floor of Carnegie will be open to anyone who chooses to live there. That leaves Pearsons as the only hall where alcohol is allowed to be consumed.

In the last two years Maryville College has undergone several changes. The inauguration of a new president, the re-opening of Carnegie Hall, and several new additions to faculty and staff were very prevalent throughout to the '93-'94 school year. With these changes a rise in the cost of tuition also came. The change in cost will effect several aspects of campus living, especially residence life.

After Director of Campus Life Marcia Gibson left Maryville College last year, her position was divided into two separate offices. Cathy Pounders-Cate was deemed coordinator of student activities and Stephanie Wyatt was hired to direct of resident life. Along with Wyatt, two new residence directors were hired. Anne Beconsall moved into

MC music Professor Sallie Schoen dies at 64

by Karen Beaty
Ass't Editor
with Chris Rapp

When the Maryville College faculty and staff members march in procession to the graduation exercises on May 15, there will be one empty space in line.

Sallie Schoen, 64, associate professor of music and wife of MC Professor Victor Schoen, suffered a stroke March 6, and passed away March 23.

Both Sallie and Victor Schoen joined the MC faculty in 1955. They were planning to retire at the end of this school year.

During her 39 years at the college, Sallie taught Solfege, eurhythmics, piano lessons and piano proficiency lessons for MC students.

"[She] was a very driving and effective instructor, but she also added a unique and energetic personality to the Fine Arts Center.

She touched our education, but in a greater way, she touched our lives," said Sophomore Dayna Touron.

Sallie will be remembered also for her accomplishments in music. Not only did she serve as the accompanist for the Affiliate Artist series for many years, but she was a registered accompanist with Columbia Artists Management, Inc. She was named "Outstanding Educator in America" in 1972, and was awarded a Mellon Foundation Faculty Development Grant for work with the piano. Last August, Sallie was given the "Outstanding Teacher" award by the Governor's School for the Arts.

Both Sallie and Victor attended the Mozarteum in Salzburg, Austria, which is a prestigious conservatory founded in 1841 for the preservation and study of Mozart's works.

According to Dr. Daniel Taddie, professor of music, arrangements have been made to fill the teaching vacancy left by Schoen's death. Elizabeth Goode is conducting Solfege, and Krystyna Koneczny and Carol Ann Smalley are teaching eurhythmics and piano lessons, respectively.

On March 25, the MC Concert Choir dedicated its Spring Homecoming Concert to Sallie Schoen. During the May 2 concert by the Maryville/Alcoa Community Choir and Orchestra (MACCO), the Rutter "Requiem" will be dedicated in her memory.

"I am very lucky to have had the opportunity to study with a musical talent like Sallie. I will miss her very much, but I will never forget how much she cared for her students and their success as musicians," said Davy McCammon, junior.

Contributions may be made to the Senior Citizens Home Assistance Services of Blount County, or the Blount County Literacy Council in memory of Schoen.

Special Olympics events held at MC swimming pool

by Sharon Rena Graves
Staff Writer

The Special Olympics are sports events that the Maryville College Athletic Department is proud to help sponsor.

Consisting of students of different age groups and different schools from the surrounding area, the Special Olympics events are open to those who have disabilities. Members of the athletic department work with Area 15 Special Olympics to help coordinate these events.

On March 23, there was a Special Olympics swimming event at Maryville College. The meet was from 1 p.m. — 3 p.m., and was fully staffed by Maryville College students.

"As pool manager for the college, I was able to set up practice times for the aquatic section. I mainly provide pool time [for the participants], because most do not have pools. They need pool time in order to practice for these events," said Assistant Athletic Director Kandis Schram.

The events involved many different swim techniques that the participants had to perform. "Some will do different strokes, but most are cross strokes. The longest event is 50 yards, but most are 25 yards," said Dr. John Perry, professor of physical education.

Perry is presently teaching a class entitled "Physical Education and Recreation for Special Populations." The students in this class and Coach Fernandez's volleyball/soccer class were able to participate as volunteers in the Special Olympics events. They volunteered as lifeguards, audio equipment assistants, and announcers. "It is a learning experience for individuals to work with different populations. Some people feel very uneasy about working with individuals who have disabilities. Volunteering to help in the Special Olympics gives my students the opportunity to associate with these people. Most of the kids my students work with are slow, mentally. I evaluate my students on goals they have set for themselves in trying to work with these special populations," said Perry.

His class also works with the Eagleton Elementary School students who come on Fridays to swim in the college pool.

A number of Special Olympics events are scheduled for April. The next event approaching will be the Special Olympics for track and field. It will be held at Heritage High School at 9 a.m., April 13. On April 22, there will be a Special Olympics for art at New Providence Presbyterian Church. This will be an all-day event consisting of festivities, games, and pony rides.

"I am very proud of the part that the college takes in aquatic, as well as field events, for the Olympics. It's wonderful that the college and athletic staff endorse the purpose of Special Olympics, and I am glad to be able to be a part of it," said Schram.

Bike TN '94 completes 460-mile tour of state

by Paul Weaver
Staff Writer

While the majority of the campus population packed up and headed for home — or the beach — twenty people left for Memphis to begin a 460-mile trek across Tennessee. They spent their Spring Break biking, at times, up to 85 miles a day according to Kevin Turner, one of the 11 students who participated.

The rest of the group was made up of faculty and staff, including Lewis Simmerly and Phil Morton of the community.

The trek actually began in Cordova, TN, where the group made its way up State Route 70. During the first few days, the group covered a great deal of distance because of the geography of west Tennessee. As the mountains became more frequent and steeper, the group began to daily cover less and less.

Contrary to what they expected, the group did not run into as many bike problems for which they had planned.

"There weren't many bike problems — our biggest problem was that we were sore," said Senior Vance Grant.

The group spent weeks training for its journey, building its endurance through individual and group rides around the Maryville area, including trips to Look Rock and back by way of Montvale Station Road.

The feelings about the trip varied from "It was a great experience — I'd do it again in a minute," by Amie Myers, to "It was pretty grueling — one of those once-in-a-lifetime experiences. I wouldn't do it again," by Grant.

Their days were spent in a fairly fixed position, pushing towards a common goal, so their socializing was done at night. "We didn't get much sleep," recalls Grant. "You know that delirious stage that you get to when you don't sleep enough, when you'll laugh at anything? We spent a lot of time there."

The group stayed in churches along the way — at one point staying in a church that had only 54 members, 48 of which showed up to make the church ready for them. They provided the Bike TN crew with hot food and hot showers after a cold day of wind and rain.

The group had experienced great weather, and had suffered no accidents. "None of the motorists tried to force us off the road. We were thankful for that," said Myers.

On March 20, the bikers rode onto campus, completing their journey. "Riding into Maryville was the best part," said Turner.

The glory days of the Alumni Gym. The beautiful exterior of the building once added to the beauty of the campus. Today, it is in need of repair and restoration.

Alumni Gym host to decades of MC athletes

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

Maryville College held most of its sporting events in Bartlett Hall until 1923, when the Alumni Gym was opened for business. For years, the Alumni Gym was used by every sports team until the Boydson Baird Gymnasium and athletic building were completed in 1974.

Begun in a campaign in 1920-21 under the direction of Professors Horace E. Orr and Edwin R. Hunter, the Alumni Gym was planned to be an extension of the basketball court in Bartlett and for the construction of a new athletic field and outdoor track. During the campaign, a rapidly expanding enrollment and overcrowded physical education classes called for a full-size gym; $10,000 of the $50,000 raised was used to build the frame building.

In 1932, all students were required to take physicals, and in "History of Athletics at Maryville College 1868-1968" by Ken D. Kribbs, he quotes from report from the exam: "Corrective gymnasium classes are conducted for all found to need them. One requirement for graduation is four semesters of physical education . . . Varsity men are exempt."

The gymnasium was used for MC's many sports until the construction of the Athletic building and the Boydson Baird Gymnasium in the early 1970's.

Chief Eldria Hurst, head of MC security, said, "I played basketball (in the Alumni Gym) in high school."

After the move into the new physical education facilities, the Alumni Gym was used for storage until the early 1980's. Gymnastics classes and wrestling classes were given. Aerobics classes were moved into the building, and later, the Isshinryu Karate School held practices at night in the building.

Softball and baseball teams have practice in the gym, taking advantage of the batting cages alongside the gym floor. Indoor soccer has also played inside the building. In the last few years, the Mountain Challenge Program has installed its own climbing wall alongside the gym wall facing court street.

Robert Kirkland, maintenance manager of the campus and an employee of MC for 32 years, said, "the Grounds Dept. still uses the back of it for lawnmower equipment."

He also mentioned the old Raquetball building next to the Alumni Gym, which was acquired over a decade ago and is now being used for storage by the Print Shop.

Hurst urged the need for repair of the aging structure, "It needs to be repaired and brought back to life . . . some of the windows need to be replaced."

Hurst said that the gym has "one of the best floors in Blount County." He emphasized the need to keep it and the building in much better condition.

Morningside, former residence of MC presidents, benefactors

Morningside Inn, built and completed by the fall of 1932 and occupied by 1933, was not an original Maryville College building. It housed no classes, and served no function for the campus.

Morningside was the residence of Susan Cooper Walker. She was the sister of Mrs. William P. Stevenson, wife of the MC pastor, who moved to Maryville in 1917. Walker wanted to live closer to her sister. She designed much of Morningside's structure, her husband financed its building, and James C. Vineyard facilitated the construction of the house.

Walker signed a binding contract with the college known as a "declaration of trust," which said that she could legally reside on the campus and would give the property to Maryville College after her death.

Walker had several residences in the north as well as Morningside. She soon sold the other residences and spent her last years at MC. She had a staff of eight or nine people to work for her, including five maids and cooks, and three men who did maintenance jobs around the house. Walker lived a total of 18 years at Morningside until she died in 1950 at the age of 98. After her death, Walker bequeathed to the college not only the house but also most of its furnishings, silver, and linens.

Morningside was converted into the president's residence in 1951, where then President Ralph Waldo Lloyd and his family moved from Willard House. (The plans were to use Willard House for other purposes.)

The Lloyds remained residents of the 26-room house until 1961, when President Copeland was inaugurated and his family moved onto campus.

It remained Copeland's home until he retired in 1977. Dr. Wayne Anderson, eighth president of MC, chose to live off campus because of the cost to maintain and heat Morningside.

A few years later, items inside Morningside were auctioned off. The items had been stored in the house, and storage was costing the college $1,500 a year.

In 1984-85, Sharon and Tillman Crane lived in the residence.

Tom and Nan Taylor took over the establishment on lease in 1985 and converted the residence into a restaurant. They had long-term plans of turning Morningside into a bed and breakfast.

The lease was turned over to Kristin and Matthew Purvis in October, 1992, and they continue to run the bed and breakfast.

Morningside has been called an estate. Morningside Inn is only the main building, which is two stories high with entrances on either side of a large reception hall. On the second floor are 16 rooms and a long hall. The Inn has six fireplaces—three on the first floor and three on the second.

Former President Lloyd, in an article written in the November, 1972, Maryville College Bulletin, told how Morningside — as the president's residence — hosted many visiting groups, including African-American organizations. He emphasized the college's reception of different races before the civil rights movement and said of those times, "In those days we received threats from militant racist individuals and groups in the community whenever it was known that we had black guests on the campus or in our homes."

Today, Morningside is no longer a college building, and the Inn is a separate entity from the college.

Poetry Slam showcases faculty, student talent

by Karen Beaty
Assistant Editor

Whether an admission of guilt or a cry for help, the confession made by Dave Powell in the Proffitt Parlor of Carnegie Hall March 8 was shocking.

"Poets are crazy. I mean, I need to be locked up."

If that's the case, thirty people came to the Humanities Club's Poetry Slam and heard five crazy poets read some of their original work.

Maryville College President Gerald Gibson opened the readings with poetry he had written as a young college professor. Three poems were, he said, "inspired by students," and others were metrical memories of time spent with his grandfather in South Carolina, and perspectives from a walk down the sidewalks of Cambridge, MA.

Dr. Mark Thomas began his reading not with an original poem, but instead an example of "bad" poetry he wanted to serve as an "insurance policy" in guaranteeing that nothing he composed was as bad in comparison. Thomas read his original "Prufrock at a Singles Bar," a poem that opens with the line: "What an absurd name I have..." In "Heavy Gray," Thomas explained that he experimented with "mimicking musical sounds with words" in a poem about musician Theloneus Munk.

Students Dara Di Giacomo and David Downs contributed three readings combined.

Dave Powell's reading (though perhaps more like a comedic stand-up routine) began with a spoof on faculty and staff members, and students. One of the longer and more serious poems of Powell's, inspired by a friend who was physically abused by her husband, was patterned after the biblical story of Jeremiah and the city of Jericho. Thoughtful lyrics, such as "The moon shows one face, but the earth turns, and turns, and turns..." were mixed in with poems with deeper meaning.

Jenny Cummings, Humanities Club vice-president for the English department, said that the Poetry Slam may become a regular program on campus. "It turned out really well," said Cummings. "We had good attendance for mid-term week. We look forward to doing more things like this, and promoting more interest in the Humanities Club."

"I thought it was really interesting," said junior Chris Lance. "I hope this encourages people to bring out their own work and share it."

"I felt like I've visited several different places as each person read," said Thomas.

No one was transported to a 1950 New England boarding school and no one christened himself "Nuwanda", but the Poetry Slam wasn't any less entertaining than watching "Dead Poets' Society" for the—well—third time.

Multicultural Club formed—discusses ethnic diversity

by Sharon Rena Graves
Staff Writer

There has been an additional campus organization added this spring semester, the Multicultural Club for Campus Alliance.

This new organization was created by Junior Letitia Hall and Sophomore Sheila Pirl.

"I'm very excited and feel that this organization is something necessary on this campus," said Carl Gombert, assistant professor of art history, and the faculty advisor for the organization.

The idea for this club was inspired by the National Association for Campus Activity Conference that Hall and Pirl attended with Anne Beconsall, director of student programming.

"The seeds of the Multicultural Club were planted at this conference when Letitia and I were just talking casually about this type of club," said Pirl.

During the conference, there was a special session on multicultural relations where different aspects of multiculturalism were discussed.

According to Hall and Pirl, there were student representatives from many different colleges and universities who acknowledged that there were problems existing on their campuses due to different cultural backgrounds.

Some of these problems centered around cultural neglect, lack of knowledge of other cultures (which leads to misunderstanding), and regional stereotypes.

"I feel that our campus has some of these similar problems, but no solution or support group to address them. A club on multiculturalism is one possible solution to these problems," said Hall.

This club is something which can help individuals learn about other cultures and individual backgrounds of people. Students have the opportunity to teach and educate others about their different cultures and traditions.

"There are so many bitter feelings and attitudes toward individuals due to a lack of understanding, and we feel that students should at least have a place to vent, to understand, and to accept. We knew that the campus needed a place to express overall concerns, as well as break down differences by finding common ground and understanding of one's culture," said Pirl.

A number of students expressed interest by attending the first meeting. They expressed the same concerns as Hall and Pirl in relation to being able to understand different cultural backgrounds. "I'm interested in helping to break down some walls that exist between groups on campus, and to make new friends through this organization who I can really talk to," said Sophomore Emily Venable.

"It's more intellectual. You go to understand different people and learn to appreciate them. The International Club is like a support group [which makes those students who speak different languages] feel at home. At first, I couldn't see the differences between the two organizations; however, after attending the first meeting, I was able to see the differences," said Nadia Edoh, vice-president of the International Club.

The interest of the students to learn about different cultures is given first priority at these meetings.

Currently, the main objective of these organizations is to attend "Ethnic Crossroads," a session sponsored by the College Campuses National Student Conference at Georgia State University, March 31-April 2, 1994.

There will be numerous workshops available to these students on multiculturalism.

This conference should give the members an opportunity to meet new people, learn about different cultures, and grasp new ideas and strategies that they can implement in their own organization. "We were aware that we could not 'convert the masses,' but we were realistic that a few flames can start a fire," said Pirl.

The Multicultural Club for Campus Alliance meets at 7 p.m., every other Thursday evening in the FAC lounge.

Second annual "Blister" to feature bands, games, fun

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

The second annual "Blister in the Sun" will be held from 1-6 p.m., April 16 at the Maryville College football field.

According to Sheila Pirl, a member of the MC Student Programming Board (SPB), three bands will be providing entertainment: B, S, and M (Barton, Schaffer, and Mills) from Virginia, Knoxville's Three Stones From The Sun, and the Black Velvet Dogs, also from Knoxville. The bands will be playing cover songs, songs most people already know, including pop and rock.

During the festival, MC clubs and organizations will be providing other forms of entertainment, as well as refreshments. These activities include a pie toss sponsored by the Multicultural Club. (Several MC professors have consented to having pies thrown in their faces to help raise money.) InterVarsity Christian Fellowship is sponsoring a jail where interested persons can have someone "arrested" and placed in "jail" for a short period of time.

A design by MC Freshman Donna Haynes was selected to go on this year's t-shirts.

SPB has not decided on the price of the shirt, but SPB Coordinator Anne Beconsall estimates the cost to be $5-$8.

Other MC organizations that are participating include Carnegie Residence Hall and Environmental Club.

MC students will be admitted free to the festival with a student ID. Admission for the public will be $3. "Blister in the Sun" will be held in Wilson Chapel in case of rain.

"It's going to be a really good time," said Beconsall.

"Spring Fling and [Blister] are two of the big expenses for the semester. We want students to come and enjoy the music and the sun."

The only outlet for MCTV, the monitor in Fayerweather lobby, always plays to an empty crowd.

MCTV holds many possibilities

by Sarah Stevenson
Staff Writer

MC students walk by it every day. They don't look at it. They aren't interested in it. They don't give it a second thought.

These are a few of the frustrations with which Telephone Services's Brenda Binder and others who brought MCTV are dealing.

MCTV is a broadcasting program that was brought to the campus a few years ago. Right now, the only visible sign of the program — the TV screen outside of the bookstore — is almost completely overlooked by students.

"Whatever it takes to make people want to read it is our goal right now," Binder said.

The program has a variety of capabilities, but no faculty members have the time to figure it out. Telephone Services is more than willing to assist any interested students, however.

"It would make a great senior thesis project for someone," Binder said.

Anything from WordPerfect to videotape can be broadcast. If enough interest is generated, better equipment, such as a larger monitor, could be purchased.

As of right now, "anyone can put anything they want on it, as long as it's decent," Binder said.

Anyone interested in working on MCTV or getting more information should contact Binder.

Environmental Club cleans river

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

Thirteen members of the Maryville College Environmental Club participated in the fourth annual River Rescue on March 26. River Rescue is a concentrated effort to clean up the banks of Ft. Loudon Lake. The clean-up began at 9 a.m. and lasted until 3 p.m.

Members of the Environmental Club who participated were Megan Norris, Spears Driskell, Lydia Cobb, Kent Patrick, Briana Brugner, Josh Hogan, Andy Caylor, Jon Peters, Nikki Masters, Chee Hill, Jennifer Newcome, and Donna Haynes, as well as Davis Residence Director Gwen Tuson.

Environmental Club president Nikki Masters said that the MC turnout was "wonderful."

Commented Megan Norris on the trash in one particular location:

"You could just stand in one place and fill a whole bag up with garbage." Norris said she hopes she "made a positive impact on the environment and hopes the cleaned areas will remain clean."

Common items found included soft drink cans, tires, broken glass, and rope.

All the participants agreed that River Rescue was a great experience and well worth forfeiting a Saturday morning's sleep.

Change

Copeland, and Gwen Tuson was hired to head resident life in Davis.

The transition hasn't always been so easy for Student Development this year.

With new staff, several different conflicts came about. Mark Cate, the RD of Carnegie explained that these conflicts stemmed from "different philosophies."

"It took time to fit those new philosophies with the overall Maryville philosophy," said Cate, adding that there were "problems with communications between the residence life staff, the resident assistants (RAs), and the administration."

Cate said he believes that "residence life is the most visible part of the college, and the RAs and RDs are in the trenches." His overall synopsis of this year was that the year has been "tough, but no tougher than others."

Some students who have worked for the staff this year feel differ-ently about the direction residence life has taken. "[Residence life] took a complete U-turn from what it set out to be. The purpose of the RA was to be more of a counselor and not emphasize the job, but that's not what [resident life staff] is doing," said Junior Keela Moore.

Mark Cate feels that some changes in resident living should alleviate problems. In regard to making Carnegie Hall a non-drinking hall, Cate said he believes it will "be more consistent on enforcing the alcohol policy."

MC baseball loses to Emory, record at 5-5

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College baseball team is currently 5-5, after Saturday's losses in a double-header against Emory University, 3-2, 6-1.

Rain-outs and injuries are just a few of the setbacks with which the team has had to contend thus far. "Considering what our team has gone through, we've done well," said Senior Jeff Rosa.

Eight games will have to be rescheduled because of the recent heavy rainfall and usual spring showers to which baseball teams are accustomed. Sophomore David Forster, one of the Scots' starting pitchers, broke his jaw in two places April 1, and had an operation April 2. Forster isn't expected to return to the mound this season.

The roster reflects the efforts of last year's good recruiting. The Scots have a talented group of freshmen who have contributed greatly to the season so far. Coach Eric Etchison has been pleased with his team's performance and anticipates the team to improve as the season progresses.

"With the pitching staff we have, the strong contribution of the younger guys, and the leadership of the upperclassmen, we could go a long way," said Etchison.

Surprisingly, two freshmen led the team in hitting prior to Saturday's games. Chris Yates was hitting .500, while Ryan Rogers was hitting .409. After their first eight games, the Scots were batting .298 as a team and had a team on-base percentage of .386.

The Scots' pitching has been a major factor in the success thus far. Jason Pitts (ERA 1.64), David Forster (ERA 1.86), Jason Kallenberg (ERA 4.76), and Chris Daniel (ERA 6.39) have had strong showings and lead the team with their pitching. The pitching staff has been backed up with good defense. The Scots' fielding average (after the first eight games) was .982.

The Scots continue to hope and practice for a tournament bid at the end of the season.

You put the left foot in, you put your left foot out—

Lady Scots Softball underway

by Jay Clark
Staff Writer

The Maryville College women's softball team is underway. Presently, the team's record is 3-5.

After an opening loss to Virginia Wesleyan, 1-12, the Lady Scots beat Ferrum (VA), 7-5. After a loss to Erskine 1-5, the Lady Scots improved their record to 3-2 by defeating Tennessee Wesleyan in a double-header, 5-2, 7-6.

Nikki Boop, one of last year's team leaders, sustained a knee injury and is expected to miss part of the season. Boop's injury is already a major loss for the team, and would be decisive in the success of the season, according to Coach Kandis Schram.

The next home game for the Lady Scots is scheduled for 3 p.m., April 6.

Thomas wins body building awards

by Jeff Huffman
Editor

Robert Thomas, 22, a senior from Paris, KY, participated in the USA Sports Labs' 1994 National Physique Competition in Milan, TN. Thomas staggered the competition with awards in four categories: men's open overall, novice lightweight, men's open bantam, and novice's open overall. He took home a total of four trophies, four medals, and two jackets.

Thomas explained the five categories of competition: bantam is the lightest, lightweight is next to lightest. Middleweight, light heavy-weight, and heavy weight follow. Thomas competed in the lightweight, also called bantam weight.

"Once you win novice, you can't compete as novice anymore," explained Thomas.

qualifier. Thomas explained that if one wins overall (as he has), he qualifies for nationals. After competing nationally, successful competitors go to the pros.

Thomas talked about moving up in body building. "Nationals are real big shows. Once you do well in the national shows, you go pro. . . . If I go pro, it will be in a drug-free league." Thomas said that some bodybuilders rely on certain drugs to enhance their muscles for show.

Most nationals are held in the big cities, including New York, and Los Angeles. Thomas said that in June, he'll probably compete in a competition in North Carolina.

His training included more than two months of dieting, lifting, aerobics, and other body building activities.

"I usually try to do two or three shows a year," said Thomas.

Thomas's presentation included flexing in different poses to the song "I Got the Power." He included some unorthodox moves, including a moon walk, high flips, and a split.

"Confidence shows," said Thomas.

Letters to the Editor . . .

Cafeteria food quality . . .

Dear Editor:

I'm writing to you about the quality of the food in the cafeteria. I pay one thousand dollars a semester to eat there. I expect the food to be worth the money that I pay for it. The cafeteria serves the same foods everyday.

For example, for the last five weeks, they have served spaghetti every day for lunch and dinner. People got sick of eating spaghetti all the time. In my opinion, the cafeteria should serve a wide variety of dishes.

We are not in a prison where prisoners must eat what they are given. I would like to see my money spent better than this.

Yours truly,
Mazen Al-Adimi

Dear Editor:

I'm from Korea. I'm a student in CELL. I have been here for five weeks. Now I live in Davis dorm, so I eat meals in the cafeteria every day. There are several problems with the food in the cafeteria.

First, the food in the cafeteria is too greasy. I though most American food was greasy, so I tried to adapt myself to it. However, I heard one of the American students say the food is too greasy for her, too. Second, American food is too sweet. That problem affects not only taste but also our health. And finally, often the vegetables are not fresh. The cooks in the cafeteria are responsible for the student's health. Therefore, they must take a prudent attitude. We pay the fee for the food, so we have the right to eat good food. I hope that you can find a solution to the problem. Thank you.

Yours truly,
Soo Ah Lee

Security in dorms . . .

Dear Editor:

I have lived on campus for four months and I have heard something that has made every person unhappy. Somebody's money has been stolen, and somebody's camera disappeared. Even the computer in CELL was stolen.

Every person has important things such as a passport, money, camera, TV set and watch. Before we leave the dorm room, we should make a tour of all doors and windows to be sure they are all locked. If we forget to, our important things may be stolen, because most criminals are opportunists who simply take advantage of a promising situation.

Therefore, for the purpose of our safety, I must appeal: don't forget to lock your door and window when you leave your dorm room.

Yours truly,
Pin Jun Li

Basketball . . .

Dear Editor:

Basketball is one of the most exciting games in the United States. In my opinion all the people related to the sport should encourage all the students to come to basketball games at Maryville College.

I understand that the big problem is that the students don't come to the basketball games in their own gym. The other night, when the women played basketball, I didn't see a lot of people from MC but I did see a group of guys that were very enthusiastic about the game. I liked their enthusiasm. The students should go to these games to cheer and make the SCOTS the best.

Dear Editor,

It is said that a team takes on the personality of its coach. From what is seen of Kelli Casteel-Cook, the Lady Scots basketball team has only good things to look forward to.

Recently, a few of us had the privilege to travel and see this first year coach and her team in action at the Sweet Sixteen Tournament in Arlington, VA.

All season it has been obvious to the spectators and supporters of Maryville basketball the femininity Coach Cook portrays in her mannerisms, her attire, and her rapport. She maintains the dignity of a lady, yet she can be firm in her opposition. Like any coach, she can laugh, get excited, and be frustrated along with her team. But unlike most coaches, she empathizes with her players. Anyone who watched the Lady Scots prior to the game in Arlington saw first hand the excitement and anticipation of Coach Cook and her team. Although we lost that particular game, the team, as well as those of us watching, gained the confirmation of how unique a coach Kelli is when she shed sympathetic tears with her girls upon being eliminated from the tournament.

This was a winning season for the Lady Scots, and much success was due to the commendable senior leadership of Honey Brown and Leah Onks on and off of the court. Their dedication and love for the game is great. With examples set by these girls along with the quality coaching of Kelli Cook, the future Lady Scots basketball team members are already National Champs.

First an editorial note: We hope we duped some of you with the Fool part of this issue. The biggest joke is that it is not April Fool's day when you are reading this. We hope we didn't offend anyone, and that some of you got some laughs.

I regret that not everyone could have ridden across Tennessee on his/her bicycle. I've gotten a better understanding of life from this trip, as well as an hourly urge to jump back on my bike and ride. Life on the trip was wonderful. It was wonderful because life was simple and the group had one purpose.

At Maryville, it is easy to do too much. There are so many clubs and organizations to join. There's the reason we really came here — academics — and tests and papers add up. There's personal life — that part of us that we need to nurture to help us understand this campus world and give us our identities. Then there's all those other little tidbits that make it the college experience.

All-in-all, most of us end up swept away in what seems to be oceans and oceans of assignments and duties all mixed up with different types of relationships we have developed over the year. Life gets scattered, our purpose for being here skewed, and we're generally very confused and somewhat lost.

Then some of us rode Bike Tennessee.

(An announcement for all English Profs: purposeful plural to singular pronoun transition.)

After a few days, the noise of college silenced, and the purity of thought came back to me. Life was simple. You ride, stop for the night, meet wonderful church folks, down terrific hot meals, sleep, get up the next day, clean the place where you've stayed, and ride on. For a change, I enjoyed a life that could be summed up in one sentence. On purpose, I didn't give one thought to school life. Not one thought to my responsibilities waiting for me when I returned. Just ride.

(Announcement: another transition to a plural pronoun.)

We had one purpose: ride the road to home.

We had one route.

We had the opportunity to focus on life and on something totally different from school.

(Announcement: another transition, "our" in the next sentence would probably be marked wrong.)

In Oak Ridge, the day before our return to Maryville, I asked some of the community riders who had come on the trip how they felt about almost being back home and back to normal life. They said they didn't want to stop; they wanted to keep on. They, like me, had gotten into the groove of this new life, and enjoyed it.

I didn't want to stop. I didn't want to come back to Maryville. I wanted to keep going forever. This life was too good. I rode back slowly on that last day.

I came back.

Real life had too big a hook in me for me to escape. But actually, I did escape. I've brought that sense of focus back into my own life. MC ain't no big deal now. The day after the trip, I woke up to every student's nightmare: A midterm was scheduled for my 9 a.m. class, and it was now 9:30 a.m. What did I do? Instead of having a heart attack as I dashed to Anderson, I slowly got up, stretched my sore body, put on some shorts and a shirt, and casually jogged to class with a smile on my face. No big deal. (The midterm, as I found out, had been postponed.)

Comps are coming up. No big deal. Just study and go take them. After the test, ride about 40 miles with a 10-mile tailwind that will make you feel like a rocket. That's the plan.

Hello...? Kids?

The topic of today's Dave's World is the increasingly disturbing drug problem here on Maryville campus. In my opinion, most of the problems on this campus—apathy, hypocrisy, mediocrity, lack of originality, the absence of any intellectually stimulating activities outside the classroom—can be traced directly to the scourge of drugs. Plus, it is barely safe to walk outside the dorms at night any more for fear that some marijuana-crazed fiend will attack you and steal your money to fuel his terrible addiction. He doesn't care about your safety, he's got to get his next joint, his next fix. What's next, drive-by shootings? It's time we all sobered up and acted responsibly...

April Fool's!

Actually, my topic today is, to quote Roger Daltry, "my g-g-g-g-generation." More specifically, I would like to look at the message we get from television... well, media in general, but mostly television.

I am a member of what has been termed "Generation X," a generation so faceless that its name is a blank, so devoid of ideas that it clings to vestiges of the '60s and '70s like a child clinging to its mother's skirt. We are children of the media, offspring of the information age, bastard sons of MTV/HBO/CBS/VH1/CNN/ETC. Everywhere we turn, input swarms at us, floods us, prods us, numbs us. Our audio-visual genitals have been stroked until we are impotent—it takes increasing extremes to get us aroused. Sex gets more explicit, violence gets more graphic, and we yawn and flip the channel. For us, fact and fiction have been mixed to the point where neither is very exciting. We are the "slackers," and here's what we see on TV:

Flip: a commercial. A group of clean, healthy, smiling, well-dressed, bouncy young people (at least one female and two minorities are represented) sits in a pizza parlor making fun of one of its friends. The friend is not present, but we gather that he has... gasp... pimples. However, the friend has been using skin product X, and he suddenly appears in the pizza place with clear skin. Now that he looks like everyone else, he is included, and the group presumably goes on to make fun of somebody else.

Flip: Oprah. Some guy on stage explains that America's problem is that everyone tries to impose his own personal morality on everybody else. "What's right for you isn't necessarily right for me," he complains. (Later, we find that this guy dresses up in women's clothes and plays a kazoo at the airport to raise money for God.)

Flip: the evening news. A bunch of people got shot in McDonald's. A bunch of people got shot in Bosnia. A bunch of people got shot in South Central L.A. Some politician said that the reason so many people get shot is that so many people have guns, so we should take their guns away.

Flip: some movie on HBO. A bunch of people get shot. (The good guys win, though.)

Flip: MTV. Some video with a bunch of women in bikinis thrusting their pelvises at the screen is on. Then some guy makes a public service announcement about how sex can kill you because of AIDS. Then Snoop Doggy Dogg is on singing about the "1-8-7 on the undercover cop." Then some guy makes a public service announcement asking us to "stop the violence."

Flip: CNN. Some politician is in congressional hearings talking about how violent Snoop Doggy Dogg's music is and saying that the reason so many people shoot each other is because they hear music like that, so we should take that music away from them.

Flip: some movie on Cinemax. Some drug dealer is driving around in a cool car with cool music playing, shooting people who get in the way of his drug deals. Later, the heroic cops track him down and shoot him because of all the other people he shot.

Flip: the Discovery Channel. There's a show on about drugs, about the millions of different kinds of drugs there are and the millions of different effects they can have on the human body and the millions of years that people have been using them and the millions of different reasons for which they have been used.

Flip: CNN. Some politician is going on and on about the evils of drugs and saying that the reason so many people shoot each other is because of drugs, so we should take the drugs away from them.

Flip: another commercial. A group of clean, healthy, smiling, well-dressed, bouncy young people (at least one female and two minorities are represented) bounce around having what appears to be a great time. Then we see some stodgy old person drinking the wrong soft drink. We find out that the reason the young people are having so much dam fun is that they drink the right soft drink.

Flip: evening news. Some politician just got busted stealing something and sleeping with somebody. It is expected that he will win his next election, anyway. The economy is going down hill, job opportunities are shrinking, and unemployment is rising. A bunch of people got shot on a subway. People are still getting shot in Bosnia. We see a graph which shows us that, yep, more and more people are getting shot.

Flip: some sitcom. A group of wacky people thrown together in some wacky situation have wacky problems which cause them to say wacky things. The problem is solved in thirty minutes.

Flip: some other sitcom. Different wacky people, different wacky situation, different wacky problems. All wrapped up in thirty minutes.

Flip: evening news. Some politician warns us against extremes, assuring us that compromise is always the preferable solution. He is labeled a "centrist," and wins his election. Meanwhile, a bunch of people got shot in some small town somewhere.

Flip: MTV. A group of dirty, sickly, frowning, poorly-dressed, apathetic young people sing a loud, intrusive song about how everything sucks and everybody is a hypocrite. Who can blame them?

College Republicans break out in riot

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

The freedom of assembly and the freedom of speech are two of our countries most cherished and most sacred rights. However, these freedoms were stretched to the limit at last Tuesday's Republican Club meeting.

The meeting started off fairly well. About fifty students were in attendance — one of the largest turnouts the club has had for an ordinary meeting. Discussion began and soon reached the issue of health care. After several minutes of intense debate, someone suggested watching a tape of a recent Rush Limbaugh Show and hearing his opinion on the subject.

There were mixed reactions, but after taking a vote, it was decided to watch and discuss the tape. The tape began and was watched in relative silence. After the tape ended, discussion continued, only this time the topic was not health care, or Rush's view of health care. It was Rush himself.

One of the students in attendance made a comment that Rush Limbaugh resembled Barbara Bush. After some laughter and a few moments of contemplation, another person suggested that maybe Rush Limbaugh was actually Barbara Bush dressed as a man. There was several minutes of laughter over this different perspective. Then someone else suggested that Barbara Bush was really Rush Limbaugh in drag. By this time many of the students were rolling with laughter.

Things probably would have ended there, but one of the conservative Republicans present was a Rush Limbaugh fan and took offense to the comments. This student then proceeded to punch one of the laughing students in the face.

One student was accidentally hit while trying to breakup the original fight.

He was knocked into another student, who got angry and hit this student back.

This quickly lead to complete chaos. Soon, everyone was fighting. Some were fighting other students while some were just fighting to get to the door.

The near riot was broken up by staff members from Student Development and Career Planning and Placement, as well as Chief Hurst. It took several minutes to get the situation under control.

No one was seriously hurt, and the injuries sustained were mostly bruises. As a result of the Republican Club Riot /the Bush vs. Limbaugh debate (as it is now referred to), the Republican Club is on probation and the Rush Limbaugh Show is banned at all future club meetings.

Career choices. It's all I hear these days. More and more often I'm asked what am I going to do after graduation, and more and more often I have been thinking about that very question. I've decided.

The monastic life was never very appealing to me until I heard some 50-year-old albums of Gregorian chants in the FAC library. The holiness of their sound soothed my senses. I often would recollect these sounds of harmony when I would do caving trips with Mountain Challenge. The peace and tranquility of their lives was sung through their voices.

As a child, I always wondered at the life of the monk. It seemed a simple life, a different life, one untouched by time or civilization. I always had a certain admiration for the hedgehog that played friar Tuck in Disney's version of Robin Hood. Of course, friars are not exactly monks, but the sense of their lives in my young mind was easy to understand.

Have you heard the hit album, "Chant"? The album, featuring the Gregorian chants of a group of European monks, has climbed the charts all over Europe and is now sweeping the American charts as well. The chants were also featured in the album by Enigma, mixing a rap hip hop beat with the singing of monks. All of this is surely a sign. The monastery is calling me.

Lately I've been eyeing a nice little monastery in the hills of Spain. It is hundreds of years old and has a proud tradition. I've always liked the dark halls of Lloyd when all the lights were turned out; that same sense of peaceful darkness can be found in the Saint Dominican Saint Benedictine monasteries.

I have not exactly been what you would call a holy roller. I did go to church as a child. After graduation is the perfect time for me to explore my relationship with God. I also hope to be able to take advantage of my Writing/Communication major by translating Latin texts onto parchment. I may try to convert the monastery to Macintosh computers with software and laserprinters to enhance our parchments. Also, I wonder at the possibility of wearing my Tevas instead of the usual monastic sandal.

One of my major problems is that I've not studied a word of Latin. I have knowledge only of Pig Latin, "hista ditorialea sia a ometecpa iecpa foa aloneyba."

My only other problem with joining the monastery is their oath of celibacy. I will try to satisfy my need for nookie within the six weeks left in my college life.

The decision for the monastic life was a difficult one. I was torn between being a manufacturer for wall-climbing cement holds, a condom-testing center guinea pig, or a computer screen cleaner. I am confident I have chosen well. As the popular verse goes,

Klosterman wins it!

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

Student Senate elections for the '94-95 academic year are over.

Each class elects officers for president, vice-president, and secretary/treasurer. Two senators are elected to represent each class. Commuter senator and residence hall senator elections are held in the fall.

Kelly Garrison, chair of the election committee, said that only the senators have voting power, the officers do not.

Elections were held for student senate president on April 6. Lance Klosterman won the one-sided election after contender Thomas Janeka bowed out.

Elections for the officers and senators for next year were held April 12. A lack of competition plagued all but the freshman class. Garrison said of the turnout, "It is more competitive between them (the rising sophomores) than any other class."

Six freshmen vied for a position in the senate, while two each vied for president and vice-president.

Tiffany Rudicil, one of the candidates, said, "This year, I have learned so much stuff about this school... it's really been a big year for me." She continued, "as a sophomore I can really apply what I learned from this year."

Tammy Bartenfield pushed a strong advertising campaign on campus against opponent Aaron Stone for the office of sophomore president.

Results of the election were: Aaron Stone, president; Jason Thompson, vice-president; Kerry O'Keeffe, secretary/treasurer; Rudicil and Clint Wight, senators.

Rising junior senatorial races were also virtually too easy. Jarra Griffith was the only candidate for

Vision 2000 almost official

by Karen Beaty
Staff Writer

Editor's Note: "The Maryville College 2000 Plan: A Plan for Being the Best Possible College" has not yet been officially approved by the Maryville College Board of Directors. Once it has been named an official document of the college, the "Echo" will be permitted to print it in its entirety.

It is said that a sensitive man wears his heart on his sleeve. If the same analogy holds true, then Dr. Gerald Gibson, Maryville College president, wears his dream on his lapel. Daily, he wears a button with the words "We intend to be the Best Possible College—MC2000" printed in big, bold, orange and garnet letters.

On April 22, the MC Board of Directors will be asked to approve "The Maryville College 2000 Plan" (popularly coined "MC 2000"), a seven-page document enumerating 11 sections in which improvements are to be made to the college: reputation; enrollment; student, faculty, and staff [profiles]; curriculum; financial resources; campus facilities; college community; the college in the external community; and relations with the church. The document outlines specific "strategic goals" the college will aim to accomplish by the year 2000.

Gibson said he thinks of the finished document as a "shared vision of the future."

"We wanted to give people time to respond to it," said Gibson. Conceived by Gibson and developed by several faculty and staff members and students, "MC 2000" is the result of eight months of deliberation, writing, and revising. As early as August, college administrators were participating in "aspiration exercises" to determine where MC was and where they wanted it to go in the future.

The goals outlined are as specific as aiming for a student enrollment of over 1000 students, and maintaining a graduation rate of 50 percent, for example.

"I really want all of [the goals] to happen," said Gibson. "Some faculty and staff members wanted to set priorities, but we really need to do all of these things by the year 2000. Setting priorities is like an admission not to do all of them."

According to Gibson, such "strategic plans" are not unusual for colleges and universities, and it is not unusual that they should be keyed to a specific date—this time, the millennium.

Strategic planning is nothing new to Maryville College. "Vision '94," initiated by former president Richard Ferrin, was a plan of how the college would look in its 175th year.

"[Vision '94] was a success in that it probably saved the college," said Gibson. He said that part of the problem with "Vision '94" was that it had no specific goals, and no programs to seriously implement vast reform.

"MC 2000" takes into consideration those programs and changes

Sullivan speaks on liberal arts

by Josh Hogan
Staff Writer

This April 19th, Maryville students will have a chance to view a presentation by one of today's foremost Medieval scholars. Dr. Richard E. Sullivan, Professor Emeritus, Department of History at Michigan State University will deliver a lecture entitled A Center for the Liberal Arts: A Monastery in the Age of Charlemagne. The lecture is offered to commemorate the 175th anniversary of Maryville College and its tradition of quality liberal arts education.

Dr. Sullivan was born March 27, 1921 in Doniphan, Nebraska; it was there that Sullivan received his primary and secondary education. He followed that education with four years at the University of Nebraska where he graduated with Highest Honors. After service in the United States Army Air Force during World War II, Dr. Sullivan went on to the University of Illinois where he earned his MA (1947) and his PhD (1949) in Medieval History.

The teaching career of Dr. Sullivan began as a Graduate Assistant at the University of Illinois. He followed that with his first position as a professor at Northeast Missouri State College. It was in 1954 that Sullivan began his career at Michigan State as an Assistant Professor. Sullivan became a full professor at Michigan State in 1961 and Professor Emeritus in 1989.

In addition to his long experience as an educator and scholar, Dr. Sullivan has also been deeply involved in the administration of Michigan State. He served as the Chair for the Department of History from 1967 to 1969, and went on to become Dean of the College of Arts and Letters, a duty he performed from 1970 through 1979. He has also served as the Acting Associate Provost, an important administrative position, twice, the latest being 1986-1987.

Yet, all this does not alone show the impact Dr. Sullivan has had on the realm of Medieval History. Dr. Amy Livingstone, one of MC's professors, who was one of Dr. Sullivan's students will readily tell anyone the influence Sullivan has had in his field. She pointed out that one of the major works of scholarship on the early Middle Ages is Sullivan's Heirs of the Roman Empire in which he explores the relationship of the early Middle Ages to the classical period, especially the Roman Empire. She said that the arguments put forward in the book have been widely adopted by historians in general. She called his article, "The Carolingian Age," in the journal, Speculum, "seminal."

Besides writing articles and books, Dr. Sullivan, through his teaching and guidance, has produced many other scholars that have made an impact in the field of Medieval History. His students include Professor John Contreni, Chair of the Department of History at Purdue University and Thomas Noble, Dean of the University of Virginia. Dr. Livingstone said she is "one of many in the family of Sullivan students. He taught us how to be good students and good colleagues."

Perhaps, though, the most concrete example of the impact Dr. Sullivan has made is that he was recently made a fellow of the Medieval Academy of America. It is probably the strongest testimony to his contribution to his field. Dr. Livingstone said, "Only the best and the brightest are given this honor."

Dr. Livingstone thinks that it is Dr. Sullivan's dedication to teaching that is his greatest contribution to his field. "Sullivan," she said, "is unusual in that he teaches by example. He instilled in me the importance of teaching as well as the importance of scholarship."

Dr. Sullivan's lecture will take place Tuesday, April 19 at 12:30p.m. in the FAC Music Hall. There will be a reception for Dr. Sullivan in the evening at 7:00p.m. in the Parlor at Carnegie sponsored by the Humanities Club, Carnegie Hall and Copeland Hall. The History Department and the Humanities Club invite and encourage everyone to come to these events. If you have questions, contact Dr. Livingstone at 981-8233.

VISION

needed to achieve the long-term goal. This fall, Gibson and other administrators will be planning how to finance the changes. In its desire to not become an "elitist" institution, "MC 2000" re-affirms the college's commitment to make its liberal arts education available to deserving students, even those who may fall below the average in national testing. "MC 2000" calls for some kind of "model program" that would give students help in adjusting to college life and academics.

"MC 2000" will be evaluated annually. Gibson said that a progress report will be made by the Presidential Advisory Council (PAC), and given to the college community.

"Public accountability is an important part of strategic planning," said Gibson. "You know how some documents are written, and then they gather dust? That won't happen with this. We will very carefully scrutinize every goal and the progress made on it year by year."

Gibson said he sees "MC 2000" as the "key" to transforming the college. "It causes people to dream about what we can be, and it turns those dreams into reality."

KLOSTERMAN

president while there were no takers for the vice-president position; Josh Hogan accepted the write-in vote. The secretary/treasurer office, for which no one ran, is still under discussion as to which write-in will accept. Ticca Hartsfield and Debbie Shoefelt took their new positions on senate.

Rising senior participation was sparse. Only one ran for the senior vice-president position while one ran for one of the two senate positions available. No one was up for the position of secretary/treasurer. The only contest was between presidential candidates Joe Meyer and Darrien Thomson. Meyer said of why he was running, "I just thought that I could do a good job."

Rachel Winiers, one of those running for senate, said, "I hope I can help Lance with a successful year."

Results of the senior elections were: Thomson, president; Stephanie French, vice-president; Winter and Meyer, senators. The secretary/treasurer position is still being decided from among the write-in candidates.

Senior comps strike campus

by Edie Harmon,
Staff Writer

Spring is finally here, and the moment that they have been praying for is close at hand. Now is the most hectic time for most seniors. They must make sure they have all the requirements for graduation, and complete the dreaded Senior Thesis. Amid all of this hussle and final preparations come the Senior Comprehensive Examinations, or Senior Comps as they are commonly called.

Senior Comps are like the Senior Thesis in that they are unique to Maryville College. Most major universities do not have anything resembling Senior Comps or Senior Thesis. When asked about the reasoning behind Senior Comps, Dean Bolden said, "Comps are intended to be integrative. Its sort of like Senior Thesis. You hate it while you are doing it, but afterward you have this product that you can be proud of. Other schools don't have this."

The guidelines for the exam say it in a nutshell: "The examination is designed to test the breadth and depth of understanding of the field and to assess how well material from the individual courses has been integrated."

The first one of these general guidelines states that the departments must meet well ahead of time to discuss the purpose and the format of the tests. "We meet in November with all the departmental faculty and students," said Dr. Susan Schnibel, head of the Humanities Department. "We want them to understand the format and how we would study for this."

The second guideline says that either the department or individual faculty must discuss the results of the exams with students. The tests are held in early April partly to give time to conduct these discussions.

The third guideline says that if the exams are failed, then the entire exam must be repeated. However, some departments allow students to repeat portions, such as oral components, or national professional examinations. Generally students who fail Senior Comps must wait until the next semester to retake them.

The fourth guideline says that the creation and grading of the tests should be done by a joint effort of the department faculty. This overlaps the fifth guideline which says that the focus of Senior Comps is not on individual courses, but on groups of courses and the major as a whole. "We're looking to see how well integrated the related course material is," said Schnibel.

The sixth guideline states that the exam is taken over the course of two days, and that generally the time limits for the exam two and a half hours each day are. This year the exam dates were April 14 and 15.

The seventh guideline regards the written test. It says that more than one format should be used. For example, not all the test should be essay.

The eighth guideline says that the departments must have a formal meeting after the exams are over to evaluate the major and individual courses.

However, there are departments that have components other than the written test. One such department is the Fine Arts Department. There are three parts to both the art and music major comps.

The music comps have a music theory section, a music history section, and a special field exam. All music majors must take the first two sections. They are both written tests. The third section does involve a performance. Senior Recitals are not the same as the performance part of Senior Comps. The

Dr. Griffiths dies at 90

Dr. Fred A. Griffiths, who a former faculty advisor for The Highland Echo and for the Chilhowean, passed away earlier this month. He would have been 91.

Dr. Griffiths, known affectionately to generations of MC students as "Doc," and to his many friends and colleagues as "Hiro," taught chemistry for 43 years at the College. He also served as manager of the bookstore and post office in addition to his work as a professor.

Born in Philadelphia, TN in Loudon County, Dr. Griffiths came to Maryville College when the College still operated a preparatory school. He came for his senior year in high school after graduating from Bogart High School. He graduated from the College in 1925 and did clinical work for the E.I. DuPont Company. He was named Instructor in Chemistry in 1925, was Associate Professor from 1930 to 1937, and Professor from 1937 to 1968, when he retired. He was named Chair of the Science Department in 1950.

He held the Master of Science degree from Iowa State University and the Ph.D. from Indiana University.

In 1987, he was awarded the College's Alumni Citation. He is listed as Professor Emeriti in the College Catalog.

He and his wife Ruby have lived for many years just off the campus on Jones Ave. They are members of Highland Presbyterian Church.

Senior Exhibit Opening

"Astrological Imagery in Art," is the subject of the senior art exhibit by Maryville College student Alene Day in the Art Gallery of the Fine Arts Center. The exhibit will be shown April 29 to May 16. The gallery is open from 9AM to 5PM Monday through Friday. There is no charge for admission.

A reception at the opening will be held at 8PM on the opening day in the FAC lounge.

The subject matter includes the zodiac and the elements of nature. The work includes black and white photographs, three-dimensional mannequins, and posters.

performance part of the music comps are not open. Only the student and department professors are in attendance.

The art comps are a little different. Part of the art comps are the Senior Exhibits. These are open to the public and are on display in the lobby of the Fine Arts building.

Currently the exhibit on display is by Gordon Wright, III. It will run through April 29. The next exhibit will be presented by Senior Alene Day. Her exhibit will be open from April 29 to May 15.

Several recitals are planned between now and the end of the semester. On April 14 at 8 p.m. Elias Smith and Robert Ford Corrigan will perform in the Music Hall. On April 29 Masayo Ohashi will give a senior recital at 8 p.m. in the Music

Seniors faced Comps knowing May 15 will soon be here.

Rainy season won't stop Scots

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

Now with a total of ten rain out games, the Maryville College Baseball team is looking for a good month of April and a strong finish. The Scots' record now stands at 6-8 as of April 11, but could quickly turn this around with a good showing in April.

"Because of all the rain outs, April is going to be a really hectic month for us. We decided not to try to extend the season into May because of graduation," said Coach Eric Etchison, head coach of the Scots' Baseball team.

Despite standing two games below .500, the Scots' have had many bright spots this season. Etchison continued to praise his freshman who have played well from the start of the season. Freshman Chuckie Yates and Ryan Rogers are still two of the leading hitters for the Scots'. Yates is still leading the team with a .452 batting average as of April 6. Rogers is fourth with a .333 batting average.

As well as the strong play by the freshman, the upperclassmen have also been a steadying force for the Scots'. Also leading the club offensively, which Etchison pointed out as the strength of the years squad, is Senior Jeff Rosa with a .400 batting average, including six doubles and six runs batted in. Another key contributor is Junior John Roszell, who has a .355 batting average, with one home run and six runs batting average, with one home run and six runs batted in.

Three freshman continue to lead this year's team from the mound. Jason Pitts now has a 1-1 record, with two saves and an impressive 1.00 earned run average. Chris Baniel is 2-1 with a 4.12 earned run average and Jason Kallenberg is 2-2 with a 4.44 earned run average, which puts them third and fourth on the team.

The Scots' are still without their second leading pitcher who remains out for an indefinite amount of time due to an injury. Sophomore David Forster was hit with a line drive that broke his jaw in two places and required surgery. Forster was 0-2, but with an impressive 1.86 earned run average.

Some recent Scots' action included a game against Tennessee Wesleyan at home on March 29. Despite dropping the contest by the score of 11-7, Etchison complemented his team efforts.

"We played really well, but our defense just didn't come through. Six of the eleven runs scored against us were unearned," said Etchison.

On April 8 the sun finally came out as the Scots' took the field at home against the Cumberland, KY Indians. The home team split the double header with a 2-1 victory and a 4-2 loss.

The first game was a thriller that took extra innings to decide. Through six innings the score had the home team clinging to a 1-0 lead. Cumberland then responded with a run in the top of the seventh inning. With the score tied 1-1 the Scots' came to bat in the bottom of the seventh. Freshman Andy Moss lead the inning off with a single. Next, Freshman Wes Farragut followed with a sacrifice bunt to move Moss to second, but a terrific play resulted in a double by the Indians to end the Scots' threat. The teams went to extra innings.

Senior Mark Curtis, who started the game on the mound for the Scots', continued pitching a superb game into the top of the eighth inning. The Indians again threatened in this inning, but a diving catch in left field by Moss ended that half of the inning. Then it was the Scots' turn to bat and it did not take them long to get something started. Freshman Myong Kim lead off with a single. Roszell then followed with a sacrifice to move Kim to second to set the table for Rosa. Rosa only needed one pitch, as he drove the ball to right to score Kim and give the Scots' the victory. Curtis got the win and the Scots' record improved to 6-6.

In the second game of the double header the Indians struck first and held on for a 4-2 victory. The Scots' twice had chances to get even, but both times they could not come up with a two out hit. In the fourth and the fifth innings the Scots' scored a run to get back into the game, but both times runners were left on base. Kallenberg pitched well, but took the loss. He allowed only one earned run in seven innings of work.

The next opponents for the Scots' were the Wasps from Emory and Henry. The Scots traveled to Virginia on April 10 for a double header. The first game saw both teams with chances early, but it was the Wasps that got up and seemed ready to win the game until Freshman Ryan Rogers belted a three run homer in the top of the seventh to tie the score up. However, this would not be enough as the Wasps would come right back in the bottom of the same inning to score the winning run. The final score was 8-7.

The second game of the double header was canceled because of the rain.

The Scots', weather permitting, will play next at Shorter, GA on April 22 and then a make-up game against Tennessee Wesleyan on April 25, which is away as well. With as many games that the Scots' have scheduled for April, the team will have a chance to not only finish strong this season, but also build toward next year.

Sound of Voice heard in theatre

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

"It's a bittersweet fairy tale," Junior Brian Prather said when describing "The Sound of a Voice," his directing class production.

The play was written by David Henry Hwang, who is well-known for his play M. Butterfly. It tells the story of the relationship between a man and a woman in medieval Japan.

"This is something that's really going to reach the audience," Prather said of the play. "There are moments of really great comedy that go directly into scenes of heart-wrenching tragedy."

In the play the woman lives alone in the forest. Rumors about her abound in the neighboring villages. The man becomes curious and goes to see her for himself. What occurs after he arrives at her house is the storyline of the play.

When asked about directing a show for the first time, Prather responded, "It's not like being God, but it's really close."

Although he misses being on stage, Prather said, "I really like directing. It's given me an opportunity I haven't had before."

The man will be played by Darrien Thomson. Eisha Neely will perform the role of the woman.

The stage manager is Sarah Stevenson, assisted by Melody Alexander. Other technical and backstage assistance will be given by Kathryn McDonald, Ronald Moore, and Kim Schuenemann. Scott Kiser and Tiffany Rudicil are the understudies.

The performance of "The Sound of a Voice" will be on May 5 at 8:00p. m. in the theatre. Admission is free to everyone.

E-club to host earth day

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff writer

The Maryville College Environmental Club will be celebrating Earth Day, April 22, with a variety of activities that they hope will make a lasting impression on MC students.

The club will be sponsoring a non-driving day, which they hope will involve all students. Club members will collect participant's car keys at the beginning of the day, and return the keys at the end of the day, to emphasize that automobiles are not the only means of transportation available for the college student. With a little planning it is often as convenient to walk or ride a bicycle somewhere as to drive. The collection will take place outside of Pearsons.

There will also be a club sponsored band playing in the amphitheater in the college woods, beginning at 4 p. m. In case of rain the band will play in Lloyd basement.

There will be posters with environmental facts placed on Sutton Science wall, such as a collage about endangered species.

In addition, the club had a booth at Blister in the Sun, held April 16. They sold beaded jewelry.

The Environmental Club is also in the process of adopting the stream in the college woods.

The beaded jewelry will be available after Blister, as well as Earth day tee shirts. Anyone interested in purchasing Environmental Club souvenirs should call Nikki Masters at 8375.

White chicks at Morningside

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

"And it isn't just a clever title," Junior Mike Wilson said of his directing class production "A Couple of White Chicks Sitting Around Talking" by John Ford Noonan. "That's pretty much what it's about."

The action of the show does indeed revolve around the growing friendship of the two characters, Hanna Mae and Maude, and their friendship does develop mainly from their conversations.

However, that does not mean that this will be a production without action. It promises to be full of surprises.

One of the main reasons that this show will be a little out of the ordinary is that it is a dinner theatre. "It's more of a challenge for the actors," Wilson said.

The performances will take place at Morningside Inn. "The audience is right in the actor's face, more or less," Wilson added.

While the cast and crew agreed that they appreciate the challenge of working within the space of the inn, they do admit that it limits them in some ways. The set must be collapsible and movable. The lighting will most likely be provided by the overhead lights already in use at the inn instead of by portable stage lighting.

While the cast and crew agreed that they appreciate the challenge of working within these limits, they do admit that it can be frustrating.

"I feel like I have less control over my atmosphere," Wilson said. He also mentioned that having to work with the managers of Morningside as well as coordinating schedules with the cast and crew can add to the amount of work.

"It's really professional theatre," Senior Julie Walker said.

Walker will perform the role of Maude. The role of Hanna Mae will be performed by Nancy Allen.

Chris Lance is stage managing the production with assistance from Erin Rice. Tiffany Rudicil is the understudy.

Performances will be on May 6 and 7 at Morningside. The buffet dinner will begin at 6:30p. m. The show will begin at 8:00p. m.

Tickets are $20. For reservations, call Morningside Inn at 982-1735.

175th Logo to appear on Coke bottle

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

Students, faculty, and community members have been noticing it in many places. It can be found on banners, on stationary, on the phone book, on the handbook, and many other locations.

The Maryville College 175th Anniversary logo seems to have been appearing everywhere lately.

Soon, there will be another item to add to this list. In honor of MC's Anniversary celebration, the Coca-Cola Bottling Company of Knoxville is going to make a commemorative 8oz bottle of Coca-Cola Classic.

Thirty thousand bottles will be available in Blount County later on this year. The college is going to set aside a portion of these for students, alumni, and others to purchase on campus.

For more information, call the Office of Communications at 981-8209.

In 1949, an architectural undertaking unlike any other began. The Fine Arts Center, known as the FAC, was one of a new breed of architecture that dominated the age.

After Voorhees Chapel burned in 1947, a campaign was underway to build a new chapel. In connection with a new chapel, plans for a consolidated music/art building were also established. The MC student body at the time was made up of 50 percent teachers, 17 percent ministers, and the rest in other fields. Over two-thirds of the students took music courses.

Constructed by Johnson and Willard of Knoxville according to the architectural plan of Schweiker and Elting, ground was broken on Founders Day, Oct. 29, 1949. By Sept. 1950 faculty and students moved in to a very different style of architecture. It was dedicated May 10-13, 1951.

The $500,000 FAC was unique because everything inside was exposed. All pipes, beams and other parts of the building stick out of it, and writers of Architectural Record Dec. 1951 said that the construction workers had some trouble understanding the concept behind the FAC.

Thelma Bianco, instructor of visual arts, said of the aesthetics of the FAC, "All the rhythms, the lights, the darks, the repetition, the asymmetrical designs . . . are aesthetically pleasing."

The article said of the new FAC, "The new Fine Arts Building at Maryville College, whether to concentrate on its complete integrity, on its close approach to functional perfection, or on the romantic revolution it has precipitated on a campus which is extremely pleasant but not otherwise too distinguished architecturally."

The finished product, at 375 feet long with a crosswing of 190 feet, had 35 sound-treated practice rooms for music, 12 music teaching studios, a rehearsal room, studios for the visual arts, a 60-foot art gallery, a fine arts library, listening rooms, radio control room and studio, a lounge, a kitchenette, offices, storage rooms, five classrooms, a 254-seat music hall, and an 80-foot outdoor stage between music hall and lounge. Also, a large piano elevator, which stops at five levels inside the FAC and a sloped ramp comes up behind the music hall which is used for moving pianos inside. Little has been changed in today's FAC, except for additions to the painting studio and the band building.

The exterior is made of Californian redwood. Natural birch was used for the interiors and furniture.

Fir was used for the doors and windows. Some of that fir has rotted; according to Bianco, the window and door frames were supposed to be made of aluminum. The Korean War caused a shortage of aluminum, so the builders opted for fir.

Architects also purposefully designed the practice rooms to face away from the campus so that campus noise would not interfere with music practice.

Bianco said that the location was not a good one, citing that all the rainwater from every rainfall drains down into the FAC instead of away from it.

The recent heavy rains have posed a particular problem this year; Dr. Daniel Taddie, Chair of the Fine Arts Division, said, "It's terrible. We're flooded!" Taddie's office was still drying out days after the recent downpours.

On the lower floors, water drips from ceilings and puddles can be found in the hallways; rugs have become completely soaked. "The college needs to issue hardhats, gas masks, rubber boots, hip-waders . . .," said Bianco. She remarked that "big chunks of ceiling have fallen in."

Another prominent feature of the FAC is the large Holtkamp organ which dominates the stage of the music hall.

For three weeks, workers toiled continuously to finish the installation of the new organ. Manufactured in Cleveland, OH, the organ cost approximately $25,000. The instrument is based on the principles of the 17th and 18th centuries. It has 1,856 pipes.

Today, the FAC retains the same qualities as it did over forty years ago. Student recitals, guests-in-residence, Community Forums, and special presentations are given every year.

Wilson Chapel—it's not your father's Oldsmobile

by Jeff Huffman
Staff Writer

Wilson Chapel was the second undertaking of a joint venture by MC to replace the Voorhees Chapel, which burned in 1947. The mostly brick building underwent nine different proposals. The final product ended up larger than the old chapel, holding both a chapel and a theater. The building has 44,738 square feet of floor and is the length of a football field. The Chapel Court is 696,000 cubic feet. In the building's dedication on May 16, 1954, the numbers were given: Wilson Chapel is a mix of 4,800 tons of concrete, 202 tons of steel, 22,750 lbs. of glass, and 3,172,000 pounds of brick.

Inside is a little chapel, built at a cost of $25,000. The 1,180 seat chapel is used for official college ceremonies, MACCO (Maryville College Community Orchestra) concerts, and other musical performances. The $15,000 organ accompanies ceremonies such as convocation.

The fully equipped theater, having 460 seats, has an extensive system to create the backgrounds for the various performances. Several rooms, including costume rooms and the green room as well as a workshop are behind stage. On the second floor is a computer lab and small library for the CELL (Center for English Language and Learning) computer lab.

Offices for the education department and the theater department are located in Wilson.

On Saturdays, Wilson is converted into a Japanese school for Japanese children from the community. Their culture and language are instructed at elementary, junior and high school levels.

Editorial

I would have to say that one of the more difficult things about writing an editorial would be selecting a topic. It is almost as if you have the freedom of a column, but not quite. I guess a great deal of it just comes to indecisiveness. I can't decide what to write my editorial about, or for some, what my major is, and for even more, what I want to do with my life.

What am I going to do with my life? I can truthfully answer that I really do not know at this point, and I am not acting under those pretenses at this college. I have declared a major, something that you are practically forced into doing near the close of your freshman year, but to what avail have I done so?

How many times have you said to your advisor or a professor "I really don't know what I'm going to do with my life?" I, for one, have said that on one too many occasions—I prefer to have some sort of focus to my life, a purpose if you will.

How many times has that advisor or professor told you that "you have plenty of time" to figure out where you are going, and what you are doing?

How many of you don't buy that? I know I don't, I think.

By the time this paper is sent to press, printed, and distributed (and some of you toss copies of it into the recycling bin) Senior Comps will have been completed, and the deadline for the Senior Thesis will be rapidly approaching. Of course, none of this should phase me, but it does.

Talking to seniors, I can't help thinking about what my undergraduate career will boil down to, a nightmare of a test, and a topic that most people have told me I will learn to hate. By the time I have completed those two tasks I will undoubtedly be ready to leave Maryville and embark upon my career (or grad school). But will I know by then what my purpose in life is?

My twenty-six year-old cousin is working in New York for an insurance firm—

Dear Editor,

Recently, after hearing many people on campus spouting out ideas of "intellectual debates" and "no stimulating intellectual conversation on campus" and generally just "nothing to do", I have come to the conclusion that most of these people have not looked at or do not care about their surroundings at MC. They are more than willing to sit around and whine about their lack of intellectual development when they could be broadening their horizons with theatre, music, drama, debates in clubs, or even becoming involved in classroom discussions. Some of the people with this attitude have been trying to get some things done, but in their own little elitist way. I have heard of a "intellectual discussion" that is being planned by some students. But rather than making a big noise about this or putting up posters, they are only inviting the "intellectuals" on campus. They are finding a private room, and not allowing the general population of the school to participate, or even just listen to their "intellectual" conversation, presumably because us normal, stupid folk won't be able to understand it. When I was trying to find out more about this "intellectual discussion" and why it was not open to the general body of students I got a series of responses that amounted to "Because we don't want anyone but the 'intellectuals' in our group, and other people won't understand or won't care". Which, from the list of names I got, means that everyone who is hip and cool at this college has magically been transformed into a certified Maryville College "intellectual". I don't know about any other people at this school, but I can truthfully say that there are people that have dropped out of school in eighth grade that I would rather spend my time with than these self-proclaimed "intellectuals" at Maryville College.

I can understand the desire for growth in the area of academics. But, can't we all lose the elitist attitude that seems to be prevalent and let whomever is interested participate, not only the "intellectuals"? Do something other than complain. Lose the attitudes and start a new club. Go to a Humanities club meeting. Get out and make this campus what you want it to be, but let everyone be involved.

he received his BA in History from the University of Virginia.

My uncle, a Federal Reserve employee and church musician couldn't remember what he received his undergrad degree in. "English I think. No," thoughtful pause, "that was your mom."

Today a friend of mine, who will be graduating in May, turned to me and asked, "Paul, what am I going to do with my life?"

Another friend, Jeff Huffman would probably like to spend the rest of his life biking around the world (if not Tennessee), and I sincerely wish he could, but he probably can't. That's a crying shame.

I probably won't be able to grow up to be Superman or a firetruck either. It really sucks.

Remember when people told you that you could be anything you want to be, as long as you put your mind to it? That's probably one of the biggest lies manufactured by modern science.

Sure, I've read about the son of the migrant farmer who made it through Harvard Medical school, and the Cambodian orphan who is completing law school next year and has a bright and shining future. That's great, wonderful, but they are the exception to the rule. Not all of us can be president, or Superman, or a firetruck for that matter.

Isn't that a shame, that we can't necessarily follow our dreams.

So what do we do, where do we go from Maryville?

Does anyone have a real lot in life, a certain goal to accomplish? Or are we all just bits of flotsam, following no real pre-destined path, but not quite in control of ourselves either?

I refuse to believe that! I would like to think that we each have a choice in what we do with our lives, maybe we can't be Superman, or the president, but that doesn't mean that we have absolutely no control over our lives either.

So what do the majority of us do when the uncertainty of the future exerts itself on our lives?

We grasp at anything, vainly attempting to establish a blissful distraction from our future.

We hold fast to our families, our friends, and our relationships.

We throw ourselves into activities, seize responsibilities, and "burn our wicks at both ends."

We run till we can't see, bike till we puke, climb, paddle, and jump from cliffs.

We drink, we smoke, we get drunk, and we get stoned.

We write, argue religious and philosophical matters, and we become workaholics.

We do everything we can to ignore the inevitable question as to what our lives will be.

I know that I'm guilty of using more than one of those activities as a means of avoidance.

The real question (and I know that I've probably asked one too many in this editorial), is this—is it worth it to worry, to really lose sleep over my future nightly? I heard somewhere that the average individual changes careers three times in his or her lifetime. I can honestly say, however, that I do not want to be that average individual, I'm pretty sure that I would be satisfied with one career.

Maybe we don't need to worry, maybe we don't need to lose sleep over the whole situation. Maybe the best thing to do is to just take things as they come, and deal with life on a daily basis.

Probably not.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR...

The Echo welcomes your comments, letters and guest columns. All written material to be published in the Echo must be accompanied by your name and post office box number. We hope to see you in the Echo soon! Send material to The Highland Echo, Box 2407.

by Dave Roberts

Hey, kids, welcome to the next-to-last Dave's World.

You know, it's a shame—all the sudden I'm at the end of my column writing career and I'm suddenly thinking of a million things that I've been wanting to say all along. I just kept putting it off, and now a lot of the things I wanted to say will never be said (or at least not in Dave's World). I'm going to condense several of those things into this column and save one issue that is particularly important to me for my last Dave's World (oooooh, coming attractions!). Okay, here goes:

The world is changing. I don't mean change in the sense that politicians use it; it is not a soundbite. When Bill Clinton asked us to "vote for change" he could just as well have asked us to "vote for gravity" or "vote for cause and effect" or "vote for gossip on a small campus." These things are forces of nature, not subject to human control. The world is not changing simply because politicians or even common folk are changing it, but because change is a fundamental aspect of reality.

The entire universe is characterized by movement and change. People are fighting, rocks are eroding, your blood is flowing, molecules are reacting with one another, electrons are spinning around nuclei, and subatomic particles are popping into and out of existence (and Heisenburg's Uncertainty Principle tells us that we cannot accurately predict their position at any given time... at the most elemental level, energy and mass dance together in chaos that is beyond our understanding).

Do you know that modern science has been able to convert mass into energy? That suggests that mass is essentially just another form of energy (remember  $E=mc^2$ ). We are light, and light never rests. It is not accident that the great mystics have experienced enlightenment.

The modern world has not quite assimilated this information into popular attitudes; people still cling to the Platonic idea that there is an ideal world of static forms which we strive to emulate. The fathers of our science and our philosophy valued "objectivity" and we still cling to the idea of it, though modern physics has clearly demonstrated that one's perspective on anything depends entirely on one's position relative to it. To view something objectively, one must find a position beyond the movement and interrelated forces of the universe from which to view it, and that just ain't possible.

There is no such thing as an objective view of things, physically or socio-historically; there's no ivory tower.

Most (though not all) philosophies since Plato, at least Western philosophies, have viewed reality primarily in terms of matter or form, with movement and relativity viewed as regrettable weaknesses. They ask the question: how reliable are imperfect human perceptions of unchanging reality? But why have we viewed reality this way? Many reasons. For one thing, Christianity's God is immovable, absolute, and unchanging, right? He is perfect, and He created the earth and its people, so why should the earth or its people change? Why would a perfect being's creation change? So naturally we should strive for that ideal of impassive concrete-ness, right? In government, religion, and (until very recently) popular culture, the dominant models have assumed that a static set of rules and customs is the best way of dealing with a static reality. Therein lies the immense power of habit and tradition. Therein lies the power of doctrine and dogma. Therein lies the power of the student handbook.

I would like to see this attitude change, starting with this fricking school.

This metaphysical weirdness that I've been rambling about speaks directly to Maryville College. There is an attitude here and all over the south that resists change. But let's face it, kids, change is a fact of life, and no matter how hard we try to establish routines and surround ourselves with an insular cocoon of complacency, in the world outside of Podunk, Tennessee, lots of shit is going on.

Our society, nay, our whole world is in the throes of growing pains. Tribal territorialism is making a comeback—which in my opinion is symbolic of a frightened reaction to the mind-boggling pace of change in the twentieth century. No one quite knows how to deal with the "New World Order," with its small competing states and continually shifting balances of power.

People are reaching for something firm to hold on to, and without a new way of thinking available to them, they desperately hold on to ancestral, economic, religious, or territorial bonds (Russia and the Slavic states, Bosnia, Africa, North Korea, South Central Lost Angeles... the examples abound).

So what to do?

Institutions will change when the attitudes of the people involved in them change. Though the idea has been derided by some and forgotten by others, I still believe that philosophy is the engine that drives social and economic changes. As my pet author Tom Robbins says (I'm paraphrasing), the best way to change the world is to act as though it has already changed. Don't accept the rules and forms of society as if they were written in stone. Understand that without an element of adventure, an element of rebellion, an element of novelty... well, let's put it this way: unless you stir society up frequently, nasty stuff collects at the bottom (like the sludge in the cafeteria's melted butter) and a nasty, impenetrable crust forms over the top (like the skin on top of the cafeteria's syrup).

Societies which become too rigid in their ways tumble before the ever-shifting winds of history. It has happened to every major empire in history, and we are not immune. Think things over, look at the world around you with a critical eye, and question everything.

There are many things I love about Maryville (yes, it's true... I just don't write about them much). I have become an adult while I have been here, and the friendships I have made and the things I have learned here have enriched my life immensely (and all those other high school yearbook clichés). However, over the course of four years, this college has pissed me off quite a bit as well (surprise). It seems like people around here don't give much of a damn about anything, like they want to hide in a fog of mediocrity and escape the disturbing hands of ambition and rebellion. Only one person ran for president of the student body! I mean, come on!

Where are the raucous all-night parties, the political demonstrations, the radical questioning of tradition and all that other stuff that college is supposed to be about? We are young students; we are supposed to be the people who learn about and question the Western intellectual tradition. And yet the majority of the people I see around me look like freaking clones, with their little ball caps and their little t-shirts with sports logos on them and their little jeans and their little Nike shoes. So many people here seem to seek the norm and are terrified when they can't figure out what mold to fit into. They seem to be trying to ensure themselves against change, hiding in their little cliques and trying to blend in, grazing with the rest of the sheep. Baaaaaaa!

(In that vein, let me say something I've been wanting to say for four years: college and professional sports are pretty exciting, I guess, but they are only games! Can't the guys on this campus find something else to talk about? What value is there in basing your whole life on games other people are playing and getting paid millions for? We don't even have athletic scholarships here, and yet half the student body seems to care about nothing else but sports. Find your own thoughts, your own pursuits, and quit feeding like passive leeches off the essentially insular sports industry, which basically has no effect on society except to feed its own bloated existence.)

To conclude: don't hide from change, embrace it. Try to react to changes with grace and intelligence rather than fear and rigidity. Ride the wave, dude! And do not be so quick to condemn those who find ways of dealing with life's chaos that are different than yours (having said that, I must apologize for my tirade against sports above).

Understand that each individual must find his or her own way; try to encourage and support, or at the very least tolerate, the diversity of expression and behavior that makes the human race so bitchin'. Realize that all things are connected, and try to make your many relationships harmonious. Above all, respect on another. And get off your ass and do something, become someone unique, learn as much as you can about the world around you, enough to realize that you control the future. Try to mix a few chocolate chips into the vanilla ice cream of Maryville College. I can tell you as a senior: vanilla gets old.

See you one more time, kids. Increase the peace.

Student senate takes stand against secret societies

by Karen Beatty
Assistant Editor

After debating for weeks, the student senate of Maryville College addressed the controversy surrounding secret societies and their roles on campus by issuing a statement. For the past two weeks, senate members have been holding discussions in each residence hall to both inform and warn students about the senate's stance and the consequences of associating with an "unauthorized" group or organization.

"Whether or not it changes something is not the point," said president-elect Lance Klosterman. "What this is is an official statement from senate saying that we don't want these groups on our campus breaking down community."

Klosterman went on to say that writing the statement was prompted by a campus-wide concern over activities that were being associated with secret societies.

"We felt that we needed to address hazing, alcohol and drug abuse, and other things that are connected with these groups, or so they seem," Klosterman said.

According to the president-elect, there has been dispute, but it was not as controversial as he expected. And, he said some people were upset about being singled-out—namely, the "KOX" and their "Sweethearts."

Klosterman said that those groups were mentioned because of their visibility. "This is about groups on campus. They are the only ones we have proof of. I can see a hat. I can see a shirt," he explained, "but I'm not saying that if they're quiet, everything's O.K. I don't want these groups advertising and associating with the Maryville College campus."

"We can't always pass power-house legislation to change stuff," said Klosterman. "Sometimes we have to make a statement. And that's what we did."

Student Senate Unauthorized Clubs and Organizations

Deeply concerned, that members of our community are endangering themselves and others;

Committed, to maintaining and strengthening the academic and communal climate of our campus;

Desiring, to legislate according to the ideals espoused in the Campus Covenant;

Recognizing, that one goal of our community is to allow for individual growth, but that we cannot serve the needs of the individual over the needs of the community;

Demanding, that our community standards be upheld;

1. Condemns, the activities (hazing, harassment, intimidation, irresponsible consumption of alcohol, contributing to the amount of illegal drugs available on campus, etc.) of groups such as the KOX and their sister group the Sweethearts;

2. Declares, the activities of these groups and the behavior which they have come to represent, to be completely unacceptable and undesirable in our community;

3. Further declares, that any group heretofore authorized or unauthorized, and characterized by any of the following:

- blatant and wanton disregard of College policy regarding alcohol and drugs,
- hazing, harassment, or intimidation of students, faculty, and/or staff
- exclusivity in membership (denying individuals an equal opportunity for membership)
- lack of redeeming value to the Campus community,

e. an open, uninvited, and unauthorized affiliation with Maryville College, to be undesirable and inappropriate in our community;

4. Unequivocally states, the Student Senate, in keeping with the Maryville College Statement of Purpose, condemns and deplores the activities and detrimental philosophies of these groups and the unavoidable separation they cause in our community.

"Well, you see"—

Student Senate President Jennifer McCafferty addressed the MC Board of Directors April 22. Informing members of policy changes made this year regarding student life, McCafferty said they gave students a "sobering, at times frightening, sense of responsibility." At the meeting, the board officially approved the MC Covenant.

Best Buddies comes back to MC to help mentally challenged in the community

by Jennifer Newcome
Staff Writer

Best Buddies, a service organization for college students, is being revived on the Maryville College campus after a two year hiatus.

According to its mission statement, Best Buddies is a "college-based volunteer program designed to promote very special, lasting friendships between college students and persons with mental retardation."

Sophomore Laurie Cribb became interested in Best Buddies when she found a pamphlet about the organization in the campus post office and contacted Shelley Conrad, the southern regional director.

According to Cribb, she discovered that the program has been absent on campus and decided to assist in bringing the organization back to life. She emphasized that students will not have to participate in a specific program of activities with their "buddies." Friendships between individuals are accomplished "through group events, one-on-one activities, phone calls, letters, movies, ball games, picnics, and many other kinds of activities," said Cribb.

Next year, Maryville College students who belong to Best Buddies will be matched with clients from Douglas Cooperative of Maryville. The clients contract out work with various businesses, such as Marriott Food Services, which is affiliated with Maryville College.

The average age of the "buddies" is between 18 and 24.

Senior Chris Rapp was a member of the Best Buddies organization during the '91-'92 school year. Rapp said she and her buddy discussed everything from television shows to classic rock, and although the time spent was not as much as she would have liked, she said she found the experience rewarding and enjoyable.

Stephen Nickle, MC chaplain and director of Volunteer Services, is assisting Cribb in her efforts. He emphasized the beneficial aspects of the Best Buddy friendships for both parties in the relationship.

"People are often under the impression that because they are not physically or mentally challenged, they are not developmentally disabled. However, everyone has his own handicap—whether mental, physical, emotional, or spiritual. By being a part of a relationship with an individual who is developmentally delayed, people learn to recognize their own limitations, and how to overcome these limitations. Through these relationships, people also learn how to recognize their giftedness and how to better use it," said Nickle.

This summer Cribb will attend a national training conference in Miami, FL, in preparation to lead the organization at MC.

Information booths will be set up during the Activity Fair in the fall of '94.

Any person interested in learning more about Best Buddies is urged to contact Laurie Cribb, Box 2349.

Baseball Scots end strong '94 season

by Chris Stephens
Staff writer

Shortly after the tough 8-7 loss to the Emory and Henry Wasps on April 10, the Maryville College Scots' baseball team would put together a string of victories while possibly playing the best baseball of the season.

The winning streak started with a sweep of Knoxville College on April 12. The scores of these games were 8-7 and 15-2. In the first game of the double header, Junior John Roszell came up big from the plate with two home runs and five runs batted in. Sophomore Dough Parris picked up the win in relief of Freshman Jason Kallenberg. In the second game the Scots exploded offensively with 15 runs, including three home runs. Senior Jeff Rosa, Roszell, and Freshman Ben Batchelor all played long balls as the Scots' cruised to the easy victory.

The next hurdle for the Scots' came in a double header against a tough Centre College team. The Scots' came out victorious twice by the scores of 3-2 and 14-3.

The first game was an extra inning affair that saw the Scots' come back in the bottom of the seventh with three runs and then win the game in the bottom of the eighth when Roszell hit a sacrifice fly to score Freshman Mike Johnson. Senior Mark Curtis got the win while picking up eight strike outs. Then in the second game it was the Scots' again coming through at the plate. Once again they were lead by Roszell who had four hits and four runs batted in. Stephen Coleman picked up the win and Parris got the save.

Now with a record of 10-8, the Scots' were waiting for the Wasps when they arrived on April 16. The Scots ended up splitting the two games, ending their winning streak, but if not for one sluggish inning the results may have been different.

In the first game the Wasps jumped on the Scots with seven runs in the first inning. Then Parris entered with still no outs in the inning. He not only guided the home team out of trouble in that inning, but pitched the rest of the game allowing no runs. The final score was 7-4.

The second game was decided in the bottom of the eighth as the Scots' pulled out the victory when Freshman Andy Moss scored on a wild pitch. The final score was 8-7 as Curtis earned the win.

This win improved the Scots' record to 11-9 and was a preview of still better things to come. The Scots' once again took the field at home and once again came out with a victory. Their victim this time was Savannah College from Savannah, Georgia. The final score was 6-4 and the winning pitcher was Chris Daniels. Roszell, Curtis, and Freshman Myong Kimm each contributed two runs batted in.

The Scots' record improved to 14-9 following their sweep of Tennessee Temple in a double header. The scores of the two games that took place on April 12 were 9-1 in the first game and 15-2 in the second game. In the first game the Scots' fell behind in the top of the first, 1-0, but responded immediately with four in the bottom of the inning. The key hit in this inning was delivered by Sophomore David Forster, who was seeing his first extended action since breaking his jaw and undergoing surgery. With the bases loaded Forster hit a single to score two runs. He ended the day 2-3 with those two runs batted in.

The Scots' were not finished from the plate, however, as they would score five more runs before they were finished to make it 9-1. Freshman Joe Wilson went the distance for the home team, earning his first college win.

The second game was just more of the same for the Scots'. The home team scored once in the first and never looked back. Tennessee Temple did tie the score once in the top of the second, but they would never get any closer. The Scots' scored three in the bottom of the second, one in the fourth, and 11 in the sixth.

Almost everybody got in on the action, but it was Freshman Chuckie Yates who stole the show with a home run, a double, and four runs batted in. Rosa earned the win for the Scots' after seeing his first action on the mound. He started the game by striking out two of the three batters he faced, and then did himself one better to end the game by striking out the side.

The Scots' then went on the road on April 22 to Shorter, Georgia and then on April 24 to Emory College. Following these weekend games, that saw the Scots' drop three of four, the Scots' traveled to Tennessee Wesleyan for one more make up game. The Scots' lost this game to a very good Wesleyan team by a score of 9-2.

The Scots' season came to an end on April 26 at home against Knoxville College. The Scots' split the two games. They dropped the first one by the score of 5-2 and then won the second game 11-6. In the first game, Knoxville College got up 5-2 and then played a solid defense to preserve the victory.

In the second game, the visitors once again got up early, but could not hold on as the Scots' offense out-hit them. With Knoxville up 2-0 in the bottom of the first, the home team responded with five runs of their own. Yates got it started with a single and a stolen base. Kimm, Roszell, Johnson, and Rogers all followed with walks. Then, thanks to two wild pitches and a single by Wilson, the Scots' were on top to stay by a score of 5-2. Knoxville did not go away easily, however, as they continued to battle in the second, third, and fourth innings. They were even able to tie the score in the fourth, but thanks to great glove work by Yates and Coleman, a 6-6 tie was all they could manage. The Scots' then put them away with three in the fourth, one in the fifth, and one in the sixth. The game came to a very fitting end when Rosa threw to Curtis for the final out as the two seniors ended their careers for the Scots'.

Seniors—What's your line?

Dave's World

by Dave Roberts

Well, kids, here we are. What a long strange trip it's been. For four years, I have written this column in every issue of the "Echo," with brief exceptions due to irate editors and faculty advisors. This is the last one.

Knowing this, I decided to devote it to one of the three topics that inspire the most passion in me: sex, drugs, and rock and roll. Sex (i.e. inter-gender relations) I did in my Valentine column. Rock and roll (i.e. music) I did last spring. So what's left? You guessed it—drugs. Specifically, marijuana.

Consider this: in most cultures, but particularly in a capitalist democracy, people get what they want. If they want pornography, they will get it. If they want abortions, they will get them. If they want guns, they will get them. If they want alcohol, they will get it. If they want pot . . . you get the picture. Supply meets demand. When the government won't allow legitimate businesses to sell these things, then the criminals will sell them (remember Prohibition?). Thus, we get what is known here in America as the "war on drugs."

Here's something you don't hear much in the media: The drug war that our country's government has waged (against its own citizens) is an unmitigated failure. The criminals have won. The government spends twenty billion dollars a year to fight the flow of drugs—and drugs are just as easy to find on the street today as they were twenty years ago, if not more so. That bald fact is beyond argument. Here are some of the consequences of our national drug policy (quotes come from Rolling Stone, May 5 1994):

"There are 440,000 prisoners in local jails, 840,000 in state prisons and another 87,000 in federal prison. This represents by far the highest proportion of the American population incarcerated in our history, as well as the highest proportion incarcerated of any country in the world." Ponder that for a moment: America has a larger portion of its population in jail than any other country in the world, and yet our crime rate remains one of the world's highest.

"More than 60 percent of federal prison inmates are incarcerated for violations of federal drug laws. Two out of three are in prison because of mandatory sentencing laws." Murderers and other violent offenders are being given early parole to make room for legions of first-time drug offenders because politicians have decided that it looks good to be "tough on crime," so they pass laws like the one that says being caught with one hit of LSD gets you ten years in federal prison without a chance of parole, no matter what the circumstances of the case. "It is hard to find a respected jurist, from Chief Justice William Rehnquist on down, who supports either current mandatory minimum requirements or the Draconian penalties he or she is required to impose on petty drug offenders."

Let's focus, then, on marijuana: "Paramilitary raids composed of state police, Drug Enforcement Administration operatives and National Guardsmen fly over public and private lands, their helicopters skimming the tops of private homes. Citizens are detained at gun point, and houses and property worth hundreds of thousands of dollars are forfeited to local police departments for no other reason than the existence of small numbers of marijuana plants."

Okay, the point is brief but hopefully obvious: The drug war is stripping citizens of their individual rights, it is costing taxpayers monumental sums of money, and it isn't working.

Where might you be found graduation night?

"With family. The party's not until the night after. Then, it'll be one big party lasting for weeks."

—Jeff Rosa

What class did you skip the most?

"History 180 with Dr. Lewis. I was usually out on Lloyd Beach."

—Spears Driskell

Since you've been a student here, what's been your most embarrassing moment?

"Being in a fight out here in front of the dorm with my girlfriend, Trish."

—Brian DeBula

What's your biggest regret?

"Not having come here as a freshman. Being a transfer student screws your schedule and I've always felt a little out of place."

—Nancy Allen

If we said the word "streak," what/who would come to mind?

"I'm not giving any names, but one crazy, wacky night, some friends and I decided to do it. We were feeling kind of 'carpe diem.' I'm not embarrassed to say it, because it was fun. Everybody needs to do it once in their life."

—Julie Walker

What's been your most daring moment as an MC student?

"Getting dragged around Lloyd Beach by a blazer and jumping in the pond in front of Crawford House. . . . All in the same night."

—Eric Egan

What building will hold the most memories for you, and why?

"Crawford House, because of working with all the people there for three years."

—Mary Steger

What's the biggest catastrophe you've had in the computer lab?

"The day my thesis was due, the computer ate it. There wasn't enough memory, so it put all of my figures at the end of the document."

—Lori Schirmer

I don't know, I'm babbling again. I sense a revolution coming around in all sorts of areas, personally there's a biggun' coming, I think politically were going to see a lot of s— go down (maybe Dave will get his wish!), and hopefully in education there will be a renewed sense of enthusiasm both from the students and the teachers.

A Day in the Life

by Alene Day

Well folks, I guess this is good-bye . . . unless, of course, one of my wonderful professors actually decides to hold any of those late papers and assignments against me. But they wouldn't do that. (Knock on wood). In all seriousness, though, I can say that if it doesn't happen now, it never will. I just don't think I can handle any more school for a while. For any of my senior comrades who are continuing on to graduate school right away . . . good luck . . . I think you're crazy, but good luck anyway! For me, well, I do believe that I hear the west calling my name. I think that I've heard it for a few years now, but I really wanted to see something through to the end and remain at one school for my entire college career. But now the time has come for me to see what damage I can do to the other half of this country—I do believe that the east coast has had enough of me. Haven't y'all?

I wish I had some really brilliant pearls of wisdom with which I could leave you, but considering that in the past couple of weeks I have hung my senior exhibit, I've finished my senior thesis, and I've pulled off a senior CIV (that I thought was darn tootin' good, despite the controversy), and now I am in the mire of exams (only one more), I'm afraid that I have few pearls left of anything—much less wisdom. But I'll try.

I think what I'll talk about here for a while (if you will be so kind) is the ever exciting topic of education. I know it's not nearly as provoking as Dave's World (kudos Dave!), but I think that I might have an interesting angle on the matter. Since I've been filling out numerous questionnaires recently about my four years here, I have done much thinking on the topic. I believe that there needs to be a complete rehauling of the educational system. It is like pulling teeth for a teacher to get his/her students excited about what they are learning. I have done this, and I have watched it happen . . . it's depressing.

I would like to think that we are all in college by choice, not due to the fact that our parents are threatening us with our lives if we do not continue on to higher education. But even though we are here by choice and paying out the wazoo for it, why is it that it is such a damn chore? We should love what we are doing. Hell, for $15,500 we should ADORE what we are doing, but we don't—at least not often.

I personally love learning new things, and I feel like I'm dead if I'm not. As impartial as I am trying to be, it is unavoidable to want to put the blame somewhere. I am not saying that we as students ought to be spoon fed our education, but I definitely feel that there is a huge gap in the understanding of professors of good old-fashioned work ethic and the students feeling like a bunch of clones. We have all, at one time or another, been excited by at least one professor, or one class, and isn't that the information that we retain? It is for me, and isn't that the point of an education?

The "Echo" Interview: Editor to Editor

Opinions. Opinions. Opinions. I think we have enough in this issue. Usually, the "Echo" does a "Farewell to Seniors" picture on the front of its last issue, but since the seniors didn't get together for a picture after comprehensive exams, what we've done—through no real conscious effort of our own—is put together a "Farewell to Seniors" issue. We're sorry to all of the freshmen and sophomores who probably aren't as close to the senior class as perhaps the juniors are—honestly, you weren't our target audience this time, and the features might bore you just a bit.

When you write for a newspaper, you can pretty much rest assured that you will never be interviewed. And, it's very certain that your picture will never grace its pages. We'll let the picture thing slide for this once and final time, but what Jeff and I, the "Echo" editor and assistant editor, have decided is to interview each other about our academic career here, our time as "Echo" people, and . . . Well, is there anything else?

Just the facts, ma'am.

Karen: Give me two words—both adjectives—to describe MC when you first enrolled, another to describe MC today, and then explain your choices:

Jeff: "Big. I didn't know anybody here. And it was a new place, I mean, I didn't know what Maryville College was, and I didn't know what to expect. Now, it's home. I've been here five years, and there so many things here that I know about. So many things that I've done here. A lot of memories. I've said hello and good-bye to a lot of friends here."

K: Give me two words—again both adjectives—to describe the "Echo" when you joined, another to describe the "Echo" today, and . . . well, you get the idea.

J: "Rag-tag, then. Basically, new staff and new editors had taken over, and it continually changed almost every month. We had to make the newspaper piece by piece. Cut and paste. Back and forth between [the offices in Fayerweather] to Anderson, where there was a laser printer. Now, I'd use the word "slick." It's all computerized. I think over the years, we've just gotten more efficient. It's like a roller coaster—sometimes it's really good, sometimes it's really bad. I think this year, it's been more a team this year than it has in the past."

K: You work at Crawford House, right? [Affirmative] How is putting the newspaper together like life?

J: "Make me think like Bruce Guillaume. Well, I've gotten a lot of experience. Working on a newspaper for five years, I've seen how I can improve the effort by sticking with it, and always looking for a way to improve things. You also need a good team to make a newspaper, so in life, you need help and you take it while you can."

K: If you were here for another year, what could your readers expect to see in the "Echo"?

J: "More student participation in the paper through the staff, letters to the editor, through the clubs. I'd like the campus population to take more advantage of the opportunities the paper gives them to be a part of campus life. Every student on campus should be mentioned at least once [in his/her four years]. For example, this is Kye Chung's first and last appearance in the "Echo."

K: If you could suffer no repercussions, what story/organization/operation would you like to investigate in the name journalism?

J: "Admission requirements. When I see some upperclassmen coming into the cafeteria making farm animal sounds at the top of their lungs before almost every meal, I wonder how difficult it was to get into this institution."

Now it is my turn. Karen Beaty has been a die-hard member of the "Echo", giving her all this year. She served as editor in the fall of 1993 and is graduating along with me.

Jeff: Karen, what was your first impression of Maryville College?

Karen: "The first time I came to Maryville College I was probably about six years old. It was during the summer time, and the only students here were foreign. So, at that early age, I never considered Maryville College a place that I would attend. I mean, I just never thought American students went there."

J: What's your impression right now?

K: "It's that place where—when I look back on it—I spent probably the best years of my life."

J: If you become rich and famous, how would you endow at the college?

K: "A real communications center, complete with its own "Echo" room, Macintosh computers, and equipment for a campus radio station."

J: What story, if there would be no backlash against you, would you like to break?

K: "I hear that there are quite a few athletes on campus who are using steroids. I wish I had time to get somebody to talk. Maybe they'll investigate next fall when everyone's bulked up."

J: If a student asked you why he/she should join the "Echo" staff, what would you say?

K: "There are two reasons to join, the way I see it. First of all, you get to be all self-righteous and blow the whistle on the injustices that you feel are present on campus. Secondly, and most importantly, you get to veto all of those bad pictures of yourself that you don't necessarily want the campus population to see."

J: This being your last word in the "Echo," who or what would you like to tell off?

K: "To all those people who fall asleep in class, particularly the Science 250 I had this semester: Stay in bed."

A. Day in the life

by Alene Day

I'm sure that I've told a lot of you about this book that I read earlier this year called "The Magic Bus: An American Odyssey" by Douglas Brinkly. This guy Brinkly is a professor at a small college up in New York who got sick of his students sitting in class memorizing information until test day and then forgetting they had ever learned it at all. He arranged for twenty of his students to travel around the country on a custom made bus for six weeks learning about American history, American writers and poets, and American culture. They kept journals and read a few novels along the way (when they were traveling through the areas which the authors were from), otherwise they just met people from all over the place (both famous and non), and observed this country. I am willing to bet that those twenty students learned more in those six weeks than they had in any class before or since. By the way, this book is in our library.

Let me move on to something a little different.

This is for all of you cooky nutty people with whom I have had the pleasure of sharing the past four years. This quite possibly could be barreling frighteningly towards a cliché . . . but . . . I swear to each and every one of you that I take a little something from each of you and hope that you don't notice it's gone and store it away in my brain where maybe one day it will re-emerge in a painting, or a photograph, or a sculpture. You have all taught me to see with my own eyes, I have developed a keen sense of myself, and this amazing ability to see the good in everyone. In a time when it is so cool to be so angst, this is often mistaken for insanity, but nobody here tried to change me, you all let me do my thing. You all kick a—

This feels really great to have a forum to talk to you all out there. I would like to thank the "Echo" for taking the risk of letting me have a column. It is not often that students with g.p.a.'s like mine get to talk to the student body as a whole. We don't get awards and get to make speeches you know . . . but we've sure got a lot to say . . . I think there should be a maximum 2.0 g.p.a. requirement for whoever takes over this column.

I would like to say to Dave that it has been a pleasure being your fellow columnist. You certainly paved the road that provided me with a lot of freedom—that's bitchin'.

ALSO, contrary to the educational reaming above, there has been several professors here that have left quite an impression on me and who won't soon be forgotten, although none of you probably know it—you see I still have this nagging little problem of expressing appreciation to authority figures—but thanks!

Finally, on a very personal note, I would like to thank any and all of my dear friends who stuck with me through my rather trying junior year. Come visit me wherever I am, anyone is always welcome. Just knock on my door with a smile and a six-pack!

MC 2000 becoming reality

by Mark Hatfield
Staff Writer

As the century winds down, Maryville College is winding up to be, as the College's fifth president Dr. Samuel Wilson once said, "the best possible college."

This effort has been spawned by a document entitled "The Maryville College 2000 Plan," initiated by Maryville College's current president, Dr. Gerald Gibson. When first introduced by the Echo, the document had yet to have been approved by the the Board of Directors of MC. Now the writing is an official document of MC, and is in use.

MC 2000 consists of eleven areas of idealistic goals for MC. These areas include: reputation, enrollment, the students, the faculty, the staff, the curriculum, financial resources, campus facilities, the college community, the college in the external community, and MC as a college of faith and learning.

These areas and their contents were composed by five groups from the MC community: the vice presidents, the faculty, the student senate, the alumni counsel, and the board of directors. These groups participated in what Gibson calls, "aspiration exercises."

They were asked to dream about the kind of college MC could be in the year 2000 and limited themselves by not using language comparative to the present, such as increase or improve. As Gibson said, "they had to describe what they saw in their mind's eye as they tried to envision the year 2000."

Out of these aspirations, a steering committee then composed a plan for the year 2000. This composition was entitled, "Directions 2000." Strategic goals, ones more specific than the eleven areas, were

Tatum resigns, college seeks replacement

by Paul Weaver
Editor

On September 16, Dr. Rick Tatum, the former director of Church Relations, and director of the Church and College Scholars program, left his office for the last time.

Tatum had served at Maryville College for four years, starting out serving double duty as the College Chaplain until Stephen Nickle was called to that position in 1991.

Tatum ran a number of ministries through the Church and College Scholars program—a service oriented program, including the Kerygma Puppeteers and Singers, and a clown ministry, as well as individual projects of the students.

As the Director of Church Relations, Tatum began a summer program intended to involve Presbyterian high school students with the college. The program was called Metamorphosis, and consisted of a two part team building program—a group service project, and group challenges, such as the Ropes Course, rock climbing, and whitewater rafting.

Tatum's duties also included working with area churches and the Synod of Living Waters, working with advancement trying to raise funds for the college from Presbyterian churches, and recruiting students from Presbyterian backgrounds for the college.

Tatum's position was originally funded by the Independent Presbyterian Church in Birmingham, Ala., and the Second Presbyterian Church in Knoxville. The funds were provided with the understanding that after the program had been established it would be worked into the college budget.

Tatum resigned this fall because the church relations program had not yet been integrated into the college's budget, after the funding provided by the churches ran out in 1993.

"I think what happened was the college, because of leadership changes, simply had to put it on hold," said Dr. Fred Burkey, vice president for college advancement, in response to why the church relations program had not yet been included in the college budget. "We were in the process of discussing that—we have discussed it, it was our intention for fiscal year 94-95 to bring it into the budget . . . I presume that we will go ahead and pursue that for the coming year," he continued.

Abortion picket lines in the church

by Josh Hogan
Staff Columnist

After many unproductive starts and half-hearted convoluted sentences that had little to do with what I wanted to talk about, I finally committed this to paper. Actually, I committed it to wordprocessor, but that's a story for another time, a story better left untold for its sheer mystery and power. Now to take that first faltering step towards upsetting or boring people with my own personal thoughts, which are by no means fit for this fine institution called the "Highland Echo."

The United Nations recently held its International Conference on Population and Development, a conference it also held in 1974 and 1984. The conference was mainly concerned with the stabilization of population on this already overpopulated planet. It was not so much the conference that made me think, but the larger issue that it pointed to: the role of the Christian Church in today's society. This issue of looming overpopulation is a good focal point for addressing this question for it is in the debates over abortion and contraception and the broad concept of "family planning" that the Church as a whole is facing criticism from within and without. What is to be the response of those of us who do belong to the modern Christian Church to these pressing issues? Has the Church outlived its usefulness? Is there no place for Christian morality and activity in the new secular society?

I, for the moment, want to focus on the much narrower issue of abortion. I also feel the need to talk about this from my own affiliation with the Roman Catholic tradition since this is the context from which I have approached all my personal reflections on the issue. This is where I must apply my most severe criticism of the reactions of the Church to a social issue. First of all, I am not going to make any statement on the morality of abortion. I do not wish to argue pro-life or pro-choice; my concern is the proper reaction of the Christian Church to an intense and dividing social issue. And the reaction should be just that, Christian.

Anti-abortion protesters and their pro-choice counterparts are not an uncommon sight on the nightly news. We are witness to scenes of militant protesters being dragged forcefully from the doorways of the clinics while others hold up signs accusing other human beings, namely doctors who perform abortions and mothers who choose abortion, of murder. This accusation may be one of the nicer comments offered to the people involved. Of course, as we know, abortion conflicts have grown large enough to culminate into the violent, shooting deaths of two doctors who perform abortions. Thus it seems to me that we have two sets of people, conveniently named pro-life and pro-choice respectively, scratching each other to bits over moral obligations and legal rights and other fun, ambiguous topics. Further, it seems, real people are stuck between two warring camps.

Now I'm going to try and set up an image for everyone though they've probably been subject to this argument before. I seem to remember reading, in a well known source for Christian spiritual life, about a certain adulterous woman. Imagine the scene, a woman dragged through the public area of the Temple in Jerusalem, probably by the hair. She is thrown up against the wall of one of the buildings, weeping and covered with dirt while sneering faces circle her around. She has no way out, no way to escape the brutal taunting and accusations; she cannot forget that they hold stones and that they will throw them. Also picture a man wearing a worn cloak sitting and writing in the sand with his finger. The man is questioned by the sneering faces, "Master, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery, and in the Law Moses has ordered us to stone women of this kind. What have you got to say?" (John 8:4-5) Mildly, he speaks: "Let the one among you who is guiltless be the first to throw a stone at her" (John 8:7).

This is exactly the scene the evening news conjures in my mind when I see scenes around abortion clinics. People who call themselves Christian preparing to throw verbal stones at another human being; they make proclamations of God's law and curse people for their transgressions. And the only thing I can think is: what a bunch of Scribes and Pharisees! For them the letter of the law has become more important than the spirit of the law.

And, for the most part, this seems to be the state of most of Christianity. But, I don't want to say that it is what all Christians are like. I was also at one time a gung-ho "pro-lifer" ready to sit down in the way of those evil murdering doctors: in a different way, I'm still "pro-life." But, as I inquire further into my faith commitment, I can no longer see these tactics as viable forms of Christian action. Yet, I am not at the point that I can be truly, positively active in the way that I envision Christian activity. Of course one could argue over what is true and positive, and I would have to say that it is encapsulated in Psalms 103, which is fittingly titled, "God is Love": "Yahweh is tenderness and pity, slow to anger and rich in faithful love; his indignation does not last for ever, nor his resentment for all time." (Psalms 103:8-9). So it seems that those who are Christian, who are called to love others as themselves and to follow in the path of Jesus, such as myself, should take this particular passage to heart.

My point in all of this has been that if we, members of the Christian Church, want to teach what is "right" or "moral" the teaching tool is love. I know you've heard it before.

To apply this to the issue of abortion, I would have to make this point. What looks better to a 15 year old who is pregnant: a mob of Christians screaming curses and denouncing her, or a doctor who is going to perform a procedure which will, at least apparently, get her out of a bad situation? We can't expect her to choose the path we would wish her to take without respecting the very fact that she is just another human being and showing the love that we are called to show everyone.

The Church as a whole can benefit from this approach. A recent article by Barbara Crossette in "The New York Times" illustrates how the Church's current approach is viewed. One of the delegates to the Conference in Cairo is quoted as saying, "I think this conference can be seen as ending 2,000 years of ecclesiastical authority or jurisdiction over marriage and women's lives." Apparently, the Church has been seen as "lording" over women and their lives. This is what comes from demanding conformity to law rather than giving loving guidance to people. In an open letter to Pope John Paul II, also published in "The New York Times," the group Catholics Speak Out concisely stated what I have just labored to the point of insanity: "The needs of our world cry out for our church to cease being a sign of contradiction and instead become a role model implementing equality for women and men and respecting the moral adulthood of women."

Well, now that you are sufficiently bored, I'll take my leave.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

News can be anything from cowpatie bingo on Lloyd beach to the Maryville College Covenant, and it is virtually everything in between.

"All the news that's fit to print," is the proclamation that the "New York Times" bares on its masthead.

So what news is fit to print?

Those of the more radical first amendment mind set might say that anything is fit to print, and that as a newspaper, the Echo has the right and duty to print anything it uncovers.

There are those of the other extreme who would argue that what the Echo covers should be carefully monitored.

I would like to present a more moderate view of the subject. The Echo, as the news oriented student publication on campus, has a responsibility to report the news as it relates to the college community.

The Echo has a duty to do this in a responsible fashion, working in a professional manner, and adhering to professional ethical standards.

It is also our duty to serve not only as a voice for the student body, but also for the college community as a whole—faculty and staff alike.

Senate report: changes

by Lance Klosterman
Student Senate President

Welcome to all freshmen, and I hope you are enjoying the college so far. Welcome back to all upperclassmen, and I hope the new school year is better than ever. This year I am going to write a short column reporting any progress senate is making. Senate meetings are normally open to the public and you are encouraged to come and speak to your representatives.

Students have as much opportunity to make changes at the college as the faculty or staff. The last three years the reputation of senate has really increased. For example, the judicial system is almost completely run by the students. Students are selected for the disciplinary review board and senate decides the members for judicial and appeals board as some of you know because you were nominated for the positions. I cannot stress enough how much power the students have on this campus as compared to others.

Have you seen the new pool and gym hours? This past summer Student Development worked hard to open the physical education building to students for more of the day. The plan is to turn it into a substitute student center.

Ticca Hartsfield has been chairing the Intramurals Committee and has interviewed a number of people for a new Intramurals Coordinator position. The new coordinator will run intramurals and staff the P.E. building for students on the weekends. The senate will be funding part of this position. By the way, thanks for all the hard work Ticca! The new hours until we hire a new coordinator are:

Pool 12 pm - 2 pm Mon-Fri
8:30pm - 10 pm Mon, Tue, Fri
Gym 6:30pm - 10 pm Mon-Fri
Weight Room 8 am - 10 pm Mon-Fri monitors available 7 pm - 9 pm

Have you noticed any difference in the cafeteria? Clint Wight has really worked hard this summer as Food Services Committee Chair. Both Marriot and the students and administration of the college have made many modifications this year so that you can eat more of what you want. Maybe it is just me, but I have heard fewer complaints this year.

For the freshmen we have a new addition in the orientation classes. Peer mentors are serving as orientation leaders in each of the orientation classes. It is all part of the work done by the Peer Mentoring Committee. Aaron Stone is chairing this committee and has really spearheaded the issue of freshmen retention. He even organized the Big Brothers/Big Sisters program with Ginny Rigell. Thanks to both.

About the middle of October I plan to get the InterClub Council (ICC) together. This council has representative from each of the chartered groups on campus. The primary objective is to build and distribute student activity fees to each of the groups and build activity calendars for each month. Any chartered group that wants to host a campus wide activity is entitled to this money. Please send Debbie Shewfelt a note if you are interested in writing a proposal for funding from the student activity fee.

What are your concerns this year? If you want to see senate take care of an issue this year, I recommend talking to your representative or giving me a call at x8711 or send me a message on the e-mail system; my address is klosterl. I am optimistic that this year senate will do a lot of good this year but only with the hard work of a lot of great folks.

Academic Integrity Board

Editor's Note: The Academic Integrity Board is a body composed of three faculty members and two students. It hears cases concerning academic dishonesty involved with courses or library use. Results of the AIB are to be reported in the Echo

In accord with the provisions of the College policy on academic integrity, the following is reported to the College community. Specifically the policy provides: "Results of a hearing (before the Academic Integrity Board), including the charge (excluding the name of the accused), the nature of the evidence, the sanction, and the rationale of the sanction shall be reported to the campus news media" ("Maryville College Student Handbook, 1994-1995", p. 76).

In September 1994 the Maryville College Academic Integrity Board (AIB) met to hear a charge that Maryville College student "A" sold a term paper to Maryville College student "B" for $50. At the AIB hearing, student A pleaded guilty to the charge of academic dishonesty and the AIB accepted the plea. The sanction of the AIB is two-fold: (1) a letter of censure is placed in the student's file in the Registrar's Office, where it will remain for a period of five years; (2) student A is suspended from the College for a period of one semester. The Board believes the offense is especially egregious because of the exchange of money; it is deeply concerned that integrity was exchanged so easily for a price. Because of the seriousness of the offense, the Board concluded that separation from the college community was not only warranted but necessary.

Student literacy corps battles on

Dear Editor,

I do not believe that the students of Maryville College are aware of one of the finest programs available to them. This ground breaking program is the Maryville College Student Literacy Corps. The MCSLC consists of Maryville College students who are dedicated to fighting adult illiteracy. Students helping students is the heart of our efforts. In their own special way, each member of the MCSLC is giving something back to society. In cooperation with the Adult Basic Education Center of Blount County, this pioneering program is soaring high to tutor over fifty adults per week. With the help of other Maryville College students, the MCSLC could reach out to fifty more. The requirements for membership in the MCSLC are not difficult. The prerequisite is one course of Student Literacy Practicum (English 343) which will be taught next semester by Linda Clark, the backbone of the entire project. Thanks to Linda Clark's leadership and undying efforts to keep the program afloat when others thought otherwise, the program is a success. If you would be interested in helping others in the name of education, love, and scholarships (yes, I said scholarships), then please contact Linda Clark or the MCSLC chair Jenny Cummings. Both of these heroic individuals constantly fight off illiteracy; will you help battle for their cause?

Thank you,
Jason Thompson

The Covenant: what it means to college community

by Paul Weaver
Editor

"The Maryville College Covenant is a fancy word for honor code... it's just an outline of what we feel the Maryville College students should have on the top of their minds," said Student Senate President Lance Klosterman when asked about the Covenant.

Unfortunately, too many people on this campus are ignorant as to what the Covenant is, and how it will affect their lives as students, and how it will affect the future of MC.

This problem is something that the Student Senate, Student Development, and the Peer Mentor program have come together to try to solve.

"We've added it so that it's part of the sign off for the handbooks—it's becoming more integrated into the routine," Dr. Sue Wyatt commented.

The Covenant is based on three principles: scholarship, respect, and integrity.

As stated in the Covenant:

Scholarship

- to pursue lifelong goals of education and scholarship

Respect

- to respect and appreciate the diversity of our community and the global community
- to respect the rights of others be they property, privacy, opinion or expression

Integrity

- to act with integrity in all interactions - academic, personal, and beyond

• to encourage and support my fellow students as they aspire to be honest in their academic endeavors, as well as their personal relationships

"We want students to come in direct contact with these values," Wyatt said. The idea is for the students to teach each other through their interaction as a community.

The power of the student on campus is growing through the senate and judicial branches of government. The Covenant, once enacted, will increase the power and responsibility of the MC student.

Concerning the implementation of the Covenant, Klosterman said, "The plan for the Covenant for this year, and years after, is to introduce it to the freshman class... by introducing it to the freshman class, and allowing it to build— it's a long term project."

The original goal of the Covenant was to do away with the student handbook and to put the college community on an honor code listing principles that the community should live by. It has become more of a statement of purpose for the community.

"Six or seven years from now we're not even going to need a handbook... we'll just have one page that you sign at the beginning of each year, and you say, 'yes, I stand for scholarship, yes, I stand for integrity, I stand for respect.' You can sign that and know that the other people signing it believe that also," Klosterman said.

According to Wyatt, the Covenant will not only change how the students interact with each other, but how the faculty and staff interact with the students and each other. It is hoped that eventually the Covenant will be signed by all members of the college community.

One of the goals is to present every faculty member with a copy of the Covenant which is to be placed in their offices. "I think the faculty is waiting to see if there is maturity on the student side to make this [the Covenant] take off," Klosterman said. The Board of Directors has approved the Covenant, and there are plans to eventually make a presentation to Dr. Gerald Gibson, and eventually the faculty. "They know it's out there," Klosterman said.

The plans for this year, and the coming years are to make the Covenant as visible as possible, introducing it to each preceding freshman class.

Tatum

president, responded to the same question by saying, "Well that is certainly what I would want to do, it doesn't make a great deal of sense to have something that's ongoing and an important part of the college left out by itself."

According to Gibson, the church relations program will be re-activated as soon as they find someone to fill the void left by Tatum's resignation. He is hoping to fill that position by the first of the year.

"It's an important program for us and we don't want it to lapse for lack of good leadership there," he said.

When asked what responsibilities the new church relations officer would have, Burkey said, "I think it's fairly safe to say that the position will get redefined. I think it's time when we have a vacancy to look at things and say, 'Is this what we want?'"

According to Burkey, "This [the church relations program] is high on our priority list, we're very committed to an effective church relations program." He continued by saying, "I'm sorry Rick decided not to stay with us."

"I think it was a personal decision on his part, we certainly weren't anxious to see him leave, I really had great admiration for his ability," Gibson said.

Tatum is now attending Vanderbilt University in Nashville, where he is working on a master's in higher education administration with a focus on institutional advancement. He is considering seeking employment at a seminary working in advancement or admissions.

"I'm going to absorb the university environment and enjoy it," Tatum said.

made at the end of the year.

The most recent accomplishment made that is consistent with MC 2000 is the ranking of Maryville College as the seventh best liberal arts college in the southeast. Of this Gibson said, "We didn't know it was going to happen that quickly, but we're pleased that it did." MC 2000's listed goal is to "be ranked in national publications as one of the ten best southern liberal arts colleges."

Some important future concerns that Gibson mentioned include the construction of a student center, the renovation of the Fine Arts Center or construction of a new one, and possible repairs made to the structural integrity of Bartlett Hall.

When asked about his personal opinion of Maryville College and MC 2000, Gibson said he didn't have an actual picture in his head, but he thought that being better is an important philosophy to live by.

Copies of MC 2000 are available to anyone who asks for them.

However, use of MC 2000 will become more detailed. The next step will be to take each of the strategic goals and define specific objectives to accomplish them. Also, price tags will be placed upon the objectives.

The price tags are particularly for the type of objectives that may include building renovation or construction. The objectives defined will be used in each department's usual annual work plan. This work plan, which is composed every year, is a list of things to be done to better the particular department. At the interim, an evaluation will be made on the work accomplished to see what still needs to be completed and then a final evaluation will be

Now which will it be, Bachelor #1, #2, or #3? Does this sound different from your math or English classes? Well, it should. The Dating Game is just one of the many activities planned by the Student Programming Board at Maryville College.

The Student Programming Board, a subcommittee of the Student Senate, is responsible for all of the social activities here on campus. This group, along with the other subcommittees of the Senate, receives a percentage of the semester activity fee paid by each student.

The board has approximately $23,000 to work with this year. This money will be put towards advertising, decorating, and student activities and programs.

Since the Student Programming Board is funded by student money, the members are attempting to find activities that appeal to a wide range of students, but they can't do this without student input.

The Student Programming Board meets at 8:15 p.m. each Tuesday night in the old Office of Student Development in Fayerweather Hall. All students are invited and encouraged to attend the meetings and share their thoughts and ideas. Students are also welcome to speak with any of the representatives about their ideas.

The board is focusing on big events this year, rather than frequent events as in the past. Their ultimate goal is to bring the Indigo Girls here to campus, but since this is virtually impossible, they've planned a lot of other great activities.

175th anniversary to climax in October

by Kenyon Evans
Staff Writer

What's a birthday without cake and 175 rings of a tower bell? There will be cake aplenty on the Oct. 19 during a public celebration of 175 years of Maryville College. And yes, the tower bell will ring proudly to the world (including those of you with classes) 175 times to announce the anniversary.

The 175th Anniversary Climax will be a celebration of the tradition and history of Maryville College. Emily Yarborough, chairperson for public relations and theme events, describes the planning: "We've tried to create a celebration that didn't create a lot of new events. [We tried to] take what we were already doing and put it under the umbrella of the 175th... We wanted a celebration that involved things that were already a part of campus life."

The Activities will begin on October 1 with an Alumni Art exhibit in the Fine Arts Gallery and an Isaac Anderson Exhibit in the Library. The October community forum will be a part of the climax as it addresses the history of Maryville College. It will feature the book "By Faith Endowed: The Story of Maryville College, 1819-1994," by Dr. Caroline Blaire and Dr. Arta Walker. Speakers will be giving readings from the book, such as Bill Williams from WBIR TV. Faith Esham, a soprano vocalist with an international career, will perform a free concert on the night of Oct. 20. It will be in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall, and there will be a reception following at the Proffitt Parlor in Carnegie Hall. Yarborough said that it should be the cultural highlight of the anniversary celebrations.

There will be a Kirking of the Tartans held at New Providence Presbyterian Church on Oct. 23 at 10:30. There will also be a forum discussing the history of MC on that day. On Oct. 24, the Maryville-Alcoa Community Orchestra will open its season with a concert to commemorate the 175th.

A community forum on Oct. 27 will feature a panel including MC alumni who are now college presidents and the dean of the law school at Washington University, with Dr. Gibson moderating. They will discuss the future of higher education.

Student participation in the celebration of the 175th will be primarily during homecoming. Cathy

Cate, a member of the committee to plan the climax, said, regarding the anniversary-year homecoming: "We're hoping to... bring back some traditional events that haven't been done in a while... in celebration of the 175th year."

Former Homecoming Kings and Queens will return and participate in a large halftime celebration at the football game. Cate is planning a campus parade which will celbrate the anniversary as one of the homecoming events.

What's the significance of 175 years of Maryville College? The fact that MC has endured and thrived over such a long period.

Cate hopes that students will see the traditions that have carried on so long and realize the importance of establishing their own traditions. When asked about the significance of Maryville College's history Dr.

Sally McNeill replied, "That Maryville College has survived. Its had several crises... and an institution with lesser people at it's helm could have just given up the fight. But its kept going because the faculty and the presidents... thought that it was worth saving. People have worked at great personal sacrifice to keep it going."

New home for Bradford lab

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

Change is an essential part of life. Sometimes it is for the better, and sometimes it's not. You have to adapt to the times. Hence, the news that our MC computer labs underwent change this summer, should come as no surprise.

The Bradford writing lab that was formerly located on the third floor of Anderson Hall was moved to the same room with the Sutton Science computer lab. Dean Bolden stressed, "moved, the Bradford writing lab was moved, not closed."

It is planned to place a commemorative plaque on the back wall of the Sutton Science lab to indicate that the back two rows of computers are officially called the Bradford Writing lab. It is not known yet when this will be done.

There were several reasons why the Bradford lab needed to be moved. One of the most important reasons was the location of the lab. The roof leaked in the room where the lab was located. "There have been several attempts to fix the leaks, but it didn't work," said Dr. John Nichols, director of the Sutton Science computer lab.

Another problem posed by the location of the lab was accessibility. "Many students did not like using the lab late at night, because of it being on the third floor. Nothing ever happened, but the potential for problems was there," said Bolden.

This leads into the question of efficiency, since many students felt more comfortable using the Sutton Science computer lab, it makes sense that moving both labs to the same location would be more efficient.

The labs sharing the same room has not been the only change that occurred. The most noticeable change is the use of codes. In order to use the computer lab now, students must log onto the computer network using a code that they were given at registration.

This is a security precaution that prevents non-authorized persons from using the lab. "I wish codes and locks weren't necessary, but the reality is they are," said Bolden. "We were one of the few colleges or universities that did not have such a password system. Pellissippi has had one for years." If a student loses their code, they can go to Bolden's secretary in Anderson and request it.

A change equally important is the addition of hard drives to the computer network. In years past a three and a half inch floppy disk was required to use the computers. Now every student has two point five mega bytes of hard disk space. That is roughly equivalent to three floppy disks.

By default everything saved is saved on the hard drive, but it is possible to save a copy to a disk. The lab assistant on duty can help you do this.

An important safety feature that has been added is tape backups of students work. This is automatically done on a daily basis. If a student loses a document for some reason, it will be possible to get a paper copy of the tapes. The tapes are used in a set of thirty, so something done up to a month ago could be retrieved.

The last change is the hours the lab is open. The lab is now open from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. on Monday through Thursday, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Fridays, Saturdays from 12 p.m. to 5 p.m., and Sundays 2 p.m. to 11 p.m.

"The labs are actually open longer now with lab assistants. Before they were open from eight to four without lab assistants," said John Nichols. "I had to weigh money available with lab assistants' time available and times the lab is most used. I don't have the money to leave the lab open any more hours."

So far the response to the changes has been, for the most part, good. As Bolden put it, "The positives outweigh the negatives."

Pep band being formed

A Pep Band is being formed at Maryville College! Any interested faculty or student should contact Dara DiGiacomo at campus extension 8551, or write her at Box 2363. Currently the band is planning on performing during the Homecoming football game on October 29. There is a possibility that the band will perform during the basketball season.

Freshmen present unique problems

by Dara DiGiacomo
Staff Writer

On August 28, residence halls opened their doors to the Class of 1998. Suddenly, there were 225 new faces trying to find their way around Maryville.

According to Donna Davis, Vice President of Admissions, the number of students her office had to work with was actually smaller than when they were working with the Class of 1997. 900 students applied but only about 180 actually came here in 1993; in 1994, 225 students out of 800 ended up at Maryville.

Davis attributes this higher yield to the fact that the Financial Aid Office was having to deal with Congress and the restructuring of the Financial Aid Act. As a result, when the Class of 1997 had questions about their financial aid options, the Financial Aid Office did not have the needed information to answer the questions. This year, the changes Congress made have been in place for a year, so the office was better equipped to answer questions.

"The Freshman class looks so big because the graduating class of 1993 was so small," explained Davis. Furthermore, the Class of 1997 was smaller than average. Between the two, the enrollment averages out.

Perhaps the department that is feeling the most strain is the Department of Residence Life. At the end of the Spring semester, both the fourth floor in Davis Hall and in Copeland Hall were closed, and Resident Assistants had been hired accordingly. When the decision was made to reopen the fourth floor of Copeland and make it a male floor, there was no problem staffing it because there was still a male alternate RA. However, when Davis was reopened, there were no RAs left; as a result, the staff was moved around so that there would be coverage on all four floors.

With more residents, and more students overall, the judicial boards are expected to have more incident reports this year. However, with this being the first year under the Covenant, it is hoped that these two changes will counteract each other.

According to Cathy Cate, "More students mean more ideas, which means there will be more to do to accommodate these students." As Director of Campus Programs, Cate had to deal with a different set of circumstances. This summer, more students chose to attend the second session of Orientation, which made it challenging to handle all of the students. Furthermore, this year every Orientation class has opted to do the Mountain Challenge Program, which has sent the Mountain Challenge staff scrambling to cover all the events.

Cate further observed that this high school to continue serving during their college years. As of 1994, there are 73 Bonner Scholars at Maryville College.

The new Bonners will be working extensively with the area elementary schools, the Douglas Cooperative, and the Blount County Children's Home. Mark Fugate of Maryville and Jarred Younger of Townsend are both currently volunteering at the children's home. Fugate, who was previously involved in the Summer Games Program at Alcoa Elementary, said, "We are there to listen to the kids... one young girl had made some pictures and when Jarred and I complimented her she almost burst with happiness from the little bit of attention we paid her."

"This group came to be closer than other classes of Bonners," class seems to have many more active students. "I noticed that a lot of freshmen signed up for volunteer activities like Habitat for Humanity."

Perhaps the best indicator of a jump in student population would be the faculty to student ratio. According to Dean Bolden, Academic Dean, "The ratio has changed from 13.1 in 1993 to 15.2 in 1994."

As far as parking is concerned, Chief Eldria Hurst of security feels that students should use the available parking in a more appropriate way. "There is a parking lot behind Wilson Chapel and also next to the PE Building which people don't want to use."

The dining hall has also been affected. At the noon class break, many people want to eat lunch, causing long lines. If students would be willing to stagger their lunch by even just ten minutes, the dining hall would be able to accommodate everyone with a minimal amount of waiting.

Overall, the Class of 1998 has many people excited and optimistic. Stephanie Wyatt remarked, "This is a big step towards the enrollment goals of the 'MC 2000' plan." Cate further remarked that "there are a lot of involved and creative people in this class."

according to Nickle, through their three day orientation camp in Rose's Creek, TN. In reflecting upon this closeness, Younger said, "It felt good to have familiar faces on campus the first day of school." Fugate referred to his fellow freshman Bonners as "a security blanket."

Staff loses PO boxes

by Allison Dunn

Lyn Cherry is the post master in the campus post office, and has been for the last three years, but this year has, by far, been the most different. Really different; there are not enough post office boxes for all of the freshman, transfers, and all of the faculty to have boxes. For many years, the faculty have had their own boxes in the 2800 boxes next to all of the student boxes. This year, though, things just will not work that way.

There are so many freshmen, new students, and transfer students that all of the faculty boxes had to be pulled in order to have room for the student boxes. According to Cherry, "the teachers reacted well" to having their boxes moved to the inside of the post office. Their only complaint being they "can't get their mail at night or on the weekends." Cherry told an amusing story about Dr. Lewis's response to having his box taken away. Apparently, he has had the same box for thirty-two years and has had a hard time adjusting.

On a more serious note, all the faculty have reacted well to having their boxes played with so much and have commented on the great service they get from even the new student workers, according to Cherry. Having the new cabinets in the back of the mailroom has made it "crowded, but liveable" in certain areas, and it is going a lot better than Cherry had expected. Although it is confusing with five new workers out of ten trying to sort faculty mail when it still has the box numbers on the address, things are working themselves out.

Things should be getting under control soon, as people inside the post office get used to the system, and improvements will be made over the summer of 1995. A whole new section of mailboxes will be added to, hopefully, stop this from happening again in the fall semester of 1995. Cherry appreciates the help she has been getting from all of her student workers who have had to deal with all of the changes.

New Bonners

Claire Stancampiano

The freshman Bonners, according to Reverend Stephen Nickle, are "folks who have very strong track records of service." Their interests include everything from playing spades to practicing Ninjitsu, and activities such as these define their strong group identity.

For those who are unfamiliar with the Bonner Program it was founded in 1990 by the Corella and Bertram F. Bonner Foundation. It is a community service based scholarship. Students perform 10 hours of service per week during the school week and 240 hours during the summer. It enables those who were involved with the community during intercollegiate equestrian circuit, and I wanted people at Maryville to have the opportunity to be involved." With the assistance of Drs. Mardi Craig and Sue Wyatt, McCammon was able to get funding for the team from Student Senate. "Equestrian teams exist nationwide," said McCammon.

Late in August, students such as Lisa Hensley, senior, and Claire Stancampiano, junior, ventured into the hot sun to explore the world of horse riding. McCammon, who is teaching the novices on privately owned horses, is determined to make equestrians of them. Other members of the team include Aimee Cropper, sophomore, who has been riding since she was eight, and Meg McWhorter who has shown horses for Hiwassee College in the past.

The team will travel throughout Tennessee and Kentucky to participate in five shows this school year. Their first show will be at Hiwassee on October 7. If anyone would like more information regarding the equestrian team, contact McCammon at P.O. box 2447. No previous riding experience is necessary.

Baseball gets early start

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

Along with all of the fall sports, a sport more associated with the spring is getting in on the action. The Maryville College baseball team is having its annual fall season.

"This is an evaluation time for us. We find weak areas and fill our needs. Last year we were a little weak in the outfield, so we went out and got Sophomore Andy Moss," said head baseball coach Eric Etchinson.

According to Etchinson the team now consists of 44 players and will add five more once football season is over. Of the 44, 19 are returning players, 27 are freshmen, and one is a transfer student.

The fall season is a time for all players to learn the system and for the players to get to know each other, also mentioned the coach.

Recruiting this year was focused on replacing the two positions in which the team lost players to graduation. Third basemen Jeff Rose and first basemen Mark Curtis will be tough to replace, according to Etchinson, however, he went on to say that he is very pleased with the players that he brought in to take over at those two positions.

Etchinson stressed the importance of moving forward, taking advantages of the new facilities, as well as remaining one of the top teams in the South region.

The fall season will include games against Tennessee Temple on October 15 at home and at Tennessee Wesleyan on October 20.

Of a special note, there will be an Orange and Garnet game on October 28 at 4 p.m. here on campus as a part of Homecoming week.

MC soccer off to impressive start

by David Downs
Staff Writer

The Maryville College men's soccer team is taking the South by storm.

The Scots are not only ranked number four in the South Region, but have extended to a school record of 16 consecutive wins and a number 25 national ranking.

The Scots recently beat Centre College, who was ranked number six in the South Region at the time, by a score of 2-0. Chris Reid, the leading scorer for the Scots last year, scored one goal in the game and is the team's second leading scorer. Donny Evans scored the final goal and remains the Scots leading scorer with 11 goals.

In three of the last four games, the Scots' have scored six goals or more, including a 9-0 blowout of Cumberland University.

"The guys really surprised me," Coach Pepe Fernandez said. "We started out young and the guys have done very well, and I think we have a good chance of making the tournament."

The Maryville College women's soccer team continues to strive to rebuild this year. With a young and talented freshman class moving in, Fernandez is expecting nothing but the best.

Scots defeat Sewanee, fall to Clinch Valley, finish first half at 3-2

by John Morgan and Chris Stephens
Staff Writers

The Fighting Scots are 3-2 after a last second victory against Sewanee 25-23 in front of a vocal crowd at Honaker Field on September 24 and a disappointing loss to Clinch Valley College the following week.

Freshman Nathan Davenport came up with a 52 yard touchdown grab with less than a minute to play to seal the win for the Scots against Sewanee.

The play was set up after Sewanee scored a go-ahead touchdown with 1:01 remaining in the contest. After the score, the Tigers were penalized twice for delay of game while trying to attempt a two-point conversion.

The penalties so enraged the Sewanee coaching staff that a 15-yard unsportsmanlike conduct violation forced the Tigers to kickoff from their own 20-yard line.

Davenport returned the ensuing kick to the Tiger 45.

Maryville coach Phil Wilks went for the kill.

Gambling that Sewanee would be looking for something underneath the Tiger secondary, John Berry Cox hurled a strike to Davenport at the one, and Davenport was able to fall into the end zone from there.

Cox finished the afternoon completing seven of 12 passes for 91 yards and one touchdown and rushed for two others.

The Scots also amassed 326 yards of total offense, 222 of them were on the ground.

Charlie Robertson, the USA TODAY Division III National Player of the Week for the Sept. 10 Kentucky Wesleyan game, was hampered by a minor concussion, but still managed to average 13 yards per return against Sewanee.

The most outstanding statistic of the game, however, was the Scots' defense putting pressure on Stroup, the Tiger quarterback, to force five sacks for minus 44 yards, including the game's final play.

So impressive was the victory over Sewanee that the Scots logo appeared where the state supported school to the North's logo would normally appear on the front page of the Sunday edition of the Knoxville News-Sentinel.

Not so impressive was the Scots next game, which was an Oct. 1 meeting with Clinch Valley College from Wise, VA. Despite a great effort from the defense and a late comeback, the Scots fell on the short end of a 33-22 score. The Scots scored late on an 80 yard interception return by Senior Jon Chambers and an overpowering run up the middle by Sophomore fullback Mike Parris in trying to overcome numerous turnovers.

The home team dominated much of the first half, and in fact looked destined to head into half time with the lead. However, late in the second quarter, up 9-6 and driving, the Scots turned the ball over deep in Clinch Valley territory and lost momentum that the team would never regain.

Following a week off, the Fighting Scots will return to action on Oct. 15 at Centre College. The team's next and final home game will be the Homecoming game on Oct. 29 against Methodist College.

Freshman Amanda Carson (15) goes in for the kill in a recent game against Roanoke College

"They are a really unique class," Fernandez said of his new freshmen. "What I've been impressed with is we've thrown them into battle right away and they've handled it really well."

The Lady Scots are currently 3-3-1 and are counting on "two really quality seniors" in Laura Sibold and Jennifer Wells.

Sibold returns to the goal box as an All-South goalkeeper and the career shutout leader at Maryville College. Wells has been the Lady Scots top scorer this year.

"We're counting on her," said Fernandez about Wells. "We heavily rely on her to score."

With very few upper classmen, Fernandez looks to many of his freshman recruits to perform well on the field.

"I've been really impressed with how hard they've been willing to work and how quickly they've molded into a team," Fernandez said of his freshman. "They've been up and down like most young teams will do, but we've beat some teams that we probably shouldn't have beaten, and it's because they've really matured and matured quickly."

"Pippin" cast prepares for Homecoming showing

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

"Louder!" the director calls out as one of the choreographers keeps time. "One and two and three and..." Another rehearsal for the fall musical is underway.

"Pippin" is a musical comedy by Stephen Schwartz and Roger O. Hirson. It has been presented in many different ways in the years since its debut in the 1970s. Dr. Jill Bergeron, director, said she is "going back to the basics of the script."

For Bergeron, this means using the concept of medieval morality plays. Morality plays usually center on one character who struggles against the temptations of the world. In this case, that character is Pippin.

Pippin is met by a band of traveling performers as he tries to find his purpose in life. After they help him, they pack their belongings back into their semi and move on to the next town.

When asked why she chose this play, Bergeron responded, "I'd done it before in grad school, and I loved the show."

The cast and crew are a little anxious about the performance. It has been two years since a musical has been staged at MC. However, Bergeron said that "the students' enthusiasm and work ethic are good."

The role of Pippin is played by Aaron Stone. The Leading Player will be portrayed by Funmilayo Eke, and the role of Catherine, Pippin's love interest, will be played by Dayna Touron.

Letitia Hall will play his stepmother, Fastrada. Robert Hutchens will portray Charles the Great, and Melody Alexander will play Pippin's grandmother, Berthe.

The rest of the ensemble is made up of actors Adrienne Bergeron, Karson Leitch, Davy McCammon, John McDonald, Kathryn McDonald, Brian Prather, Tiffany Rudicil, Todd Smith, and Julie Williams.

Michael Stinnett is the accompanist, Alexander is the costumer, and Bergeron and Hall are co-choreographers. Sarah Stevenson and Mike Wilson are co-stage managers.

"Pippin" will be performed on Oct. 27, 28, and 29 at 8 p.m. in the MC theater.

Tickets are $7.50 for adults and $5.00 for senior citizens and visiting students. Admission is free for Maryville College students if they present their ID at the door.

As part of the 175 Anniversary celebration, there will be a theater alumni reception in the theater lobby on October 29 at 10 a.m. All alumni are invited to attend. There is no charge for the event.

Sinners, damsels in distress on campus

by Jessica Lemler
Staff Writer

This spring a very special course is being offered here at Maryville College. The full title of the course is "Sinners Saints Sourcerers and Damsels in Distress," and it will take an objective look at the role of women throughout history.

Drs. Doucette, Cowan, and Livingstone, professors of foreign language, religion, and history respectively, have teamed up to address the portrayals of women in literary, religious, and historical texts.

The course is being offered this spring through the new Humanities Division. This division began last spring and it merges what were formerly known as the Language and Literature, Religion and Philosophy, and History departments. "The new division structure enabled this [course] to happen," said Dr. Schneibel, head of the Humanities Division. "It will tie in these different disciplines that really do impact each other."

The emphasis of the course is on the various roles women have played, including witches, seductresses, vampiresses, nuns, and virgins. To gain a better understanding of these roles, students will be introduced to historical accounts, religious accounts, short stories, and novels, including "Dracula" and Diderot's "The Nun." Dr. Livingstone said this will allow students to "compare the literary versus the historical reality, which may be the same or may be different."

"It's been great fun putting this cooperative effort together," said Dr. Cowan, when asked how she felt about the course. She says that the course will give students the opportunity to explore women as being both victims and perpetrators of evil.

The number of the course is 349, and it can be found in the spring timetable under English, history, or religion. The three credit hours can be counted toward the major or minor in any one of these three departments.

Dr. Doucette commented that she is "glad about how well the course has been received." There are currently about 20 to 25 students enrolled, and there are still a few slots available to interested students.

MACCO prepares for 175th anniversary

by Amanda Martin
Staff Writer

As part of the Maryville College 175th Anniversary celebration, the Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra will present a program of "Opera Favorites" on October 24, at 8 p.m. at Wilson Chapel. Soloists are Kaaren Erickson, soprano, Ann Killebrew Taddie, mezzo-soprano, Ed Sooter, tenor, and Robert Ergenbright, bass-baritone.

"It's going to be an exciting concert," said MACCO conductor Bill Robinson. "It is fun for the orchestra to play with soloists who are so professional...it's inspiring."

The concert will feature internationally renowned opera singers Erickson and Sooter, who have been married for several years. Though in demand all over the United States and Europe, they make their permanent home in Maryville. Erickson has appeared on several Metropolitan Opera radio and television broadcasts. Sooter has enjoyed a very successful career, especially in Germany.

Also featured will be Taddie. Not only is Taddie a successful performer, but she is also in high demand as a voice instructor. Aside from Maryville College, she also teaches at Carson-Newman College and has many private students.

Formerly an Assistant Professor of Music at Maryville College, Bob Ergenbright is currently the Director of Programs and Music at Broadway United Methodist Church. During his Maryville College association he directed choral activities as well as instructed voice.

The program will include a variety of both vocal and orchestral music, ranging from 17th to 20th century works. Music of Purcell, Mozart, Bizet, Wagner, and R. Strauss will be performed.

Admission is free for Maryville College students who present a valid I.D. Admission prices are: general public, $7.00; students and senior citizens, $5.00; with a half-price discount for Maryville College faculty and staff.

Seventh annual Appalachian lecture series begins

by James Robbins
Staff Writer

This fall the seventh annual Appalachian Lecture series will be held in the Proffit Dining Room.

This year the series, titled "Right Where We Live," will consist of three lectures by prominent authors, writers, and lecturers in the region.

On September 13 at 7:30 p.m. Dr. Jean Haskell Speer will present "Appalachia in the Global Village," a lecture about Appalachia in the eye of the world's consciousness.

On October 11, Dr. Roberta Teague Herrin will lecture about Appalachian literature and perceptions of it in, "From Hillbillies to Apologetics: One Hundred Years of Appalachian Children's Literature."

"The Life in Our Stories" by Ina Hughs on Nov. 15 will be about stories of Appalachia.

Each lecture costs $15.00, which includes dessert and coffee. For ticket information, contact Jane Richardson at box 2827 or extension 8205.

Phone-A-thon 1994

If you are interested in working the Phone-A-Thon, drop your name, phone number, box number, class standing, and the best two nights that you can work in box 2384.

The commitment is one night of training, and two full nights of calling. The compensation is $10 for training, and $15 for each night calling. Free food is provided every night.

You must be comfortable talking on the phone with complete strangers.

Training will be held Nov. 8 and 9, and the Phone-A-Thon will be held Nov. 14-17.

Homecoming preparations reaching climax

by Brandee Forester
Staff Writer

Homecoming week will be here before we know it. This year an array of events has been planned in order to maximize the enjoyment of those interested in participating.

The theme for this year's Homecoming celebration is "It's a Jungle Out There." Activities will begin on October 23, and the celebration will culminate on the following Saturday with the traditional Homecoming dance.

The first event on the week's agenda will be the Kirking of the Tartans at 10:30 a.m., October 23, at New Providence Presbyterian Church. According to Emily Yarbrough, MC's director of Communications, this will be a ceremony of tradition, honoring Scottish families in remembrance of the days when tartans were worn into church and blessed before war.

Isaac Anderson, the founder of Maryville College, founded New Providence Presbyterian Church just one year later, so, as Jane Gilbert, MC's Director of Alumni and Parent Programs, maintains, it is appropriate that part of the college's celebration should take place at the church.

At 4 p.m. on the same day, in a book-signing program sponsored by the American Association of University Women (AAUW), Sherry Bonham will present highlights from "History of Maryville College," a book co-written by former MC faculty members Dr. Carolyn Blair and Dr. Arta Walker, in the Proffitt Dining Room. She will be placing emphasis on women and the Blount County/Maryville community.

Every year, the Student Programming Board coordinates a competi-

Parking problems plague campus

by Shannah Newman
Staff Writer

Maryville College seems to be experiencing more parking problems than usual. So much so that some people are referring to it as "the parking crisis."

The parking lot located at Isaac's is full every morning. Commuters, staff, faculty, and residents all try to park in a lot that holds approximately 180 vehicles.

"Due to the lack of available parking, students are forced to park in areas further away [than commuters had planned] and often times are late for class," said Robbie Patton, senior.

Chief of Security, Eldria Hurst, works daily to free parking spaces, for commuters as well as others, by writing tickets. "Some days I write 5, 10, 15, even 20 tickets," said Hurst.

He began writing tickets on September 15. As of October 6, Hurst had written approximately 100 tickets.

These violations have not only been given to students, they have also been given to staff members, faculty, visitors, and even to residents.

Hurst estimated, "There are a thousand students this year, and 800 parking places."

Last year, 199 commuters and 97 Continuing Education students attended Maryville.

College. This year, 243 commuters and 95 Continuing Education students attend class. These figures decrease the number of parking spaces by 42.

However, the problem is not necessarily to blame on the increase of commuters. Residents are "driving to Isaac's and to Sutton's parking lots during classes, instead of leaving their cars at their dorms and walking to class," said Kristi DeBusk, sophomore.

Hurst has written several tickets to these residents. For regular parking violations, such as parking in faculty lots, visitor spaces, fire lanes, no parking zones fines are as follows: first offenders $8, second $15, third $20, and fourth $25. After the fourth offense, a person may forfeit their rights to operate a vehicle on campus for the remainder of the academic year. These fines can be paid in the Business Office.

The question was raised as to whether or not zoning the parking lots, as they used to be in years past, would provide help or even a solution to the problem. Hurst commented, "No. Zoning didn't work then and probably won't now."

There are 547 registered resident and commuter vehicles on campus. There are approximately 675 parking spaces available, excluding visitors, staff, and faculty parking.

The simplest solution for commuters, suggested Hurst, is to allow time to walk to classes and be prepared to park in an area other than at Isaac's or Sutton. He also said that "Residents should remain parked at their dorms until 5 p.m." This would free some spaces and decrease the number of tickets written.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial... Editorial

The Maryville College Covenant states as its third principle:

Integrity

- to act with integrity in all interactions—academic, personal, and beyond

- to encourage and support my fellow students as they aspire to be honest in their academic endeavors, as well as their personal relationships

As reported in the last issue of the Echo, the Academic Integrity Board met in September to hear a case concerning the sale of a term paper for $50. The student charged with this offense pleaded guilty, was suspended from the college for a semester, and a letter of censure was placed in the student's file in the Registrar's Office.

To quote the AIB report, "The Board believes the offense is especially egregious because of the exchange of money; it is deeply concerned that integrity was exchanged so easily for a price."

What is integrity? The "Webster Dictionary" defines integrity as "1, fidelity to moral principles; honesty. 2, soundness; completeness."

The AIB was deeply concerned that fidelity to moral principles was so easily exchanged for money. The problem here is that the moral principles that student "A" compromised were those of the college, and quite possibly not the principles of the student. This presents a very real problem of consistency of values for the college community. What values do we hold dear, and is our definition of academic integrity the same?

Apparently it is not. When problems such as the selling of term papers arise, then that is a clear indication that the faculty and staff's definition of academic integrity is not consistent with the students' definition.

Although this discrepancy exists, there is no reason for it to. Not only does each student sign the Covenant, but each student signs the "Maryville College Handbook," which states on page 75:

Academic honesty is a cherished principle in the life of the Maryville College community and is a critical commitment expressed in the Maryville College Covenant. Students are urged to adhere to this principle by avoiding plagiarism of materials in any format, by refraining from the use of unauthorized aids on tests and examinations, by turning in assignments which are products only of their own efforts and research, and by refusing to give or receive information on tests and examinations. Any person violating these principles of simple honesty risks embarrassment, course failure, and dismissal.

The handbook goes on to discuss how violations of academic honesty will be handled, and the purpose and procedures of the AIB.

With this information that each Maryville student is held accountable for, there is no room or excuse for a discrepancy. The entire issue of academic honesty and integrity is addressed in an unambiguous manner.

With that in mind, ideally our community should not be faced with problems of academic integrity. Each student claims awareness of the school policies when he or she signs the Student Handbook Sign-Off Sheet.

Each of us commits to the ideals of Maryville College when we choose to attend the school. In kind, we each agree to be held accountable for the policies of the school. According to Dr. Susan Schneibel, at any academic institution, the free exchange of ideas must take place unhindered by the fear of academic dishonesty if learning is to take place. We all learn from each other as well as from our professors.

If we intend to become "the best possible college" of the "Maryville College 2000 Plan," and if we ever hope to establish a community based on the principals of the Covenant, then, as students of Maryville, we must take an active part in these endeavors. There is no room for academic dishonesty at Maryville College, and we, not the faculty, nor the staff, nor the AIB, must take measures to ensure that it does not take place.

The US, motives for military intervention

by Josh Hogan
Columnist

"America's most powerful assets for influencing the rest of the world are its philosophy and free institutions, the ideas of limited government and free enterprise that are now sweeping the globe, and its economic prowess as the world's most productive nation." So Doug Bandow argues in a recent issue of "Current." I came to this column with the question of what particular issue I wanted to address, and that issue of "Current" along with Saddam Hussein's recent military maneuvers made me wish to evaluate America's role in foreign affairs. In his article, Bandow argues that the United States should divorce itself from the role of "global policeman" that seems to be forced upon us in any time of global unrest, or at least during times of global unrest that are noticed by a large part of the globe. For example, we are called on, or at least feel as if we are called on, to respond to a situation such as Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Conversely, nothing was said or done about much of the unrest that occurs throughout Africa or even such events as the persecution of the Kurds. I tend to agree with Bandow; it is not military strength or presence that makes the United States the nation that it is. The many people across the world that have dreamt or are still dreaming of coming to the U.S. are not motivated by the idea that, "Hey, I'm going to America to benefit from smart bombs and the US military presence in Germany." It is the "American Dream," our freedoms, and the institutions that administer those freedoms that draw the multitudes of immigrants to our shores.

Now we are faced with more of Saddam's military strutting. As in August of 1990, his troops are sitting across the border from the small principality of Kuwait. The Clinton administration is beginning to sound like the Bush administration, making threats of military chastisement to the dictator of Iraq. I have to think, "What are we still doing there?" Really, should we still be present in the area, and can we keep responding to Hussein's maneuvering by deploying troops, then pulling them when the perceived threat is over? As former Secretary of State Warren Eagleburger said, there is nothing to stop this scenario from reoccurring. For instance, Hussein pulls back this time and we send our troops back to their families only to see 60,000 Iraqi troops mass on the border six months from now. This is a wonderful opportunity for Hussein to torment us into lifting sanctions. Think of the monetary cost to the United States to deploy equipment and soldiers halfway around the world every time this happens. Of course, this is saying nothing of the fact that each and every one of those soldiers are the sons and daughters of America. Bandow asks a very pertinent question regarding Desert Storm: "How many American lives did policy makers think Kuwait's liberation would be worth? Five thousand? Fifty thousand?" How long will it be till the US gets tired of repeating Hussein's little scenario and lifts the oil embargo? I would wager that is exactly Hussein's plan; he may be a self-centered megalomaniac, but he's not stupid. I don't see Hussein venturing to take over Kuwait in the face of Saudi Arabia or a hostile Iran. Similarly, I think it is very unlikely that he could possibly overrun the entire Middle East. There is little doubt of the ability of nations like Israel being able to defend themselves.

Having said all of that, my point is that I see little use in policing areas such as Kuwait. It is not in our country's best interest, and we were not really doing it for any high "ideals," as Bandow points out. We were apparently not interested in democracy, or we would have held Kuwait accountable for their promises of "democratization." Of course, I do not agree with Bandow when he says that we should only get involved when our country will benefit directly. We do need to be involved in Bosnia-Herzegovina and we did do the right thing by helping Somalia. I think we make our mistakes when we begin to meddle in politics and deviate from our original humanitarian intent.

Marriott, Food Services Committee work together

by Jessica Lemler
Staff Writer

"What's for dinner?" is a common question on campus. Thanks to the new Food Services Committee, meals are no longer such a guessing game.

The Food Services Committee was established this year to work in conjunction with Marriott to provide better food and more information about the food for students. The committee is made up of students and is responsible for writing the menus Marriott uses. "Our goal is to bring the quality of the food up to the standards that students want," said Junior Becky Heckler, a member of the committee.

Marriott has been providing food for Maryville College for six years, and this is the first year that student input has had such a major impact on the food services. Kevin Collins is very excited about how well the committee is working with his staff. So far the committee has established one theme night per month and one "taste change," or specialty bar, per day. The committee has also made improvements in the menu and in the overall atmosphere of the dining hall.

One of these changes is the new blackboard, located outside of the dining hall, that gives a nutritional breakdown of the food. This is part of the committee's plan to offer students healthier food options.

Despite these and other improvements, some students still find the food services to be inadequate. One area of concern for students is Marriott's closing down the hot bar before the cafeteria closes. The closing of the hot bar was "the idea of the committee," Collins said.

Another area of concern is the lack of healthy vegetarian entrees. "When vegetarian dishes are offered, they're loaded with cheese and fat," said Nikki Masters. Masters, like many vegetarians, has difficulty finding nutritious things to eat that do not have meat in them.

Kelly Meacham is also displeased with the content and variety of the food. "Get a clue," he said. "Grease is not a food group."

"Bagels are about the only food they have that don't give me intense gastrointestinal pain," said Paula Howse, another discontent student.

Not all students look at the food services unfavorably. "With the availability of the microwave, the Marriott food is always good," commented Robby Kolb.

"I hate it when people complain about the food because I've had a lot worse," said Tom Poag.

Jon Peters made the observation that "At least I don't have to pay for it, cook it, or clean up afterwards."

Every day, 463 students count on Marriott to provide them with hot food, clean dishes, and a pleasant dining atmosphere. Marriott provides all of this for only five dollars per day per student.

Marriott understands that not everyone will always be pleased with the food. "It's all right but sometimes it just sucks," said Robert Polstra. "I mean, sometimes they have good stuff, and sometimes it just sucks."

Marriott's hope is that with the establishment of the Food Services Committee, improvements can be made so that as many students as possible can be content with the food services they provide.

The Food Services Committee welcomes any comments or suggestions students may have. Students can use either the comment cards on the tables or send their comments to box 2384.

Senate report: petition update

by Lance Klosterman
Student Senate President

Hello Campers,

Once again I want to report to you concerning the progress in Student Senate. Additionally, the Board of Directors is coming to town on October 20 and 21. If you have anything that you feel should be discussed at the Board Meeting, please let me know.

This past meeting, the College Democrats and College Republicans petitioned Senate for $147.25 for an Elections Returns Party on November 8. It will be held in Isaac's, and will be open to the whole campus. More information will come your way, but there is a moral to this story. They wrote a proposal asking for a substantial amount of money to pay for a party, and this proposal passed in the senate unanimously. If a group is willing to put forth effort to make this campus a more livable place, the Senate will pay! (usually) A group does not have to only sponsor a party. If a group would like to purchase T-shirts for its members, petition for the money. What is the worse thing that can happen? You do not get the money. The Senate is willing to debate whether or not the funds should be granted. All I ask is that it is something available to the whole campus. This money that we distribute is the student fee that everyone paid at the beginning of the year; therefore, it should be used by chartered groups.

What if your group is not chartered? Write the bylaws of the club and petition Senate to establish a charter. The Senate will debate the validity and appropriateness of the club and will decide if the group should be chartered.

Keep your eyes on the signs about the intramurals. Todd Kline, the new Intramurals Coordinator, with the help of Ticca Hartsfield, has made great efforts to make intramurals take off this year. There will be a grand opening of the P.E. building as a temporary student/leisure/recreation center soon. If you want to be a part of it send a note to Ticca.

Finally, I have decided to write this column so that students at Maryville College will be informed. If a person's name is mentioned in this column it is because I have noticed individual effort and I want the students to know who they can talk to if they have a comment. I will often mention the names of those who serve on Senate because I work with them regularly. There are many people "behind the scenes" that have put a lot of work into projects and committees. I wish to thank them now. This college would not be the great place it is without people like you.

Humanities Club sponsors events on campus

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

"This event was sponsored by the Humanities Club." In the past, this was not a commonly heard phrase here at Maryville College, but this year's Humanities Club wants to change that.

"The creative and social activities being planned will give the club a higher profile on campus," said Dr. Amy Livingstone, the club's advisor.

The club was established to provide events related to literature and humanities for the college community as well as to bring unity to the newly formed Humanities Division.

Beyond these immediate goals, the club also wants to provide "dialogue between faculty and students so that they become more aware of each other," said Livingstone. "That's really important for everybody."

Livingstone went on to say, "I'm really looking forward to having more contact with my students."

The club members have already sent out a newsletter to humanities students. "They've got some exciting things planned," said Dr. Susan Schneibel, chair of the Humanities Division.

On Oct. 20, there will be a poetry slam in Carnegie parlor at 7:30 p.m. This will be an opportunity for students to read their poetry.

On October 31, the club will co-sponsor a Halloween party in the Center for Campus Ministry at 8 p.m. with the Student Programming Board. The party will be a tribute to Edgar Allan Poe. Refreshments will be provided.

On Nov. 10, Dr. Sam Overstreet will present his paper "An Electronic Edition of 'Piers Plowman': New Tools, Timeless Challenges" in the Proffit Dining Room at 11 a.m.

The Humanities Club is also trying to keep the student body informed about other events of interest, such as the Appalachian Lecture Series and a new course at UT.

The course will be a three week non-credit class taught by LaVerne Lindsey, UT's associate vice chancellor and dean of continuing education, John Peters, UT's chancellor of educational affairs, and Richard Wirtz, dean of the UT college of law. They will discuss the books "The Bridges of Madison County," "Preparing for the 21st Century," and "The Seven Habits of Highly Effective People."

Officers of the Humanities Club are Angela McLemore, president, Jenny Cummings, vice president, and Josh Hogan, vice president.

Suggestions for the club are welcome, and should be placed in either box 2587, 2018, or 2398.

Homecoming

tion between dormitories, with commuters acting as an additional group, during Homecoming week. The competition is based on a point system according to student participation.

This year, the competition will kick off with a Sexy Legs contest. At 7 p.m., on the 2nd floor of Pearsons, a male and female resident will be chosen from each of the dorms on campus, and photographs of their legs will be taken and posted outside the cafeteria, along with jars, in order that everyone may use his or her spare change to vote for the pair of legs that he or she finds most appealing. The money will be donated to a charity, and the male and female with the sexiest legs will acquire points for their dorm.

The dorm competition will continue on Monday, October 24, at 7 p.m. in the Center for Campus Ministry (CCM), with a Dutch auction, which, according to Stephanie Fugate, co-chair of the SPB, is a kind of "reverse scavenger hunt."

On Tuesday night, a powder-puff football game will be held at 6:30 p.m. on the soccer practice field. Commuter, Davis, and Pearsons women will play against women from Carnegie, Copeland, and Lloyd, with Gable residents acting as cheerleaders, coaches, and referees. Both participants and spectators will gain points for their respective dormitories. At 6 p.m., Wednesday, October 26, an Anything Goes event will be held in the grassy area between Sutton Science Center and Anderson Hall.

On Thursday, October 27, at 11 a.m., alumni leaders of higher education will hold a panel, moderated by MC's president, Dr. Gerald W. Gibson, on The Liberal Arts: Preparation for Life and Leadership.

At 8 p.m., "Pippin" will be performed in the Maryville College Playhouse. Student attendance will be monitored, and points will be distributed to the respective dorms or commuter group.

On Friday, October 28, an alumni golf tournament will be held at noon at Lambert Acres Golf Course. According to Emily Yarborough, non-alumni can participate for a fee of $50 per person.

Between 1 p.m. and 3 p.m., an Alumni Science Symposium will be held at Sutton Science Center. This will be open to the public. At 4 p.m., an Orange and Garnet baseball game will be held at MC Baseball Stadium. "Pippin" will have a second showing at 8 p.m. A SPB-coordinated Coffee House, a relaxed-atmosphere talent show, will be held in Lloyd lobby at 10 p.m. Anyone who is interested in participating should contact either Stephanie Fugate at extension 8760 or Jeannine Quick at 8775.

On October 29, Homecoming registration will take place at Willard House between 9 a.m. and noon. The Alumni Science Symposium will continue at Sutton Science Center between 9 a.m. and 11 a.m. Between 9:30 a.m. and noon, "A Visit to Scotland" will take place in the CCM. This will be a travelogue and preview, including a slide show and video, of the 1995 Scotland tour, a 14-day trip for which 15 people are signed up.

At 10 a.m., there will be a reception for theater alumni at the MC Playhouse. Meanwhile, the Harvest Crafts Fair/Bake Sale will be held for its 26th year in the right-hand gym court. This will take place until 5 p.m. Proceeds from sales will fund scholarships for juniors and seniors in Blount County high schools.

Also at 10 a.m., an alumni soccer game will begin on the MC soccer field, and an alumni volleyball game will commence in the gym. There will be a buffet luncheon from 11:30 a.m. until 1 p.m. under a tent near the baseball stadium, at the cost of $6.00 per person. The Cooper Athletic Center, as part of the Vision '94 Campaign, will be dedicated to two MC alumni at noon. Guests from Knoxville will perform a Scottish dancing demonstration around the site of the dedication, once before and once after the event.

Before the Homecoming football game, between MC and Methodist College at 1:30 p.m., there will be a parade around campus in celebration of MC's 175th year. The residence halls will display either golf carts or flat-bed trucks that they have decorated in remembrance of the traditional parade that used to take place in the middle of Maryville city. There will be a third performance of "Pippin" at 8 p.m. in the MC Playhouse.

The semi-formal Homecoming dance will be held in a banquet room at the Royal Oaks Golf Community from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. Invitations and directions are pending.

MC's Homecoming is expected to be a great success by many people this year, including Gilbert, who expects 1,000 extra people to join students, staff, and faculty in celebration of our 175th year. According to Yarborough, commemorative Coke bottles will be on sale for people who want reminders of their attendance.

DRB, Judiciary Board members chosen

by Kristie Paschel
Staff Writer

The third consecutive year of the Disciplinary Review Board and the Student Judiciary Board is now underway, and the members have been announced.

The Disciplinary Review Board is composed of one representative from each residence hall and one commuter representative.

The 1994-95 Disciplinary Review Board members are as follows: Jessica Lemler of Lloyd Hall, Janis Burge of Pearsons Hall, Jeff Bebout of Gamble Hall, Eric Obermiller of Copeland Hall, Jeremy Landis of Carnegie Hall, Charity Merritt of Davis Hall, and Rachel Gregory, commuter. The Chief Justice for this year is Laura Sibold.

The DRB is in charge of screening the incident reports to decide if they will be referred for a formal hearing.

The Student Judiciary Board is composed of nine members selected by the accused student from twelve potential members.

The members are as follows: Eddie Bates, Sherrie Brents, Andy

Byrd, Laura Culp, Kenyon Evans, Marcus Farmer, Amy Fenner, Kelly Garrison, Katie Greer, Rebecca Kiefer, Devin Koester, Hunter Letchman, Christen McCammon, Darin McGowan, Lizbeth Opiala, Kristen Parkhouse, Sheila Pirl, John Reiter, Nick Schell, Chris Thomas, and Alice Wong.

The Student Judiciary Board hears cases referred to them by the DRB. It determines guilt or innocence regarding Maryville College policy violations.

The Campus Appeals Board consists of two resident students, one commuting student, one faculty member, and one staff member appointed by Student Senate with approval by the college president. The student members are as follows: Beth Brakebill, Stephanie Fugate, and Kimberly Syphrett.

The boards, which are student-elected and student-run, were set up in the fall of 1992 to provide an organized way of presenting incident reports in a just manner.

There are several reasons that the boards are believed to be the fairest possible of disciplinary methods. Since the boards are headed by the students themselves, specific measures must be taken to protect the rights of fellow students.

The creation of the "blind review" was important because MC is one of few, if any, colleges that practices it. This involves review of individual cases by withdrawal of the identification of the accused students so that they remain anonymous while their case is under observation. Practicing the blind review provides an unbiased atmosphere for the trial to be heard.

Though the DRB and J Board do not perform formal legal proceedings, they do present realistic cases upon which the accused student's status as a MC student does depend.

Dr. Sue Wyatt and Cathy Cate, both of the Student Development Office, participate in the DRB and J Board. However, Wyatt stresses that the students do all of the work.

"We are really pleased with the students on the boards," she said. She said she could not stress enough the importance of the students being the board leaders.

The difference between MC's DRB and J Board and other collegiate disciplinary boards is that other colleges have the staff screen the boards, whereas MC allows the students "to take the responsibility and the accountability" for the screening, said Wyatt.

Wyatt expressed her support for the boards by citing the overall reduction in incidents involving students since the development of the DRB and J Board.

She believes that the survival of the boards can be attributed to the cooperation of the staff with the students. When asked to expand upon that cooperation, Wyatt said, "The staff and the senator are able to work with each other when problems occur, instead of staff vs. students."

Wyatt and Cate will be presenting a program on MC's DRB and J Board at a professional conference in Nashville next month to introduce other colleges to the idea of a student-elected, student-run judicial system.

Curriculum changes under way

by Marc Hall
Photo Editor

So you say some of the classes you take here at Maryville are somewhat dated and not worth your time? Are these classes just not part of you major at all? If you feel this way, then you will be glad to know that these issues are being discussed every Tuesday and some Thursdays in Thaw room 209.

The Curriculum Task Force was established last year in the hopes of making the college's general education curriculum a little more up to date. The core classes here at Maryville have not been revised since 1982.

There are five faculty members on the board. They are: Dr. Terry Bunde, Dr. Sherry Kasper, Dr.

Lori Schmied, Dr. Susan Schneibel, and Dr. Daniel Taddie. There is also one student on the board, Sophomore Sarah Stevenson, and one staff member, Becky Hedrick, from the Registrar's office.

Last year, the board's first goal was to write and state the college's educational goal statement which was approved just this semester. It was an organizational year, where the goals were stated so that "now when we are looking at different classes, we can refer back to the goals and make sure that we are meeting them with the changes that we make," declared Stevenson.

The Curriculum Task Force is now discussing the whole freshman experience, and how to further care for their needs. Stevenson went on to say that the experience had in the form of orientation and inquiry needs to go beyond the freshmen year. Instead of the one semester of nurturing and discovering of one's talents, the board would like for the students to feel like a family, still tied to their orientation groups of long ago, at the end of their time here.

Dr. Dean Bolden, chairman of the review board, said that these changes will not be in effect for the students that are currently here at the college. These changes will more than likely take effect in 1996 when the class of 2000 begins their freshman year. As far as the progress on the review, Bolden feels optimistic that a new core curriculum can be "hammered out." Bolden also went on to say that, "A curriculum defines a college." Bolden feels that at least one common bond between all Maryville students is the core curriculum.

Student input is encouraged. Send comments and suggestions to Stevenson, box 2612.

College Democrats formed

by Chee Hill
Staff Writer

A new organization has been formed on campus. Joining the recently created College Republicans, the College Democrats Club has now officially gained its status as a club.

The members obtained their charter from Student Senate last year, but just this year they are beginning their journey towards a permanent stay on campus.

The charter was written and presented to Student Senate last year by Alex Little, a junior Democrat. Little stressed that the main reason why he strived to get the charter was and still is because he believes that a democratic voice needs to be heard on campus. There is already a group of College Republicans, but there was a need for facilitation of democratic views for the students.

"This year there seems to be a larger group of interested students with democratic opinions," Little said. "That would provoke some good debates."

Little was elected as the discussions coordinator at the first group meeting. He believes that the debates provide "good educational discussions about just what is going on in the nation and the world." The debates are scheduled and set up by either the College Democrats or the College Republicans, and the dates are posted around campus. All people in the community are invited to attend.

The next debate will be on the subject of Affirmative Action, in the Center for Campus Ministry on October 26 at 6:30 p.m.

Some of the other up and coming debate issues will be on the United States' intervention in Haiti, the Cuban trade embargo, and other issues, such as the recent and past debates in Congress regarding Clinton's Health Care Plan.

The President of the College Democrats is Senior David Hughes.

He stated that the history of a debating society on Maryville College campus was "strong in the past." He foresees that society beginning again.

Hughes' feeling about the newly established club is that it will remain strong and fulfill its duty and purpose. The main purpose, as he said is to "get the word out about political issues, involve the students in a productive, educational way, and encourage people to vote."

The other officers are Jason Thompson, a sophomore elected as vice-president, and Russell Perry, a junior elected as treasurer/secretary.

All students of any political preference are invited to come to the meetings. The College Democrats meet every Thursday night in the Center for Campus Ministry at 7 p.m.

There is an Election Day party scheduled on November 8 to be held with the Republicans as co-hosts.

Democrats host affirmative action debate

by Sarah West
Staff Writer

During Homecoming week, there will be a Democrat-sponsored political debate between the College Republicans and the College Democrats on affirmative action.

The debate is to be held on Oct. 26 at 7:00 p.m. in the Center for Campus Ministry. The two students debating will be Democrat Alex Little and Republican Chris Noe.

A panel of three faculty members will be directing the questions, and the moderator will be Dr. Scott Brunger, economics professor.

"What government did was call on government officials, private corporations, and so forth to take special efforts in order to recruit, hire, and promote those previously discriminated against, so that the present effect of past discrimination can be removed. It is a race, ethnic, and sex-conscious plan," said Dr. Young-Bae Kim, political science professor.

The issue had also surfaced in the Supreme Court. On October 3 the "New York Times" printed the following: "Issues on which the Court has yet to achieve closure or even much coherence are prominent on the docket, including significant challenges to Federal affirmative action programs. The Federal affirmative action case . . . brings back to the Court the question of whether the Government can constitutionally award a preference on the basis of race in the absence of proof that the individual who receives the benefit has personally been the victim of discrimination."

Republican Chairman and representative Noe summarized his stand by saying "I think the majority of Republicans see that this [affirmative action] will undermine the quality of workmanship and denote the standard of living in America. Quotas for quotas' sake is not right. I believe one should be judged or hired according to his or her merit."

Representative Little expressed his view when he said, "It's thirty years now since the Civil Rights movement, and I think it's fair to assume that both sides agree that we still have some type of a problem in America. Some type of an equal opportunity system should be enacted for those who are less fortunate than others."

Noe commented, "I would just like it to be clarified that it is not to be politicized as just a race issue. It's also a gender issue."

Both parties do agree on the intent for this debate. "We want to politically educate people on this issue," said Noe.

David Hughes, President of the College Democrats, commented, "I think the average person knows very little about [affirmative action]." The CDs and CRs want to increase political awareness in the Maryville College community.

If anyone has any suggestions for future debates, mail them to either Noe, box 2589, or Hughes, box 2551.

Fighting Scots defense strong

by David Downs
Staff Writer

Frank Leahy once wrote that a good, strong defensive unit is capable of igniting the offensive spark necessary to achieve victory in top-flight competition.

That is exactly what Maryville College defensive coordinator Jim Pavao hopes for each Saturday afternoon.

One spark that ignites the Fighting Scots defense is lone defensive Senior Jon Chambers. A three-year starter at free safety, Chambers brings to the secondary valued experience and aggressive play. A pre-season All-American, Chambers has accounted for 31 solo tackles, two caused fumbles, one fumble recovery, and four interceptions including an 80-yard touchdown interception run so far this year.

Assisting Chambers in the secondary is Junior Nick White and Sophomore Kyle Duke. White, also a pre-season All-American, has 23 tackles on the year and an interception.

The big surprise to Coach Pavao has been Duke. He played quarterback as a freshman and was moved to defensive back at the beginning of this year. This season, Duke has recorded 11 tackles and an interception.

"I knew he was a good athlete and a good, hard worker," said Pavao of Duke. "I knew he was a decent quarterback, but I didn't know if he could play cornerback. He gave it a shot and he came in and he's a starter now. He's come in and done a real good job."

Pavao attributed much of the defense's success this year to the defensive line and linebackers, especially the play of sophomores Mike Hodges, Adam Ray, and David Wagner.

Hodges, a defensive lineman, leads the team in sacks with four and has recorded 33 tackles. Ray has made 22 tackles at defensive end, recovered a fumble, and had a key interception against the University of the South. Wagner, who replaced all-time tackle leader Billy Godfrey, who graduated last year, at middle linebacker, leads the team in tackles with 61 and had two sacks and two caused fumbles.

"We don't have a lot of size defensively," said Pavao, "but we've got decent speed, so we're trying to use the speed factor to our advantage."

Scots nearing end of season, going strong

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

With the Maryville College soccer seasons for both men and women quickly coming to an end, the men are looking toward the tournament and the women are looking toward a strong finish.

The men's team stood at 11-2 as of Oct. 15, which also included a number five ranking in the South and a number 25 ranking in the nation.

Some recent action saw the men's team take a weekend trip, which included stops in Greensboro, N.C., to square-off against Greensboro College on Oct. 8 and at Danville, VA. to face Averett College on Oct. 9.

The men split these two games, moving their record to 10-2.

The Sewanee game on Oct. 12 placed the men at 11-2, Sophomore Chris Reid, and Sophomore Jody Tootle each scoring one goal to beat Sewanee 2-1.

The Scots took on Methodist College Oct. 15, losing 0-4, placing them at 11-3. Freshman goalie Jonathan Brabson suffered a concussion during the game.

Methodist is ranked number two in the South and number 12 in the nation. "It came down to the difference between a real experienced team and a young team," said Coach Pepe Fernandez.

Leaders on offense include Reid with 12 goals and Freshman Wes Unger with seven assists.

The defense is lead by Sophomores Lyle Lassiter, Lawren Lassiter and Brabson.

Upcoming games for the men include an Oct. 20 game at Temple, which Fernandez described as "one of the toughest places to play."

The Scots then will play Emory on Oct. 26 to end the regular season.

Fernandez said of Emory, "They are one of the best teams in the country. Hopefully we will head into the game with a chance to make the tournament."

As for the women, they stand at 7-4-3 as of Oct. 15.

The women also made the weekend trip to Greensboro and Averett, coming away with a tie against Greensboro on Oct. 8 and a win against Averett on Oct. 9.

On Oct. 12, the women beat Sewanee 4-0, Junior Lucille Bayless scoring two goals, and Senior Laura Sibold following with the final two.

The Scots faced Methodist College at home Oct. 15, losing 0-1.

They held Methodist, a team ranked number eight in the South, till the tail-end of the second half. "They played well; I'm proud of them," said Fernandez.

On offense, Bayless is leading the team in both assists and goals.

On defense, the Lady Scots are lead by Sibold, Junior Amy McKeehan, Freshman Amanda Carson, and Freshman Amy Poag.

The team travels to Centre today, about which Fernandez added "We have never lost to them, and hopefully that will continue."

The team will then face Thomas More at home on Oct. 22 and Georgetown on Sun. Oct. 23, also at home.

Faith Esham to perform at MC for 175th celebration

by Amanda Martin
Staff Writer

Internationally renowned soprano Faith Esham, who was the first Alcoa Foundation Affiliate Artist, will return to Maryville College this month to perform a concert as part of the school's 175th anniversary celebration.

Esham has performed in the leading opera houses of the United States and Europe.

She made her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in 1986 as Marzelline in Beethoven's only opera "Fidelio." Her television appearances include the role of Gilda in Verdi's "Rigoletto" in a live telecast from the New York City Opera. She also appeared as Micaela in a film version of Bizet's "Carmen" opposite Plácido Domingo, which was released worldwide.

Esham, a native Kentuckian, received her master's degree in voice and opera from the Julliard School before her association with Maryville College. In 1979, Esham came to Maryville to perform and give master classes as part of the Affiliate Artist program.

Although the Affiliate Artist program has been discontinued due to a lack of funds, the Alcoa Foundation is sponsoring this performance, which is free and open to the public.

It will be held Thursday, October 20, at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall. The program will include works by Duparc, Dvorak, Stephen Foster, Rachmaninoff, Wolf, and Verdi. A reception will follow in the Proffitt Parlor, Carnegie Hall.

In addition to live performances, Esham has been recorded in many full-length operas, both on the EMI and SONY labels. Upcoming for Esham are performances in "Pelleas et Melisande" at the Met and "Madama Butterfly" with the Welsh National Opera Company.

Impressions celebrates twentieth anniversary

by Ben Bendever
Staff Writer

Impressions has been a part of Maryville College since the 1974-75 school year.

Over the years, Impressions has been the responsibility of several advisors, including Dr. Charlotte Beck and Mr. David Powell.

For a time, Impressions was supervised by the writing department. Now it is supervised by the Humanities Division.

Beck reflected that even though there have been many changes over the years, "The character of this book has remained the same." This character is significant in that it provides, "a good opportunity for people to publish work and exchange creativity," continued Beck.

Dr. Susan Schneibel said that, "The English department has been extremely supportive of Impressions in offering contributions as well as participation in the judging of entries."

For the 1993-94 volume of Impressions, Beck was instrumental in re-including art work and photographs. The Impressions staff merged art and literature from non-associated contributors to form the body of the publication.

Currently, Beck is accepting names of those interested in staffing the 1994-95 twentieth anniversary volume of Impressions.

Student publications find new home in Fayerweather

by Claire Stancampiano
Staff Writer

For years Maryville College student publications have provided the student body with facts, opinions, and "goings on about town" they've needed to know about.

Peggy Smith, a senior, has read the Echo for three years and said, "Whenever the Echo is in my box, I read it. It's intriguing this year because of fresh new staff writers." Perhaps it is easier for this year's staff to be "intriguing" because of their new publications office on the second floor of Fayerweather Hall.

The recently renovated publications office is part of the attempt to focus student activities on campus into one building. It has a computer lab complete with five Macintoshes (they were previously spread out between Anderson and Sutton Science), a space for layout, an adjacent dark room, and voice mail where students can leave messages any time of the day or night regarding news stories or other concerns (x8176 for the Echo and x8177 for the Chilhowean).

The lab has an open window cut out in one of the walls to assure constant interaction between the sections of the publications. The Echo, The Chilhowean, Impressions, and writing/communications classes such as Journalism 217 will be working extensively in the office.

"The newspaper staff can build a spirit of comradery because they are all working together in one area."

—Jeff Gary

Dr. Susan Schneibel, head of the Humanities Division, said "The Macs are quite utilized. We can actually teach on them and the students will be able to learn both hardware and software."

This new facility came about through "a cooperative effort between Andy McCall, Student Development, and Dr. Schneibel," said Jeff Gary, faculty advisor to student publications. "Maintenance was very innovative. They used things like extra library shelves, spare paint, and scraps of wood to build tables," he said.

Gary went on to explain, "The newspaper staff can build a spirit of comradery because they are all working together in one area."

Schneibel commented that "There has been an increasing interest in student publications, and this new housing will enable students to do their best work."

Treva Lewis, a junior who is editor of the yearbook, said, "I have very positive feelings about the new space because everything will be right there when we're ready to do layout as opposed to taking it all over to Anderson. It's also air conditioned!"

Sundquist wins it

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

In a night that saw the Republicans take both seats in the Senate, the gubernatorial race followed suit as Republican Don Sundquist defeated Democrat Phil Bredesen.

In his victory speech, he stressed that the people of Tennessee need to work together to create a better state.

"Together we have the opportunity to lead Tennessee into its third century of statehood. We must share the visions of our pioneers who left us with the challenge to continue their legacy and continue to show the great spirit of the state," said Sundquist.

His Democratic counterpart, Bredesen, was equally gracious in defeat.

"It was a tough campaign and it is important to start the healing process immediately. Although we have had our differences, we have much more in common. This includes our love for Tennessee. I congratulate and salute you and your family and want to help you in any way that I can," said Bredesen.

Sundquist defeated Bredesen by more than 10 percent in the final polls, 699,184 to 573,174.

During an interview earlier in the week at the Greenbelt in Maryville, TN the then candidate Sundquist took his stand on many current issues.

Sundquist mentioned that he strongly supported agriculture and tobacco and that he wanted to make TenCare work as well as to work with providers on mental health. He also addressed his opinion that there does not need to be a state income tax and that he is very much in favor of capital punishment.

Also in his speech, while speaking of old fashioned values, he pre-

"I want Phil Bredesen to know that I'd be willing to settle the election at Kirby Pines"—Republican candidate for Governor, Don Sundquist, spoke at a rally Nov. 3 at the Green Belt.

Sundquist campaigns in Maryville, rally at Greenbelt

by Paul Weaver
Editor

On Nov. 1 Don Sundquist and an army of campaign workers rolled into Maryville at 11:15 a. m.

The campaign bus was parked behind the Maryville courthouse, and Sundquist made his way to a gazebo on the Greenbelt where lunch and a political rally waited for him.

This occurred just a week before the voting began that would decide the gubernatorial race for Tennessee.

Sundquist ran a grassroots campaign with 60,000 volunteers across the state.

Earlier in the election he had been campaigning with the support of Jack Kemp.

Sundquist served for twelve years in Congress as the U.S. Representative from District 7 of Tennessee.

When asked by the Echo why he decided to leave Washington, he replied, "Well, I said in '82' when I first ran, that I would stay twelve years and then come home, and I have—I've put my own term limits in. I believe that as Governor you can make a difference in a state."

The Echo was given an interview with Sundquist before the beginning of the rally:

Echo: "What is your stance on TennCare; what are your plans for it?"

Sundquist: "I want to make it work. We're going to spend several months including the providers in making the corrections with us.

We're going to have to do something about mental health, that's sort of fallen by the wayside. I want to remove the cram down position for state employees and teachers, and we'll do that without state income tax."

E: "That was my next question; you're going to go without a state income tax?"

S: "My record is clear; my opponent has waffled on that at various times. I'm strong against new taxes; my opponent, his reputation on taxes has not been good at all."

E: "On education, do you plan on passing any initiatives supporting private institutions in the state, such as Maryville College?"

S: "Well, I support them in what they're trying to accomplish, but I don't have any plans in terms of

O wretched Medea, mother of death itself. With the sword you cut down the flesh of your own womb, leaving us all to look on in disgusted amazement and wonder.

Susan Smith has been arrested and charged with the murder of her two sons, 14-month-old Alexander and 3-year-old Michael. Her sons were buried Sunday in a single casket in Union, South Carolina.

Amid the flowers and tears, ministers raised their voices speaking of faith and forgiveness. As one part of this story closes, the media entrenches itself for another chapter—what will surely be a painful and sensationalized trial.

WIS-TV of Columbia reports that Susan Smith's boyfriend recently broke up with her, writing in a letter that he wanted to be with her, but "did not want any kids around."

Bill Smith mourns. The state prosecutor says that he may seek the death penalty.

People pray for the souls of Alexander and Michael, and then, with the same breath, ask for the life of their mother.

More than one person asks why the two boys had to die, searching for some meaning in a senseless crime.

Ministers urge us to find the grace to forgive Mrs. Smith for what she has done. They implore us not to lose faith in God.

Grandmothers scream "baby killer" and "monster" as Mrs. Smith is driven off to prison.

A neighbor of Mrs. Smith's was quoted in the "New York Times" as saying, "I just hope they were asleep or something and didn't know the horror of dying alone in that car."

Someone, somewhere (a politician perhaps), says that this act reflects the declining state of our society.

Susan Smith, like Medea of the selfsame play (written by Euripides in the third century), has taken the life of her own children. An act so socially deviant that society draws back in revulsion. We can't understand how or why she and Medea would do such a thing.

Yet child abuse is a common occurrence in the United States. When a child is missing, law enforcement agencies are directed, by the Department of Justice, to suspect foul play, and consider the parents as prime suspects.

It is a fact that the majority of all child abuse is committed by a parent or relative that "loves" the child.

Children are killed daily in our society, and it takes a mother tricking the nation—lying to society, to get a national reaction.

We hope and claim that the actions of our modern day Medea are those of a social deviant, but when you look at the amount of child abuse that occurs in our nation it cannot be easy to make that statement with a clear conscience.

The fact is that a little girl living in an impoverished part of Knoxville probably won't make the front page of the "New York Times" when her father bashes her face in. This raises the issue that maybe we don't hold the sanctity of life, especially the life of a child, high enough on our lists of morality. The implications of this we should all ponder.

But the faces of Alexander and Michael still stare at us from the front pages of news papers nationwide. We can still see Bill Smith's face contorted with grief at the funeral of his sons, and we can still see Susan Smith's emotionless face as she is led off to prison.

In spite of all of the social commentary that arises from this crime we are still faced with the question of why our God, or whatever absolute we subscribe to, let this happen. We still have to find out how to cope with this act.

In the final lines of "Medea" the chorus says, "Many things the gods/Achieve beyond our judgement. What we thought/Is not confirmed and what we thought not god/Contrives. And so it happens in this story."

The Reverend Bob Cato responds to the posed questions more simply. "People said, 'We want them home.' They're home... home where there is no more pain... home where there is no more media... where does that leave us? In a little town with the world watching us. How do we cope? We cope with our faith."

Columnist

I guess first of all I should mention that this is a follow-up of sorts to the column in the first issue of the Echo this fall; it is not, though, a follow-up in the sense that I am going to expand on the exact same theme. Abortion will not even be discussed. I would like to, again, raise some questions concerning the Christian Church's response to social issues.

In the latest issue of "The East Tennessee Catholic," a particular article entitled, "Vatican: No Communion for Divorced, Remarried Catholics," caught my eye, and I must admit, raised my ire. It seems that the Vatican has "forcefully reaffirmed that divorced Catholics in unsanctioned second marriages cannot receive Communion." I have to react, "What are these people trying to do? How are they to live out their faith commitment?" The Catholic Church is one which is based very heavily in the sacraments and the administering of those sacraments. The teaching on Communion, at least as I have understood it, is that it is a sacrament of healing, an extension of the healing grace brought by Jesus of Nazareth. If one is guilty of adultery because of remarriage without the approval of the church (and I use a small "c" because I am speaking of the hierarchy and not the universal Church), then are they not in great need of healing? And since the main healing of the Church is administered through the sacraments, if the church is denying them the very sacraments they need for healing, how are they to be healed in the Catholic Church? The article states, "Such people 'are not excluded from ecclesial communion.'" More interestingly, the church declares that it "is concerned to accompany them pastorally and invite them to share in the life of the Church in the measure that is compatible with the divine law, from which the Church has no power to dispense." I must say that I have a real problem with this statement from my experience of Catholic faith, and from knowing some of those who are divorced and remarried in the Catholic Church. I must agree that ecclesial communion is a very important element in one's faith life, but the Catholic Church still centers the Mass, our main worship service, for lack of proper description, around the sacraments, especially communion.

What does it mean, though, that the Church has no power to dispense from the divine law? Is that saying that we have no way of changing the laws that we feel to be directly from God? Fine, I can understand that; Jesus did say that humans must not divide what God has joined. Still, are we completely chained to a law that is etched in a stone tablet or written on old parchment? Jesus once said that the Sabbath was made for humans, not humans for the Sabbath. This is the same with "divine law." That law was made for Christians: we were not made simply to follow that law.

I want to close by giving you what I feel to be a rather wonderful image. Nikos Kazantzakis, in his much talked about "Last Temptation of Christ," paints for us a riveting picture of the scene of the publican Matthew's calling to be a disciple (of course, we know him better as St. Matthew). Jesus says, "Welcome Matthew. Come with me." To this the old Rabbi, Simeon, objects, "My child, a publican! It's a great sin. You must listen to the Law." Jesus replies simply: "Father, I listen to my own heart." Maybe the Church would be closer to fulfilling its mission in the world if they try to understand "divine law" in the context of forgiveness.

Editor's note: The article in issue two titled "Homecoming preparations reaching climax" was written by Brandee Shafer.

At the movies with Bo and Chris

by Bo McMichael and
Chris Stephens
Staff Writers

Welcome movie-goers to "At the Movies with Chris and Bo." This week these two film fanatics will try not to agree on movies such as "Clear and Present Danger," "The Shawshank Redemption," "Wes Craven's New Nightmare," "The Puppet Masters," and "Stargate."

"Clear and Present Danger," starring Harrison Ford, brings our hero, Jack Ryan, ("The Hunt for Red October" and "Patriot Games") back to the helm. This time Ryan is fighting the drug lords of South America.

Chris: "I felt it had a lot of 'edge of your seat' action, and what can you say but 'This is vintage Harrison Ford!'"

Bo: "Chris is in love with Ford. This movie was thirty minutes too long, even for Harrison Ford fans. I feel Ryan was too much of a superhero. In one scene, Ryan is in the White House, and the next thing you know, he is hanging from a helicopter in South America!"

The "Shawshank Redemption," starring Tim Robbins and Morgan Freeman, deals with a man convicted of murder who was sent to Shawshank prison to serve his sentence.

Chris: "I feel the story line leads this prison movie to the gates of excellence. The acting was terrific, and the conclusion will put a smile on your face."

Bo: "The movie swept me away for two and half hours. I never looked at my watch once. My pick for movie of the year."

"Wes Craven's New Nightmare," starring Robert Englund (Freddy) and Heather Langencamp (Nancy), brings Freddy out of dreamland and into reality.

Bo: "It was like watching the original nightmare all over again, except this time Freddy is bigger and badder, and definitely for real."

Chris: "I am a virgin Freddy watcher; therefore, this was my first nightmare. It was not bad. However, the acting was poor and lame."

"The Puppet Masters," starring Donald Sutherland, is a sci-fi adventure about alien parasites that take over the minds of their human hosts.

Bo: "The idea ranked an 'A'; however the effort and the acting were both an 'F'. They should have cut this puppet loser!"

Chris: "I agree with Bo. Even a big name like Sutherland could not save this film. It will be at the video store soon."

"Stargate," stars Kurt Russell and James Spader as time-traveling heroes on a distant planet fighting an outer-space vampire.

Chris: "As stupid as the movie sounds, it did not get any better. Kurt Russell in a flat top, yes. "Stargate," James Spader, no!"

Bo: "Chris has no idea what he is talking about. The man has no taste in a good movie. This movie has great potential to be better, and only sequels and time will tell."

"Pulp Fiction," writer-director Quentin Tarantino interweaves the lives of a bunch of urban thugs and lowlifes (including John Travolta, Harvey Keitel, Uma Thurman, Samuel L. Jackson, and Bruce Willis) in the movie they loved at the Cannes Film Festival.

Chris: "The acting was excellent, and the story line was unbelievable. I found myself laughing the entire movie."

Bo: "At least Chris and I agree on the excellent acting, however, this is not a movie to see with a date (due to the excessive killing). Travolta is a must see."

Coming next time: "The War," "Mary Shelley's Frankenstein," "Interview With a Vampire" and "The Santa Clause."

Searching for a Homecoming King

by Lance Klosterman
Student Senate President

The past few weeks have been particularly busy for many of you. The 175th birthday and Homecoming Week put the campus into overdrive. I would like to thank the Student Programming Board for working so hard during Homecoming Week and organizing the best Homecoming Dance I have seen since I have been here. I am sure everyone appreciates the hard work.

The past couple of weeks have been particularly busy for the Student Senate, also. The Board of Directors came into town and a large portion of the Senate met with them for lunch. Needless to say, some of the Board members expressed how impressed they were with many of these students.

Additionally, the Elections committee has put quite a few hours into the Homecoming elections. I appreciate the time and effort of Josh Goocey, Ticia Hartsfield, and Tiffany Rudicil. Taking nominations and counting ballots is a long and tedious job, and they did it all with out complaining. A few students have expressed concern that there is not a Homecoming King as well as a Queen. This is an issue that is brought up every year during Homecoming Week and soon forgotten afterwards. Unfortunately, a week before balloting is too short a time to make any changes. If you want both a Homecoming King and Queen next year, come tell Senate this year so we can change it. If you are interested in doing so, please contact me.

The Senate meeting on October 20 was particularly hectic. The Beta-Beta-Beta Biological Honor Society is organizing a number of lectures to be delivered by scientists around this area. Beth Nuchols wrote a proposal to senate for help with funding. The resolution passed, and Beta-Beta-Beta was given $375 for three seminars. The senate is concerned that these seminars are open to the entire campus, so it awarded installments of $125 pending sufficient advertisement to the whole campus.

Jim Galyon and Josh Goocey petitioned Senate for funds to help with purchasing an ice machine for Gamble Hall. Gamble Hall is planning on organizing events and taking donations to raise the money for the machine. Senate will fund the ice machine up to $700 so they will be able to purchase it. This proposal was a great idea and was passed through the Senate almost unanimously. I encourage other halls to do the same if there is something that it needs (or that the residents want). Talk to Jim or Josh to see how they went about it.

Thanks to all who have helped out lately. I appreciate you hard work.

dicted the now final Tuesday night election in saying simply that, "It will be an old fashioned victory."

Sundquist also made sure that people knew what he was trying to get out of his campaign.

"I want a different kind of campaign. I want to bring people together, not tear them apart."

Sundquist added also that, "If you work hard for me for the next four days, I'll work hard for you for the next four years."

The people of Tennessee will now find out if this is true, as Sundquist has become the new governor of Tennessee.

E: "When you say 'capital punishment,' are you making reference to the death penalty?"

S: "I am."

E: "What are your political plans for the future?"

S: "Nothing. This is my last office."

Sundquist was introduced by Congressman John J. Duncan, Jr. who talked about Bredeesen's negative campaign, and how it had turned against him.

Sundquist followed suit, saying that his campaign was about "old fashioned values, old fashioned rallies, and what's going to happen Tuesday night, an old fashioned victory." He went on to say that he wanted, "a different kind of campaign—I want to bring people together, not tear them apart."

He went on to address the Kirby Pines issue saying, "It's living proof that no good deed goes unpunished." He then produced an add put out by some of the residents of Kirby Pines that said "Kirby Pines residents support Don Sundquist." Sundquist then proclaimed, "I want Phil Bredeesen to know that I'd be willing to settle the election at Kirby Pines."

As he closed his speech, Sundquist told supporters, "If you work hard for me for the next four days, I'll work hard for you for the next four years. I want your vote so we can realize our dreams for Tennessee together for our children and our grandchildren."

"And the winner is..."

Homecoming reaches climax

by Becky Lill
Staff Writer

The floats are disassembled, the banners folded, the bleachers empty, and party clothes put away. With a sigh of relief, we say goodbye to an eventful week.

Homecoming at Maryville College encompassed the week of October 23-29, culminating in a victory against Methodist College and a night of celebration at the Royal Oaks Country Club.

On Saturday, the Fighting Scots played a hard-fought and close game against the Methodist Monarchs. When the dust settled, the Scots pulled through with an 18-13 victory.

The MC pep band was present throughout the game to cheer the team on. They proved to be an outstanding morale booster.

Halftime proved to be quite a show, too. The MC cheerleading squad performed a two-minute dance routine choreographed by Co-Captain Emily Brock, and squad member Starr Hudson.

Then the Homecoming court was presented and the queen was crowned.

Lara Sibold was crowned the 1994 Homecoming Queen. The class representatives were as follows: Stephanie French, senior; Tish Hall, senior; Kesha Snoddy, senior; Jennifer Wells, senior; Jama Cameron, junior; Kerry O'Keefe, sophomore; and Chasity Shelton, freshman.

From 9 to 11 p. m. on Saturday, the Student Programming Board hosted the 1994 Homecoming Dance at the Royal Oaks Country Club. About 300 people came to eat, drink, and be merry. "This was one of the best attended SPB events ever," said Stephanie Fugate, SPB co-chair.

Residence hall competition was also an important part of Homecoming week. The residence halls participated in a Sexy Legs contest, Anything Goes, Dutch Auction, Powder Puff Football, Coffee House, banner competition, float competition, and "Pippin" attendance.

Carnegie Hall took first in almost everything and recieved first place overall. Second place went to Copeland Hall and third place went to Davis Hall.

The Homecoming parade, a past tradition at Maryville College, was revived this year. The floats, Homecoming court, selected alumni, and kilted marchers made their way around campus Saturday morning and got everyone "in the spirit."

The celebration also included a Scottish dancing demonstration, crafts festival, AAUW lecture, Alumni Golf Tournament, "Pippin," Alumni Science Symposium, Preview of 1995 Scotland Tour, Alumni Soccer Game, Alumni Volleyball Game, reception for the theater alumni, a buffet luncheon, and the dedication of the Cooper Athletic Center.

"People seemed a lot more enthusiastic this year," said Matt Wilks, a sophomore. Ginny Rigell, also a sophomore, agrees. "Especially at the game," she said, "there was a lot better spirit than last year."

Homecoming 1994 is not long gone, but MC students are already looking forward to next year.

“Back in my day...”—

Dr. Bryant Cureton and Dr. Ruth Burgos-Sasser discuss the value of a good liberal arts education as Dr. Gerald Gibson moderates.

Forum examines liberal arts

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

Current college students aren't the only people who contemplate the usefulness of a liberal arts education.

Four college presidents, all of whom graduated from Maryville College, gathered together recently to discuss "The Liberal Arts: Preparation for Life and Leadership."

The event was the Oct. 27 Community Forum, moderated by Dr. Gerald Gibson.

The four speakers, in order of appearance, were Bryant Cureton, Ph.D., Ruth Burgos-Sasser, Ph.D., Dorsey Ellis, Jr., J.D., and Naomi Lynn, Ph.D.

After a brief introduction by Gibson, the presidents voiced their opinions.

Although they each had a slightly different spin on the topic, they all were supportive of the liberal arts.

Cureton, president of Elmhurst College, began by discussing misperceptions and myths. He urged students to look "not at unfriendly critics but at uncritical friends" for support and guidance.

He believes that the most important part of the liberal education is the learning of "attitudes of approach."

He went on to say that education should be "fused thoroughly" with life. Cureton maintains that it was his student work job as janitor of the Fine Arts Center that got him where he is today.

Burgos-Sasser, president of San Antonio College, believes that knowledge in many areas is good preparation for any and all careers. She stated that liberal arts "provide a global perspective" and turn people into critical thinkers.

Burgos-Sasser believes that a broad-based education is best because "learning is a lifelong journey" during which people change jobs and careers frequently.

Ellis, dean of the law school at Washington University, focused on the tension between math and science and the humanities through the ages. He stressed that this is a mathematical society. "There should be more emphasis on science for humanities majors," he said. "These are highly transferable skills," Ellis continued. "They are keys to success," he concluded.

Lynn, president of Sangamon State University and sister of Burgos-Sasser, believes that we can strengthen society through the liberal arts education.

She thinks that the humanities make us more compassionate and therefore better citizens. "They teach us to bleed and then to make society a better place for all people," she said.

Lynn continued, "A university is never better than its liberal arts."

She went on to discuss the changes occurring in the world and changes in careers, as well as the new careers being created every day. She mentioned other cultures and new modes of interaction.

"The real hard choices," she concluded, "are not between good and evil but between competing goods."

After the panelists had responded in general terms to liberal arts, Gibson asked them what their liberal arts education had meant to them personally.

They all stressed the values they had learned. Specifically, they referred again to lifelong learning and the surprises in life that were made easier to handle.

The most important point they felt the need to make was that a liberal arts education helps people in life itself, not just in careers.

Dr. Kathie Shiba joins Maryville psychology department

by Kenyon Evans
Staff Writer

"Nothing great was ever achieved without enthusiasm." This Emerson quote seems to describe Dr. Kathie Shiba, the newest member of the Psychology Department.

When asked what she likes about Maryville, she replied, "I like the enthusiasm here. It's a fun place to teach."

Shiba was born, raised, and went to college in central California. She received her Bachelor of Arts in Liberal Studies and a multiple subjects teaching credential from California State University at Sacramento. Her undergraduate classes sparked her interest in psychology, so she took a few more psychology classes and went on to graduate school at University of California at Riverside, where she received her Masters Degree and

"They're great [the students], I really enjoy them."

—Dr. Kathie Shiba

Ph.D. in Psychology.

This is her first time living outside of California, so if you see her shivering in the cold weather, give her a warm welcome and a parka if you have one.

A warm welcome is what Shiba has received from Maryville College. The students and faculty in the Psychology and Child Development departments threw her a surprise welcome party and have continued to welcome her. "I thought that was really sweet of them," she commented.

In her previous teaching experiences, Shiba taught classes of up to 150 people. She enjoys the intimate class sizes here at Maryville.

When asked about her students, she replied, "They're great, I really enjoy them. I've gotten to know quite a few of them. Some of them I have in several classes, which is fun." She also appreciates and enjoys her fellow faculty members, saying, "I love the faculty here. We all get along fine; they've been really supportive of me."

Shiba's specialty is Developmental Psychology; this semester, she is teaching Psych 211 (Developmental Psychology), Psych 218 (Adolescent Development), and Psych 306 (Language Development). She loves teaching Developmental Psychology courses. In the last few years, she began to do a lot of studying of the psychology of women. She will be doing a seminar in the spring on this topic.

Her enthusiasm for teaching was fueled by the teachers that she had in elementary school. Beyond the teachers that inspired her, there are other reasons why she decided to teach. "I went into teaching... because I enjoy [the]... student-teacher relationship where you are interacting and helping someone to learn," she said.

Besides acquiring degrees at U.C., Shiba also acquired her musical tastes there. She enjoys Bob Dillon, Joe Cocker, and Van Morrison. She said of Van Morrison, "I know practically every song that he's written, I just think he's a genius."

Lady Scots battle on as season ends

by John Morgan
Staff Writer

It came down to one game.

The Lady Scots volleyball team, after losing the first match of their own invitational tournament, clawed their way back into contention in the round-robin format and came up just short of the championship, losing in volâ Lindsey Wilson College 17-15.

After the opening loss to Ashbury College, Maryville (14-14) knew that Ashbury would have to lose its last match for the Lady Scots to be in position for the championship.

That was taken care of by Emory & Henry.

Maryville and Wilson each had two wins in the final match, so the tournament was to be settled in a rally-scored, no sideout game with the winner taking home the trophy.

Neither team was able to gain any advantage in the early stages of the game, swapping leads back and forth setting up for a classic finish.

The Lady Scots fought off one match point by Lindsey Wilson at 14-13 then picked up a little momentum and tried to serve out the match at 15-14. The serve was into the net to knot the score at 15 and Wilson went for the knockout, taking the last two points on long, tense rallies.

"We really didn't know what to expect of Lindsey Wilson," Lady Scot coach Kandis Schram said. They are a first year program and they came here ready to play, and they have one dynamite player in Tonya Keen, and she stepped in and took over."

Schram continued, "It was a great match with two even teams; it just came down to a couple of balls that we made mistakes on."

"We did a good job of moving the ball around on the serve to a couple of girls on their team who were having trouble handling the serve," Schram said. "We gave our top effort, and I have no trouble with losing when we play like that."

Senior setter Stephanie French

dished out 84 assists and served 11 aces for the tournament, while tournament MVP Kelly Sanson collected 73 digs and thumped 49 kills.

Amy Snider had 20 blocks.

In addition to Sanson and French, the all-tournament team consisted of Brandy Rinehart of Savannah College of Art and Design, Tonya Mapin and Bron Arvilla of Ashbury College, and Tonya Keen of Lindsey Wilson College.

An up and down season for the Lady Scots ended with a 14-14 record which included wins over Covenant College and Georgia Southwestern on Oct. 27 and Nov. 1.

Coach Schram said, "I believe that the record does not reflect how good this team actually is."

Eight of the team's 14 losses were against regionally and nationally ranked teams. This is no small task for a team that consist of nine first year players.

Scots soccer season closes

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

Seasons for both the men's and women's soccer teams have now come to a close

For the women it was a season that saw them finish with a 10-6-2 record. The team lost only three times in their lost ten games. This included a string of six wins and one tie.

Seniors Lara Sibold and Jennifer Wells played their last game as Scots in an Oct. 23 match against Georgetown that saw the team win 1-0.

Sibold, the teams goalkeeper recorded an impressive nine shutouts, while allowing only 10 goals all year. An average of less than one goal was scored on her each game.

Wells finished her final campaign with six goals and three assists. Her six goals lead the team and her three assists was tied for second.

The women's team was also lead by Heather Belair who accounted for five goals, while leading the team with seven assists. Lucille Bayless and Christine Rajkowski also contributed to the teams success with four goals a piece.

The women began the season by winning two straight games versus Lincoln Memorial and Tusculum. The Scots then lost four and tied one in their next six games. The only win during this stretch was a 2-0 decision over Oglethorpe College on Sept. 17.

The men's soccer team had another fine season, finishing at 15-3-0. the Scots just missed making the NCAA III play-offs.

The men started off the season right by winning their first eight games. Opening up with four straight road games in Virginia, the men defeated Randolph-Macon, Lynchburg, Eastern Mennonite, and Washington and Lee before returning home on Sept. 17 to play their first home game.

This home opener saw the men defeat Oglethorpe 6-0.

The only three losses for the Scots came against Rhodes, Greensboro, and Methodist. At the time, all three of these teams were ranked.

Leading the way for the Scots were Chris Reid and Donnie Evans. Reid amassed 17 goals had eight assists, while Evans had 16 goals and eight assists. Jody Tootle also turned a strong year with 11 goals and four assists. Seven other players also scored, while nine other players recorded assists. Wes Unger was second on the team with seven.

Bill Putman saw the majority of action in goal for the Scots and had five shutouts. He allowed only 18 goals all year, a little under two a game (1.64).

On a whole the men's team outscored their opponents 64-24. They also had 46 assists to their opponents 11.

"Putting the children to bed..."—

Charsie Robertson dupes opponents in the Maryville vs. Methodist College, during Homecoming weekend. The Fighting Scots sent Methodist home with a 18-13 loss to add to their record.

Fighting Scots standing at 5—4

by David Downs
Staff Writer

In the movie "The Program", TSU quarterback Joe Kane comes to the huddle, looks at the other 10 players that surround him, calls the next play, and calmly says, "Let's put the women and children to bed and go looking for dinner, boys!"

The Maryville College Scots have not only tucked their last two opponents into bed, but have also eaten their way to a 2-game win streak.

The Scots virtually disappeared on Oct. 15 when they traveled to Danville to play Centre College.

Centre College (7-1) scored two fourth quarter touchdowns and amassed 444 yards total offense to defeat MC 37-15.

"Probably the most glaring weak points were the mental preparation and lack of intensity and the play of the special teams," said Head Coach Phil Wilks of the game against Centre, "We gave up some big plays on defense, which hurt us in the ballgame, and we were inconsistent on offense."

The Scots returned to winning form on Oct. 22 with a crucial win over Sue Bennett College (0-8).

"The guys played hard and we got things done," said Defensive Coordinator Jim Pavao, "We had a lot of different guys making some big plays."

Some of these big plays came on turnovers. The Scots picked off Sue Bennett quarterbacks five times, and defensive end Jeremy Landis recovered a fumble.

Coach Wilks also attributed the team's success to the play in the second half.

"Our intensity, effort, and execution picked up a great deal in the second half and was probably the difference in the ballgame," said Wilks.

Charsie Robertson appeared to return to his original form after being injured by rushing for 121 yards on 18 carries including a 64 yard TD run. Robertson saw limited action in games against Clinch Valley and Centre after suffering a sprained toe and a concussion.

"I know one thing," said Robertson, "it's been frustrating, you know, with the expectations that I've had this year. So it has been real frustrating with all these injuries I've had because I worked so hard over the summer to try to have a good season."

"With him being back in form (against Sue Bennett), he broke a 64 yard run in the first half and put us up, he broke that and then had a great second half. Having him back in top form makes us more explosive on offense," said Wilks of Robertson.

The Scots returned home with a little momentum and defeated Methodist 18-13 in front of a wild Homecoming crowd.

"Defensively we played a great first half," said Pavao, "the second half they made some adjustments and started moving the ball a little bit, scored a couple times, but I think overall we had three or four big plays on fourth down, and blocking that extra point and returning it for two points was a crucial play."

Eddie Bates, the defensive player of the game for MC, played, according to Pavao, "a great game". Bates had three unassisted tackles and a sack.

"I think our seniors, our four seniors, Charsie (Robertson), John Barry (Cox), Jon Chambers, and Thomas Smith have all had real good ball games, and that is a big factor for us," said Wilks.

"They're all capable players and they are all real good players and when they play at their ability. It helps us because we're such a young football team," added Wilks.

Cox is 72 for 140 with 851 yards passing and four touchdowns on the year. He has also rushed for 313 yards on 79 attempts for a four yard average.

Robertson is the team's leading rusher with 564 yards and 94 attempts with six touchdowns.

Smith, an All-American his sophomore and junior years, appears to be in a position to be a three-time All-American at Maryville College and according to Wilks, is "a very consistent player for us."

On November 6, the Scots travelled to Greenville and were defeated by Tusculum College, a Division II NAIA school, 63—22.

Scots Basketball season opens Nov. 19

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

With 10 of its top 12 players back, the Maryville College men's basketball team looks to build on last year's 16-7 mark. Three of these players include starters from last year's team. Point guard Jeremy Burgess, wingman John Robinette, as well as Dee Bell in the post all return.

Head Coach Randy Lambert mentioned that experience and depth will be the strengths of this year's team. A weakness for this team, said Lambert, would be the lack of a consistent point producer.

Stated Lambert, "We feel like we should make a run for the tournament with the players we have. We will need people to step up in some positions and to remain injury-free."

The Scots did lose Wayne Norman to graduation and Rusty Wilson from last year's squad. However transfer Samray Williams from Lincoln Trail Community College and a host of others, including Jeremy Blevins, Bryan Mills, Stan Pennington, and John Vaughn will be expected to contribute in the post.

Bell had this to say of the upcoming season, "We have the potential to improve on last year's mark, and that includes making the tournament."

Although the Scots received some consideration as one of the top teams in the South Region, they did not get a preseason ranking.

The Scots will be forced to be ready to play when the season begins on Nov. 19.

Their first game will be played at Thomas More College in Ky. Thomas More has on their side one of the top players in the nation, according to Lambert.

"Rick Hughes is a 6'7" forward who averaged 26 points and nine rebounds per game last year."

Then the Scots will come right back the following day and face an always tough Centre team on Nov. 20.

Later games for the team include a Thanksgiving Tournament held here at Maryville College. Teams participating in this will be Mt. Union College from Ohio, Farrum College from Virginia, and Tusculum from Tennessee.

The men are also scheduled to play in a Christmas Tournament at Tusculum College on Jan. 6-7.

As for the women, improving on an impressive 23-4 record from a year ago may seem like a difficult task. However, this is a task that the Maryville College Lady's basketball team is ready to do.

Gone from last year's team are graduated seniors Honey Brown and Leah Onks.

Back are Jennifer Buck, Jama Cameron, Lisa Campbell, and Jaimie Parrot, along with a host of others to lead the Lady Scots.

Due to last year's success, these returning players, and a really strong freshmen class, the Scots ended up with a No. 1 ranking in the South Region and a No. 7 ranking in the nation from the Women's Division III News.

The team will open the season at the first Virginia Bank Tipoff Classic tournament on Nov. 18, 19, and 20.

The team's first home game will be held on Nov. 30 at 6 p.m. against Thomas More College.

Along with many returning players, the freshmen class is going to be expected to produce early for the Lady Scots.

"All of them will play early, including Megan Casey because of her good, confident three-point shooting and Chris Rajkowski because of her speed and quickness," said Head Coach Kelli Casteel Cook.

Cook also mentioned that some of the team's strengths include the post game and running and pressing.

Cook said, "I am real excited as to what we are doing on defense. The past couple of days we have ran really well, and our transition game looks good."

One player that will be missed in the line-up, who has seen considerable action for the Lady Scots is Lauri Ellis, who is out with a knee injury and is not expected to return until late in the year.

Affirmative action debate held

by Sarah West
Staff Writer

A gathering of about sixty people, including the College Democrats, College Republicans, faculty, and students, attended the affirmative action debate on October 26, in the Center for Campus Ministry. The debate, hosted by the CD's, caused response and interaction in the audience.

Chris Noe, the Republican speaker, debated the con, and the Democrat representative, Alex Little, stood for the pro.

The panel, which consisted of Dr. Mark Thomas and Dr. Susan Ambler, posed questions to the speakers, while Dr. Scott Brunger resided as moderator.

In his opening presentation, Little analogized, "Racism was and still is a cancer in society today. It penetrates the body of mainstream American society and culture. The chemotherapy to cure this cancer also penetrates the American culture and society and disrupts, but you don't stop fighting cancer because the chemotherapy is rough."

Noe posed and answered the question, "Should whole groups of people be entitled to compensation for past injustices committed against them? I answer with a resounding yes; however, I say not with this program of affirmative action. It does the minority groups an injustice. It victimizes and negatively stigmatizes them. Equality is based on merit alone."

Library to go on-line

by Eddie Harmon
Staff Writer

We live in the age of computers. They seem to be everywhere in our society, in our homes, our offices, even our grocery stores.

In keeping with the times, the Maryville College library has purchased an automated computer system.

MC has been looking at various systems since 1989. In 1992, the college found what they were looking for. The Furman University Library's system, called INNOPAC, seemed ideal.

Debbie Nichols, acting director of the college library is overseeing the automation process. When asked about the reason for the automation, she responded, "We think it will offer greater access to the collection."

As the library operates now, students can locate books one of three ways: by author, subject, or title. One of the problems is that often the subject headings are artificial and require the use of the Library of Congress Subject Headings.

"This system includes these and key word searches," said Nichols. This system would be similar to the INNFOFOTRAC system that is now used for current articles. Basically, the new system will replace the card catalog.

The library plans to begin placing bar codes on books in late December or January. The plan is to have the basic system installed by February.

However, the system might not be available for student use until March because of the all the various testing that will have to be done.

In addition to the basic module, the college is getting software that will tell a student if something has been checked out, when it is due back, and what material is out to the binder. Nichols says that all this software will be phased in gradually to avoid overwhelming people.

"By next fall for sure, all of it will be in place and available," Nichols said. The company that developed the INNOPAC system, Innovative Interfaces, will handle any problems that might arise with the software, thus freeing the college from the necessity of having a resident programmer.

Brandee Shafer, a student library worker, had this to say about the new system, "I'm excited about it. It's going to make my job easier, after all the training."

When asked how she thought students would react to the new system, Nichols replied, "I think they'll love it. I do!"

Hot water not readily available

by Todd Smith
Staff Writer

Many students may have noticed that the hot water has not always been turned on in the dorms during the past few weeks.

According to Andy McCall, head of the physical plant, "the domestic hot water," which is the hot water for the showers is turned off during the middle of the day during the autumn and spring months. In the summer, before heating is needed on campus, each of the dorms has its own gas fire boiler.

When the temperature drops low enough that the gas boilers are replaced by the school's steam system, the steam is created by a wood boiler in the physical plant. This makes for a much more economical source of energy.

McCall said that the physical plant is "burning wood waste, and the wood is much cheaper than the gas."

The problem is that in order to heat the water with steam all the buildings are being heated as well. As long as the water in the dorms is heated, the radiators in the rooms are running. According to McCall, "We would have to somehow say 'Don't heat Thaw' or whichever building that has a classroom in it that we don't want the radiators to keep working. The only way we currently have of controlling the heat in the buildings is to shut the boiler off."

This problem is not a year round problem. "When the weather gets colder, the boiler will be kept on 24 hours a day anyway to keep warm."

This year has had an unusual amount of warmer weather which has caused a period of time in which the water must be shut off to keep the classrooms at a reasonable temperature.

Solving the cold water crisis is a

Dr. Fred Burkey, VP for College Advancement resigns position

by Paul Weaver
Editor

In a move that caught the campus by surprise, Dr. Fred Burkey cleaned out his desk, and resigned his position as Vice President for College Advancement on November 14.

Burkey's tenure at the college was a little over a year. He began working for the college on November 1 of 1993.

Burkey came to Maryville from Edinboro University, a part of the University of Pennsylvania system.

Burkey plans on returning to Ohio to pursue a family business there; he was unavailable for comment.

In a press release, Dr. Gerald Gibson was quoted as saying, "We are grateful for Dr. Burkey's service to Maryville College and wish him well in his new endeavors."

When asked why Burkey resigned, Gibson said, "Some marriages work, and some don't. He left on good terms." Gibson further assured, "There is no scandal here."

A spokesperson for Advancement said, "It just wasn't a good match. There is a culture in a small liberal arts setting, and there is a culture in Advancement. It just wasn't a good match."

The college plans to begin the search process for a new Vice President for College Advancement after the first of the year. Until a replacement is found, Ellie Morrow, Executive Director of Development, will supervise the College Advancement operation.

"We will take our time in filling the vice president's position," Gibson wrote in a memo to the Advancement staff. "I want a leader whose vision and ability and energy will earn your full respect."

Burkey is the second member of the Advancement staff to resign this year; Dr. Richard Tatum, the Director of Church Relations, resigned in September.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

As does any institution, Maryville College has certain rules and regulations that its members must abide by.

Consistency in these policies is a desirable trait, to ensure fairness.

The Maryville College alcohol policy, as stated in the "Student Handbook," is neither fair nor consistent.

According to this policy, the residents of Carnegie, Copeland, Davis, Gamble, and Lloyd residence halls are prohibited from consuming alcohol in the halls, and more specifically, in their rooms.

However, the residents of Pearsons Hall, all of whom are at least 21 years of age, may freely consume alcohol in their rooms.

There is a definite problem with this policy, in that the of-age residents of the other dorms have just as much of a right to partake of an alcoholic beverage as the residents of Pearsons.

Every 21 year-old should be able to sit back in his or her room and enjoy a beer without the fear that an overzealous RA or RD is going to come barging in if he or she smells alcohol and write "Student A" up.

The alcohol policy is the first item listed under the heading "Integrity" in the student handbook. The introduction to the section reads, "The following standards are intended to support individual honesty and the sense of trust within the campus community."

How does restricting a 21 year-old in his or her home promote and support individual honesty and a sense of trust?

The very restriction is a clear indicator that the administration does not trust the judgement of the individual student, whether he be 21 or not.

Later in the alcohol policy, it is stated that, "Students who choose to drink assume total responsibility for their actions."

This is a completely understandable and acceptable expectation of students who choose to drink. If they are mature enough to consume alcohol, then they are mature enough to take responsibility for their actions.

The problem, however, is that the administration is unwilling to allow students the opportunity to act and be responsible.

Student Development and the Student Senate can solve this inconsistency in one of two ways.

• Maryville College could be made a dry campus. Drinking could be banned in every place on

"Maryville College could be made a dry campus . . ."

this campus. Students would be forced to take their drinking habits off campus, or at least behind closed doors. This could make some alumni very happy, and at the same time would probably make quite a few students more than a tad bit upset.

It could also conceivably add to what is referred to as the "drinking problem" on campus. Having a dry campus would also be a very clear indication that the administration does not trust the judgement of the students.

The other logical option is the inverse;

• Maryville College could be a wet campus. Wet in the sense that students of legal age would be allowed to consume alcohol in their rooms, with certain stipulations; such as no minors present, the door must be closed, etc.

A shift in policy such as this would show that the administration does have faith in the students, and it would show that the administration takes the goals of the Maryville College Covenant seriously.

This decision could very well make large numbers of students happy, and large numbers of alumni angry. There are alumni, I think it is only fair to point out, that are still angry over the transition to co-ed dorms.

It would also mean that the Residence Life staff would have to work with a sense of unanimity, enforcing policy conscientiously.

The policies of the college are very much dictated by the desires of the student body. Through the Student Senate we each have a voice in how our lives are governed.

It is time that we made good use of that voice, and bring this discrepancy, and how we wish to see it resolved, before the administration. We have the power to change our student handbook, all it takes is a little effort.

I had originally planned to write something on the recent elections, but decided that most of you, like myself, were filled to the rim with all the coverage. Frankly, I do not wish to analyze it anymore than it already has been.

What I would rather do is maybe tie up some of the loose ends I perceive as having been left by my earlier installments.

I'm going to ask you to take a short walk with me in your mind, not because I want to be particularly "cheesy," but because I want to conjure yet another image for you. As you

Root and branch: two sources of life for a tree

leave Carnegie Hall, walk up the two steps and go down the path leading to Fayerwether Hall with Anderson on your left, you will pass a certain tree that will also be on your left.

I don't want to dwell at length on the actual physical tree itself, but I feel that it needs at least some clarification. In my mind, it is of a unique beauty; it is the more slender trunked one, not the one spreading its leaves over the bench. Having said that, I think it is time to discuss what significance it has for what I have been thinking and writing about.

This tree has served as a kind of symbolic model for what I think the Christian Church should be pursuing. The tree, solidly anchored in the much trodden soil, rises boldly, confidently above the ground. Like the tree, the Church should be firmly rooted, not in the soil of course, but in the age long tradition that we have inherited from those who came before; in our roots and in our trunk we should hold confidently to the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth and look to our past to inform us of our future.

"We should reach outward, touching the lives of all . . ."

A tree, though, does not stop growing at the trunk; it branches and sprouts leaves. These leaves and branches provide the life of the tree from above as the roots supply life from the nutrients in the ancient ground. This energy and creative light runs round and round in the slim, strong trunk giving rise to new, vibrant life that is vital to the tree.

Such are the function of the Church's branches and leaves. We should reach outward, touching the lives of all, whatever their ideological, political, or religious convictions happen to be. We should provide shade where it is needed and rest beneath the branches of our various forms of ministry. It is from branching out and touching people that we are also blessed with immeasurable wealth; energy and creative light flows about in our Church, helping us to build and grow. Without our branches and leaves, without our ministry, we severely limit the new and vibrant life that is vital to us as Christians and human beings.

Another thing one should keep in mind is the orientation of the branches of this tree. Walk around the trunk; notice the branches droop not, but spring into the sky. This points to the real importance of what I have been trying to say. We, those of us who are Christians, must realize that the proper orientation of the Church is focus on the will of God, not on issues of doctrine or dogma or any thing of the sort. We should realize that the love and life we take in from our upwardly spreading branches reveals to us what it is that we should do in this world. We cannot realize this if we insist on pruning the branches and live only in the confined area of our trunk.

A request for consistency in Student Development policies

To the Editor:

In most respects, life in the residence halls at Maryville College is really good, but there are some things that could stand to be improved. For one thing, (and this is the most important thing to me) people can smoke in the rooms, yet I can't burn incense. I really don't understand this. Cigarette smoke smells bad. When people smoke in the residence halls, the smell permeates throughout the entire hall and stinks up my room, along with the community areas such as the bathrooms and lounges. Not only is there that nasty smoke smell, but there are the normal smells associated with a dorm, like stale food, trash that people leave around all the time (another story for another day), and the wonderful odor emitting from the bathrooms (caused by mildew and other unpleasant things). Anyway, with all of these odors in the hall, it makes me sick. Incense that I burn in my room, just like the other people smoke in their rooms or spray nasty chemical air-fresheners in their room, makes my room smell the way I like it. If someone can smoke in their room without anyone saying it is a fire hazard, then those of us who want to burn incense should be allowed to under the same rules. After all, incense and cigarettes burn in the same way, with no open flame. So I would encourage anyone who feels the same way I do to contact your RD or RA and get something done, so we can live in the environment we want to, as others live in the environment they want to.

At the movies with Bo and Chris: De Niro and Cruise, back from the dead

by Bo McMichael and
Chris Stephens
Staff Writers

We're back and ready for "The Thanksgiving Box Office Smash." This holiday season promises you a monster, and a few fangs.

"Mary Shelley's Frankenstein," stars Robert De Niro as Frankenstein's monster. Kenneth Branagh has jumped into the director's seat and into the acting spotlight as the mad doctor, Victor Frankenstein.

Bo: "The movie has as much of a jolt as what drove the monster to awake from the depths of darkness. Mary Shelley's novel has come to life, and leading the charge is the intelligent and crafty De Niro. His makeup is nothing compared to how he gives life to this old European classic."

Chris: "At least Bo has some understanding of filmmaking knowledge. This movie brings an age-old fable to life, and until now the story I knew in no way compared to what I was given. The gift was incredible, and I have only one more thing to say, and that is bring on the 90's version of 'The Mummy!'"

What do fangs, the night, and Tom Cruise all have in common? The answer: two hours of evil. This movie made Oprah dash out just ten minutes into it. The film is an adaptation of Anne Rice's novel "Interview with the Vampire." It is a story of Louis, a young plantation owner, played by Brad Pitt, in New Orleans in the late 18th century. The story is told to a young reporter, played by Christian Slater. Louis weaves a spell-binding tale of blood and horror that begins with a bite to his neck by the ancient Vampire, Lestat, played by Tom Cruise. Lestat has offered Louis immortality, but Louis wants to tell the world that life everlasting isn't all it's cracked up to be!

Chris: "I now know that Cruise can do it all. Whether it is a lawyer, a race car driver, or even a vampire, this man is incredible. Ann Rice worried about Cruise playing Lestat, my answer to her is feel safe that vampires are not real because if they were, Cruise could be the leader. The greatest excitement came at the movie's end knowing that the sequel, 'The Vampire Lestat' could only be better."

Bo: "The saddest news I bring is that Frankenstein's fifteen minutes of glory and fame are up. The reason for this is 'Interview with the Vampire.' The make-up and graphic art were outstanding, and if Cruise or Pitt are snubbed by the Oscar committee then costuming and make-up are a sure win. Enjoy the movie; I know I did!"

As we turn the combination to the right and then back to the left, we are greeted by many new surprises in the movie world. Gotham City's Caped

Crusader is preparing to rev up the engine on his batmobile. "Batman Forever" will boast a batcave full of stars for the summer of '95. On board is Tommy Lee Jones as Harvey (Two Face) Dent, the criminal who hires the Riddler to finish off the Caped Crusader; Jim (Ace Ventura) Carrey as the Riddler; and Chris O'Donnell (Three Musketeers) as Robin, the Boy Wonder. Val Kilmer has been passed the cape, and Batman's love interest is played by Nicole Kidman. However, she portrays a psychologist, and that might spell curses for Bruce Wayne and his dark side. You might ask where is Michelle Pfeiffer and her cat apparel. She was so impressive she has signed her own movie contract featuring her as the star.

Now let's change gear from sequels with super heroes to sequels with ordinary Joes, or should I say an ordinary John McClane. "Die Hard 3" brings Bruce Willis to New York with a new partner, Samuel L. Jackson (Pulp Fiction). Together these two take on Jeremy Irons, a terrorist with a plan to level New York City. Irons plays the brother of Hans Gruber (Alan Rickman) who bothered Willis in the original. Alien fans, you will be glad to know that an "Alien 4" is in the works. No plot yet, but a few ideas are being tossed around in Hollywood Coffee Shops. Will the beast descend on earth or will the story take place on the planet from which the beast originated? No stars have been signed, but why not bring back Sigourney Weaver as Ripley—a tricky feat since she was killed in "Alien 3". But hey, it's the movies, so anything is possible.

Film budgeting has hit an all time high. In our next sneak preview into upcoming movies, we venture out into the Pacific Ocean where Kevin Costner and Dennis Hopper have donned gills and webbed feet. You might wonder what we are speaking of, and that is the summer of '95 blockbuster hit "Waterworld." This mega-budget film is set in the near future, where the polar ice caps have melted and humans now live on floating land masses, and have adapted to the surroundings by becoming amphibious. The 100 million dollar price tag has caused Hollywood to wonder if the film making business is getting a little out of hand.

Next time we will visit with the "Next Generation" as they journey aboard movie making history in the seventh Star Trek film. Also, we will take a look at Tim Allen's new red suit, and see how a fourteen year old girl takes out the bad guys in "The Professional."

Until then, see you at the movies...

Now is the time for all good statesmen to surface

Dear Editor,

Last week, Nov. 8 to be precise, I was invited to the elections return party sponsored by the College Democrats and the College Republicans. As I am sure you know, the Republicans had a field day; the Republicans took control of the Senate as well as the House of Representatives. I congratulate the success of the Republican party. However, I do not congratulate my college peers who seem so eager to follow and accept the status-quo bashing of President Clinton.

Many don't even know why they bash President Clinton. Is it because somebody at party headquarters tells Republicans that that is what you do when the opposite party is in power? Throughout election night I heard time and time again how this election is a mandate against Clinton and the Democratic party itself. After all the ranting and raving was done, I did not hear one person say, "Hey, maybe the public is angry over what we politicians are not doing."

It is time that the public gave Clinton a chance. Let's not forget that President Clinton has created jobs, proposed health care legislation and passed the crime bill. The election was not an outright mandate against Clinton, but a mandate saying he has not fixed fast enough what Republicans Reagan and Bush left behind. Let us look at the word mandate; how can a mandate be possible when only 38% of registered voters voted?

The word "change" swept through the country like a wild forest fire, burning all that stood in its way. Tennesseans were so eager for change that they elected people who support less government regulation of business and the cutting of social programs such as HEADSTART. Tennesseans elected people who believe that the rich, through their superior intellect and drive to make money, will create jobs for the poor. This particular form of thinking is called trickle-down. According to the "State and County Data Book," when President Reagan was president, the national median for family income rose $1,680. This was good for the nation; however, why is it that the median average for Tennessee only rose $90 after inflation, and eight years of the Gipper claiming that the common man was better off under his administration than before his administration.

"Hey, maybe the public is angry over what we politicians are not doing"

Many of us who claim to be politicians are actually followers. It does not take a genius to follow another man's words because anybody can do this, and anybody can go to Washington and kiss a**. How many can step up and perform and give the people what they want and deserve? The willingness to preserve the political party has superseded the national good! We, with emphasis to political science majors, have read how politicians play games with the lives of the American people, and we know that Washington supports those eager to participate in games but shuns those advocating change.

Lastly, on this campus I have yet to see any of the self-proclaimed career politicians (you know who you are) step up with their own ideas and goals.

Yes, the people of America want change, and maybe that change is the burning desire to have more statesmen and less career politicians.

Mellon grants enable students, faculty to research

by Jessica Lemler
Staff Writer

This past summer, Dr. Sally McNeill and Senior Sara Goelz worked together on a special project. The project, funded by a Mellon Grant, is one of particular interest to Maryville College history.

McNeill and Goelz researched three diaries from the 1840's and 50's. The diaries belonged to a man who was a Maryville College student. This man graduated in the 1850's and stayed at MC to receive religious training. The diaries give accounts of his life as a teacher and farmer before he became a Presbyterian minister. Funding for the project was provided by the Mellon Foundation. Maryville College applies

It was held on November 8 from 7:00 p.m. to 12:00 a.m. in Carnegie's lobby. Students from every residence hall and commuters came in and out of the lobby.

With the funds provided by Senate, 15 pizzas, 80 breadsticks, and many liters of soda were bought and consumed.

In the midst of the political excitement many other light-hearted comments were made. CR Vice-President Kevin Rowland said, "Bill Frist cured that bleeding-heart liberal Jim Sasser of his ills."

"Frist only won because the Democrats forgot to vote," explained Russell Perry, a CD member.

Dr. Harry Howard summarized, "I think the anti-Clinton and anti-party-in-office spirit explains more of what has happened today than any other one thing."

introduction, bibliography, chronology of the man's life, and footnotes to the diaries to bring them "up-to-date."

McNeill hopes to extract the more interesting parts of the diary and compile them into a text for publishing.

The work was particularly interesting to McNeill because of her background in Maryville College history. McNeill teaches an American History course, and she plans to use parts of the diaries to illustrate to her students the impact that events of the 1840's and 50's had on this man and local people in general.

Copies of the diaries and many other sources documenting the college's past are available for student use in the library.

"I'm sure you'd make a fine maid..."—

The ghost of Rev. Samuel Wilson, played by Senior Brian Prather, shares his beliefs on women's roles in society with Sophomore Sarah Stevenson at the November 17 Community Forum.

Dead MC presidents visit Community Forum, impart wisdom, share history

by Becky Lill
Staff Writer

On November 17, several Maryville College students took part in an improvisational theater production called "This Was My College."

The production was the last of this fall's Community Forum presentations on the college's history.

The performance, reminiscent of Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol," featured deceased presidents of the college returning as spectral guides to Sarah Stevenson, Echo assistant editor.

Stevenson, played by herself, was working late in the Echo office. She was having trouble writing an article about the rumors of campus ghosts. Just when she was about to give up, she was offered some ghostly assistance and insight into MC's past, present, and future.

Stevenson's first visitor was Rev. Isaac Anderson, founder and first president of the college. Anderson was played by Senior, Mike Wilson. Anderson served as president of the Southern and Western Theological Seminary, later changed to Maryville College, for 38 years.

Anderson had a strong personality and was an exceptional leader. He laid the foundations of the college and gave direction to its life and development through the years.

The second apparition was Professor Thomas Lamar, played by Todd Smith. Lamar was never named president, nor did he want to be.

He reopened MC after the Civil War in 1866 and got enrollment back up.

He taught all the courses and ran the college single-handedly for one year. Lamar wished only to be a teacher, so he sought out his old schoolmate, Dr. Peter Bartlett, for the position of president.

Bartlett, played by Robert Hutchens, began his term at the new campus on Fagg Hill. The new college location was purchased from a local farmer, Julius Fagg.

Bartlett was a good fundraiser, and he obtained many new benefactors for MC. Under his instruction, the first three buildings on the new campus were erected and a large endowment was secured.

However, Bartlett was asked to resign. The issues surrounding his resignation are still not clear.

Stevenson's fourth guest was the Rev. Dr. Samuel Wilson, played by Brian Prather. Some of the greatest advances in the development of the college were made under his leadership.

Under his direction, several major buildings were enlarged, several more erected, and the assets of the institution increased significantly.

During his term, enrollment went from 83 students to 760 students. Also, MC became a member of the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, and was officially accredited as a liberal arts college.

Before leaving, the four presidents came to a resolution between themselves that they would leave MC in peace.

Community Forum offered a unique way for people to gain insight and perspective on the college's history.

Abigail Blankner joins Volunteer Services staff

by Kristi Paschel
Staff Writer

There is a new face in Maryville College's Volunteer Services.

Abigail Downing Blankner's official title at MC is now Associate Director of Volunteer Services.

Her duties as part of the MC staff are various. Though she primarily works with Bonner Scholars, Blankner also assists in teaching a Freshman Orientation class and acts as the campus contact person for all volunteer opportunities in the local community.

In addition, she is the coordinator for the Family Education Lab Food Pantry.

In commenting on her duties, Blankner said, "I'm kind of like a switchboard operator."

She is the person who connects people with placements for Bonner credit and visits the placements to evaluate the needs of the community.

Blankner said that the job opportunity at MC was her first offer, and the one and only job that she has applied for since her May 1994 graduation.

She is a graduate of Pacific Lutheran University in Tacoma, Washington, where she acquired a degree in English. Blankner has also studied abroad in Lancaster, England.

Though she attended universities on the west coast and in England, Blankner feels that she is in touch with East Tennessee since she grew up here. She believes this is an advantage in terms of understanding and accessing the local community's needs.

Blankner stated that her goal is to create a role model for communities, the Maryville community specifically, to follow. She stresses the need for organization and structure within volunteerism, both for the volunteers and for the community they are serving.

In order to provide this organization and structure, Blankner is striving toward developing handbooks for volunteers and organizations that outline the needs and expectations within the community.

As for her decision to accept the job as Associate Director of Volunteer Services, Blankner admitted that she practiced intensely for the interview. She said that she has had some bad experiences with interviews in the past, and she wanted to curb the curse.

"I was really excited. I just wanted this job so bad. Every time I came for an interview, I felt like I was coming to work. I wanted to be coming to work."

Blankner stressed the confidence she felt while being interviewed. "New clothes and a haircut really helped," she said.

Though she admitted that the questions she was asked were challenging, Blankner said that she felt comfortable since she knew Vandy Beard-Kemp, who interviewed her.

Blankner also knew Stephen Nickle, Director of Volunteer Services and Campus Minister, who would be her colleague in her new position. "It's really important to know that we can work together," she stated.

When asked about her reasons for taking the job at MC, Blankner was not hesitant. "I missed college so much," Blankner said.

She also referred to her acceptance of the job as somewhat of a selfish act since her sister is a Bonner Scholar at Rhodes College in Memphis. Blankner said that she was never given the chance to be involved with the Bonners because the scholarship was not offered on the west coast.

Blankner plans to remain at MC as long as she can keep influencing positive change and reform. Presently, she receives much satisfaction from the job and is taking it one day at a time.

In reflecting on Blankner's arrival at MC, Fay Humphrey, Secretary of Volunteer Services in the CCM, said, "She is important to the whole campus because she helps anyone who is interested in volunteer services."

Blount County's Japanese School meets on campus, provides opportunities for international students

by Kenyon Evans
Staff Writer

Many of us have noticed all those kids floating around campus on Saturdays, but few people actually know anything about the group.

The Blount County Japanese School (BCJS) is its name, and its purpose is to allow the Japanese students in grades 1-11 who are here with their families to keep up with their peers in Japan. The Japanese companies in the area, the largest being Nippondenso, provide this service, in association with the college and the community, to the families for 60$ per month tuition.

Those 98 kids go to a public school during the week and then spend their Saturdays, from 8:00 to 3:00, catching up in Japanese language and studying mathematics. The Japanese school system teaches more advanced math.

Although their public schooling lasts for the typical school year, their schooling in Saturday school is year round. They receive homework from both school systems and are expected to speak English in public school and Japanese in the Saturday school.

The school is provided books and curriculum by the Japanese Ministry of Education, and the student's records transfer to Japan when they return. The kids work hard in this intensive grade school environment.

The teachers for this program are recruited by the principal, Kumiko Franklin; she goes to Japan twice a year to find people who are willing to study at Maryville College and teach at the school as a part-time job.

"They come as students first, that's their first priority," comments Yuka Kojima, a teacher at the school and a senior at Maryville College. They seem to enjoy their work.

In an interview with two of the teachers, Maiko Sato and Yuka Kojima, they expressed their enjoyment of the teaching experience. Maiko's dedication to teaching at the school was evident in her expression of concern for one of her students who is having trouble in his classes. Yuka shared that attitude.

In addition to simply seeking to allow the students a way to catch up, the school seeks to build character in its students.

As their charter states, they seek "To cultivate strength and will in students, to instill a broad view point which does not incur prejudice against any race or nationality."

so the warmer months are used to conserve the labor cost of running the plant.

There are two major reasons to allocate funding to help alleviate this problem. The first is a technical one. McCall said, "The boiler is like any engine. It runs better if it is kept running. Constantly heating up and cooling down the boiler is hard on the gears and the pipes carrying the steam."

The second problem is that the hours chosen to turn off the heat are based on a "stereotypical student" said McCall, "who takes a shower before noon when he awakes in the morning and before he goes to bed at night around eleven or twelve. Students sometimes don't fit this mold."

McCall suggested that if a study was conducted of the number of students who were inconvenienced by this and the number was sufficiently large, perhaps further study could be done on how to remedy the problem.

McCall, continued from p. 1

problem of economics. McCall suggested, "We need some kind of control that senses the outside temperature and could close the valves to the classrooms in the warmer weather and still send steam to the dorms."

This system would be very costly, and the college has not budgeted any money for buying such equipment. "The college does not have large pockets of money sitting around, and the money is going to something equally important."

The second problem is also one of economics. There is a limited amount of money budgeted for operation, and there are only so many people working at the plant. McCall said, "Running the plant 24 hours a day 7 days a week you're going to have to have five operators. We just don't have that many workers."

There is not enough funding to constantly run the boiler and

Ladybugs invade campus buildings

by Chee Hill
Staff Writer

In the past few weeks there has been an increasing population of ladybird beetles, or ladybugs, not just on Maryville College campus but even statewide.

The number one complaint that Jennifer Day, a Resident Assistant in Copeland Hall, has been receiving from her residents is the overwhelming appearance of the ladybugs in the rooms of the residents.

Day said of the bugs, "I cannot really do anything about my residents' complaints. I mean, all I can really do is reiterate the fact that they are not harmful, and I cannot do anything about it."

One of the residents concerned about the problem is Allison Pryor, a sophomore living in Copeland Hall. Pryor said she has had to acquire many new, somewhat strange rituals since Homecoming. Apparently this was the time when the ladybugs started creating such a problem for Pryor.

She said, "Everyday, I hop up onto my desk and go around the ceiling with a tissue and kill all the ones that I see. This is a daily ritual for me, and my friends have found it quite funny."

Without any detection of amusement, she continues, "I've been having to sleep on the floor the last two weeks because they fall onto my bed from the ceiling and into my bed. I've given up sleeping in my bed."

Apparently, the population explosion of the ladybugs is concerning the students not just in the residents halls but also in the classrooms.

The classrooms in Anderson Hall have been swarming with bugs, but not only ladybugs. Other bugs have been seen, such as wasps and black flies.

The ladybugs are not dangerous, however. In fact, they are not harmful at all. But the overwhelming increase in their population has undoubtedly created problems.

Pryor, the resident in Copeland with the most problems because of the ladybugs, has a good theory from observations of her room infested with the ladybugs. Her theory is that they are attracted to the heat. Thus, the ladybugs have been in her room because Pryor's room is one of the warmest in Copeland due to its position toward the sun.

Another theory is that of Dr. Robert Ramger, biology professor. Ramger believes that a possible explanation could be the heavy rainfall. The ladybugs used this extra moisture to their advantage in order to produce more eggs. From a more ecological viewpoint, however, Ramger pointed out, "Since the heavy rainfall created the right conditions for the ladybugs, then the aphids could have been in the same ideal conditions as well."

That is to say that the aphids, one other animal that is prey to the predatory ladybug, produces more eggs too, thus increasing in population. This would mean that since there are more aphids there would have to be more ladybugs to eat them.

Ramger emphasizes, however, that to get an answer as to why the ladybugs are swarming everywhere would require an in-depth study.

Ramger's advice to the residents suffering from the overwhelming population of the ladybugs is, "Brush them off and let them go. The only harm they could create would be feces spots on materials or possessions."

Equestrian team storms show circuit

by Claire Stancampiano
Staff Writer

Maryville College's first ever Equestrian team has taken the intercollegiate horse showing circuit by storm.

As of now they have successfully competed in two shows. The first took place on Oct. 7 and 8 at Hiwassee College and the second on Oct. 29 and 30 at Midway College in Kentucky.

Each team member rode in their own class according to their ability and "did extremely well as a whole," explained Christen McCammon, coordinator of the young equestrians. MC's team rides in classes ranging from intermediate over fences to beginner walk trot.

McCammon placed fifth and second in her classes at Hiwassee; Lisa Hensley placed third and second; Megan McWhorter came in second and fourth; Claire Stancampiano placed fourth and second; and Aimee Cropper blew everyone away by winning fifth place the first day and regaining the number one spot in her class the second day.

Last weekend, Hensley,

McCammon, and McWhorter rode and placed highly at Midway College, which was a much larger show.

McCammon said, "I am pleased to see how well we are doing. We are a brand new team and have only a few riders, but we are gaining as many points as teams twice our size."

The anxiety level ran high on the chilly October morning of that first show. The entire team had been working ardently toward this point for over a month. Their coordinator said she was "nervous and amazed."

Hensley, who had questioned her own level of preparation, said, "It was like a dream when they announced the winners of my class. I wondered, is this happening? Did I do that well?" For Hensley and Stancampiano, horse showing was unknown territory.

They all agreed that the amount of support they had received had been immense. Drs. Mardi Craig and Sue Wyatt, along with several MC students, attended the Hiwassee show.

Anyone interested in joining the team should contact Christen McCammon.

Scots basketball season opens, girls win tourney

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

The women's basketball team opened this season much as they ended last season: winning. They dominated the Virginia Band Tipoff Classic this past weekend and walked away with the title.

Sophomore sensation Tracy Spires had this to say about the team's performance, "The teamwork was excellent. It is definitely improved from last year. It is much more of a team effort this year."

The team's first home game will be November 30 at 6 p.m. against Thomas Moore College from Kentucky.

The men's basketball team also began its season this past weekend. Their first game was played against Thomas Moore in Kentucky.

The score was tight for most of the contest; however, it was Thomas Moore coming out on top.

The team traveled south a few hours to meet its next opponent, Centre College in Danville, Kentucky.

This time the men were able to come out on the winning side and even their record up at 1-1.

The Scots will now begin preparing for their Thanksgiving Tournament held here at Maryville College this weekend. Mt. Union, Ferrum and

Fighting Scots end 5-5 season at Emory & Henry

by David Downs
Staff Writer

For the sixth time in seven seasons as the Maryville College head football coach, Phil Wilks slowly walked off the field with a loss to the Emory & Henry Wasps.

Wilks wasn't the only one.

The Fighting Scots followed as they lost to Tusculum 63-22 the week before, and to Emory & Henry 42-19 to end the 1994 season as a respectable 5-5 football team.

The Scots started the Tusculum game with an 89 yard opening kickoff touchdown run by senior Charsie Robertson.

Neither team could move on their next possession.

Then Tusculum exploded with an 11 yard score by sophomore Stacey Allen. From there, the Pioneers racked up 56 more points and 553 yards total offense to defeat the Scots.

Tusculum's rushing attack accounted for 520 yards of their total offense including a stellar performance by junior Eric Claridy, who rushed for 229 yards on 16 carries and five touchdowns.

MC scored on Robertson's kickoff touchdown return, on an Adam Heiks (who was playing for an injured John Barry Cox) 3-yard run, and another Heiks run from the four. Freshman placekicker Bobby Strimer also added a 36-yard field goal in the game.

"After the Methodist game, we were physically pretty spent," said Wilks about his team. "We were beaten up as a team pretty bad."

The next week, MC traveled to Emory, Va., to take on the Emory & Henry Wasps.

MC was able to amass 356 total yards against the Wasps, but that just wasn't enough.

The Wasps' balanced attack picked apart the Scots as they passed for 292 yards and rushed for another 230 yards on their way to a 42-19 victory.

"They were probably a little more experienced and more mature than we were," said Wilks of E & H. "I think we were kind of mentally and physically spent."

The game not only ended the season for the Scots but ended the football careers of four seniors.

Cox ran the ball 20 times for 120 yards and a TD and was 13-28 passing with 151 yards and two TDs against E & H to end his career at MC as a three-year starter at quarterback.

Robertson ended his last season with 590 yards rushing on 115 attempts with six TDs. He also tapped on two TDs on kickoff returns.

Offensive lineman Thomas Smith and free safety Jon Chambers ended their season as favorites to be All-Americans this year.

Fine Arts program climaxes during holiday season

by Amanda Martin
Staff Writer

The two weeks between the end of Thanksgiving Break and the beginning of final exams will be a busy time for the Maryville College Fine Arts Department.

The following list highlights upcoming events. All are free to the public unless otherwise noted.

• Nov. 29, the MC Jazz Band will present a concert at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall. An original composition by MC sophomore Bishop Moore entitled "All Dressed Up and No Place to Go" will be featured. The concert will also include an arrangement by MC senior Ford Corrigan of music from the Spike Lee film "Mo' Better Blues" and arrangements of the classic tunes "Summertime" and "Song for my Father." The vocal soloist will be Funmilayo Eke.

• Dec. 2, Masayo Ohashi, pianist, will give a senior recital at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall. She will perform works by J. S. Bach, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven.

• Dec. 3, the Children's Theatre class will present the family comedy "A Princess and an Itty, Bitty Pill" at 2 p.m. in the theatre. Admission is $5.00 for adults, $2.50 for discounted admission. Discount prices are available for area students under age 18, college students with a current I.D., Senior citizens age 60 and over, MC theatre alumni, and MC faculty and staff and their guests.

• Dec. 3, Beth Brakebill, mezzo-soprano, accompanied by Jennifer Stadtmiller, pianist, will present a junior recital of music for the Christmas Season at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall. Works will include "Christmas Joy" by C. P. E. Bach, "To us a Child is Born" by Franz Tunder, "The Shepherds" by Peter Cornelius, "His Mother Kissed Him" by E. Davis Cobb, "The Birds" by Benjamin Britten, "Sweet Little Jesus Boy" by Robert MacGimay, traditional Appalachian carol "I Wonder As I Wander," and three songs by Hugo Wolf, "Nun Wand're, Maria," "Ach, des Knaben Augen," and "Die ihr schwebet."

• Dec. 5, The Maryville-Alcoa College-Community Orchestra, under the direction of Bill Robinson and David Hoeffcker, will present a concert in conjunction with the MC Community Chorus at 8 p.m. in Wilson Chapel. Hoeffcker will be the guest french horn soloist. The chorus will sing six carols arranged by Hoeffcker, former Director of MACCO. Admission is free for MC students with a valid I.D. Admission prices are: general public, $7.00; students and senior citizens, $5.00; with a half-price discount for MC faculty and staff.

• Dec. 9, the Maryville College Community Chorus, Concert Choir, and the Brass Ensemble, under the direction of Dr. Dan Taddie and Dr. Larry Smithee, will perform a Christmas concert. The Chorus will sing Antonio Vivaldi's "Gloria in D," featuring soloists Leigh Ann Kennard and Mary Frazier, sopranos; Irma Freestate, alto; and Peggy Rogers, organ. The Concert Choir will perform seven a cappella carols, some familiar favorites and some less well known. The Brass Ensemble will play the traditional English song, "God Rest Ye Good King Wenceslas," and J. S. Bach's Fugue in G minor. A reception will follow in the FAC lounge.

• Dec. 11, The Maryville College Community Concert Band, under the direction of Dr. Larry Smithee, will present a program at 3 p.m. in Wilson Chapel. The program will include a Hymn Fantasy by Calvin Custer, featuring the tunes of the hymns "Eternal Faith Strong to Save," "Holy, Holy, Holy," and "Jesus Loves Me," a Chorale and Shaker Dance by John Zdechlik, "A Christmas Festival" by Leroy Anderson, "Festivo" by Vaclav Nelhybel, conducted by MC senior Elias Smith, and the traditional Irish tune "Greensleeves."

The Appalachian Ballet Company will perform the "Nutcracker Suite" on Dec. 3 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 4 at 2 p.m. at the Knoxville Civic Auditorium. Tickets can be purchased in advance at Profitts, UT Central Ticket Office, or the Van Metre School of Dance for $8, $14, or $20. Tickets at the door are $10, $16, or $22.

Voices Of Praise to cut CD

by Kristin Kant
Staff Writer

Voices of Praise, otherwise known as VOP, has officially made its first recording.

On November 8, 1994 at St. John's Baptist Church in Alcoa, Tennessee, approximately 25 MC students gathered for six long hours with musicians and studio technicians to put together their first album.

Larry Ervin, director of VOP, claimed that this album has been a "dream of mine." He attributes the success of the project to divine intervention. "The Lord told me it's the right time," Ervin stated. Davey McCammon, VOP president, adds that they decided to record now because "VOP was at its all time high."

This album will act as a fundraiser for the choir, as well as memorabilia for all those who have dedicated themselves to VOP's success.

When asked about plans for a second album, Ervin said, "Talent is here. We'll need even more dedication from the choir."

This first album required sacrifice from the students as well as the community. VOP gains a great deal of support monetarily and spiritually from area churches.

VOP was established at Maryville College four years ago. It is open to all students interested in gospel music or to those who enjoy singing to God.

Aaron Stone, soloist, described VOP as, "a worship service, even when practicing."

There is a large degree of diversity in the ensemble. It illustrates the "rich history of diversity here at Maryville College," Stone said.

VOP's album will be produced on both compact discs and cassettes and will be priced according to market value. This should make the price somewhere between $10 to $15. The album will be released on December 12, 1994.

Administration struggles to solve retention problem

by Becky Lill
Staff Writer

Maryville College has a problem. It doesn't have to do with human rights, animal rights, or breaches of the Constitution. It's a problem called retention, and it seems to be an issue of great concern for school administrators.

Retention is the percentage of full time students who return from one year to the next, the percentage of transfer students who return for another year, or the percentage of enrolled students who persist to graduation.

Right now, Maryville College's retention rate for first-time, full-time freshmen is 69% and the five-year graduation rate is 39.3%. The retention rate from fall to fall for transfer students is 68.8%.

"Maryville College's retention rate at this time, and historically, has been considered to be way too low. It's comparable to a lot of other institutions, but in spite of that, it's something that we really need to work on," said Vandy Kemp, director of the Learning Center.

Many things factor into the matter of enrollment. Campus life, student activities, academic support services, financial aid, and various student relationships and expectations all play a large role in this issue, but they also influence retention.

Students leave Maryville College for many different reasons. Student perceptions of retention can have a large affect on retention. Over half of the students who leave MC are not doing well academically. Financial reasons, medical reasons, and general dissatisfaction are also major causes of attrition. Others leave because they don't feel like they're getting the full "college experience."

see Retention, p. 5

Gilbert, director of Alumni and Parent's Programs, resigns

by Paul Weaver
Editor

At 11 p.m. Jane Gilbert, the Maryville College Director of Alumni and Parents Programs, cleaned her office out, with the help of a few students, in preparation for her last day at MC.

Gilbert resigned her position shortly after completing the 1994 Phone-A-Thon, in order to accept an offer from Pellessipi State College.

"It was simply a better offer," Gilbert said; "better pay, benefits, and hours. This move will allow me to spend more time with my children, something that is very important to me."

Gilbert served Maryville College for four years, working not only in college advancement, but also with students through the Church and Scholars Program. "I'm really going to miss the interaction and the bond that I shared with so many of the students, but I'm not moving away, so we'll still be able to get together," Gilbert commented.

Gilbert was responsible for spearheading the efforts of the 1994-95 Phone-A-Thon, a fund raising effort which raised $150,000 for the college from alumni. "There is no way we could have done it without the student help; they were really the driving force," Gilbert said.

A coffee reception was held for Gilbert in Willard House, at 10 a.m. on December 7, her final day at MC. Students and faculty turned out to show their support and appreciation for Gilbert, and the Kerygma Singers, a group Gilbert had worked with in the past, performed two songs in her honor.

Beckie Heckler, a junior who worked extensively with Gilbert commented that "She was a real attribute to MC—to many of us she was a mother."

Maryville College will begin the search process for a new Director of Alumni and Parents Programs in January.

Gilbert's resignation marks the third from the college's Advancement staff. Earlier in the year Dr. Richard Tatum, director of Church Relations, and Dr. Fred Brukey, Vice President for College Advancement resigned their positions with the college.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

Is Maryville on the verge of becoming the next Waco? From the interest that is being paid to the Knoxville Church in this issue of the Echo, one might think that this is a possibility.

The Knoxville Church is a sectarian group. They are very inclusive, and their methods are questionable (harassment and tag-team tactics have been reported), but the purpose of my editorial are not to question their theology, exegesis of the text of the Bible, or to condemn them to hell (which they seem rather eager to do to their opponents). I have yet to earn my degree in religious studies or any other pertinent subject (to read material written by a qualified source, turn to p. 8).

The purpose of my editorial is to bring to light their methods of operation and recruiting on our campus. These methods have been brought to my attention by several members of the campus community.

I have talked to a number of students who have been recruited by the church, and then decided, for various reasons, to leave it.

These students have told me about late-night Bible study sessions, and urgings to confess one's sins to one's peers.

Three students in particular have told me that when they refused to spend evenings studying the bible they were chastised, and told not to worry about studying—"grades don't matter if you're dedicating your life to God," they have been told.

The students that I have spoken to have all been told that they are incapable of interpreting the Bible on their own—apparently the student leader, a freshman who, like me, holds neither a BA in religious studies, nor a degree of any sort from any Theological Seminary, is qualified to interpret the Bible and lead other students in their faith. I have a very difficult time swallowing that.

What is even more difficult for me to believe, is that the students becoming involved in this church are being told flat out that other denominations are wrong, and that they're doctrine is the only doctrine to follow. They are even encouraged to ignore the ideas and beliefs of others.

Colleges and universities are based on the precepts of freedom of thought and the free exchange of ideas—the philosophy expressed by this church and the Bible studies conducted by its members work counter to these ideals.

Not only that, but each of us (hopefully), is attending Maryville with the same purpose, to earn an education. Whether it is to better ourselves, or to fatten up the paychecks in our future—that is up to us. The fact that people are on our campus telling us that our grades here (and subsequently the money we are paying for our education) are unimportant as long as we buy into their specific theology (which is, of course, the only correct one in the sight of God) is down right insulting. Grades do matter in the long run. Ultimately they are what determines whether or not we complete our degree at Maryville College. God may love us with or without the BA, but without the BA we may not be able to feed a family or spread the word of God in a learned fashion (it can be difficult to get into seminary without the necessary grades).

The Knoxville Church has a right to its own doctrine, but it does not have a right to use the buildings on campus to "counsel" recruits. The minister of the church has been using rooms in the library to talk with individual students about the church. The college does have a policy about outside organizations using its buildings, and the Knoxville Church is in direct violation of this policy.

The very fact that the Knoxville Church is using college facilities to propagate the closed-minded theology which it trumpets pervets our institution and its aims and goals.

It is up to the administration and the students to make it clear that this is not acceptable and to enforce the appropriate college policy.

The meaning of Christmas seems to be a universally accepted one, at least in the sense of the spreading of love, peace, and joy. It is not uncommon to hear in movies, on TV, or just about anywhere that people smile a bit more, are less testy, and actually do not mind standing in long lines in crowded stores. Off the top of my head I can think of one episode of "The Honeymooners," in which Ralph says something similar.

Establishing my assumption as having some merit, and acknowledging the reality of exceptions to any generality, I will move on to say that people generally have less of a working concept of the meaning of Advent.

Something new for the yultide season . . .

Advent, though, is just as essential to the meaning of the Christmas season as Christmas Day. It is also very meaningful in considering the coming of a brand new calendar year since it is technically the beginning of the liturgical year. Advent, as the name implies, is a "coming to," or an approach. In its context with Christmas, it is highly symbolic of the coming of Jesus of Nazareth into the world. As such, it should take a central role in our celebration of the newness that Christmas promised and still promises.

The concept of Advent should be celebrated and practiced not only at the holiday season, but throughout the year, for each day is a new advent, a new approach. It is our duty not just as Christians, but more generally as human beings to bring to each day a new commitment to the well being of the entire community. Life is not lived in chunks of months or years, but in individual days; my purpose, of course, is not to adopt the premise of any old sitcom, but to at least call attention to an idea that many people have probably held or heard before.

Advent has a more practical application, however, and that is in the celebration of Christmas itself. I am going to borrow an argument from the pastor of my church, Father Charles Burton: Advent is Advent, not Christmas. This statement seems too obvious, but it is certainly not. When people walk into department stores on Halloween night, as my suitemate Lance and I did, and the seasonal section is filled with Christmas trees and ornaments, there does seem to be something askew. Father Burton is of the opinion that this ultimately weakens Christmas while only striving to make the season a commercial success. The fruits of a commercial strategy such as getting the trees and lights out early can sometimes be a grumpy Christmas. Father Burton has often complained that it is possible to be so tired of the season that on the actual day, one has no desire to celebrate. And I have seen that to be true. How can one help getting burned out when constantly bombarded by trees and Santas before Thanksgiving even comes along?

"... this ultimately weakens Christmas while only striving to make it a commercial success."

Advent, then, is a wonderful time for patient reflection on what the season means. It is a time to prepare for what it is that is new that will be coming into your life. This is true whether the newness is Jesus, a new commitment to family or work, or simply the coming of a new year and all its promises.

As for me, I look forward to the arrival of things new. When the winter becomes sometimes depressing with the leafless trees and the incessant Tennessee rains, it helps to keep in mind that even then, one will be greeted with the visions of spring and new life to watch life run its course again and return ever refreshed. Have a very happy Advent, a truly Merry Christmas, and a productive Happy New Year!

Knoxville church, Crossroads connections

Dear Editor,

Religion proves, through the ages, to be one of the most sacred of all human beliefs and understandings, and it is unfortunate that in the realm of spirituality and religion that there must be conflict. But it is almost inevitable that this conflict and dissension should arise in a country that promotes such a high level of individual freedom. This is evident on the Maryville College campus today. A new movement is rapidly proliferating, and it strikes fear in the hearts of many of the students on this campus.

The Knoxville Church finds its roots in Boston, where Kip McKean successfully extends the church from Gainesville, Fla. The church in Fla. was known as "The Crossroads Church," and self-destructed after Chuck Lucas, their leader, was dismissed for unidentified reasons. Since the "refounding" of the church in Boston, it has moved to locations all over the world—including Knoxville.

This subject is of a very volatile nature, therefore, all information that I relay to you is from Bronwen McClish Gibson's speech to a large group of Christians in Birmingham, Ala. Gibson was intensely involved in the Crossroads Church (C.C.) for two years, and gave this speech to enlighten others. It should be noted that Gibson's father was the pastor of the church that was infiltrated by the C.C.

Many of the students of MC are in the same situation as Gibson because they have brought into the beliefs of the Knoxville Church. The reason for this, according to Gibson, is that "Young people who let their guard down, as I did then, are prime targets for the Crossroads people."

We, as college students, have been thrown into a world which we have never seen before. We are forced to deal with situations that our parents have always solved for us, and we usually crumble under the pressure. This is when the Knoxville Church moves in and affirms the students and becomes their best friend. They make you feel needed and important. They take you to "Bible Studies" and teach you how to be a "Disciple." Gibson said "At the beginning, it really seemed to be a good thing. It was billed as a 'Bible Study' for an hour every Tuesday night, but it was really a guilt trip for an hour!" Eventually they begin to bombard your mind with their ideas of "true Christianity," and soon you begin to doubt everything you have ever been told about your faith, whether it be Christianity or any other religion.

"Crossroads' conversions" are based solely on their version of love and a sense of guilt. If you have already been baptized, you are made to feel that it was wrong." Gibson even began to wonder if her "parents were 'the right kind of Christians' at all." She quickly began to pull away from her parents. Spending more time with the members of the C.C. made her even more like them. Her "parents tried hard to control at least some of [her] time but [she] rebelled." The members of the church began to tell her that "anything that was not church work—or rather, what they perceived as church work—was sinful."

This aspect of the church is easily noticeable in the Knoxville Church. Many of my friends who are involved in the church spend a majority of their time studying the Bible and going to church. Those who are not as zealous about Bible study must be non-Christians and are going to hell. Gibson says that "I was on a continuous guilt trip in those days, and was continually encouraged to let everyone know what a bad Christian I was."

When you go past the disobedience of parents, rejection of people who disagree with their beliefs and constant guilt trips, you will find that the Crossroads Church, the Boston Church and the Knoxville Church are all cults. Gibson said "I was brainwashed, as surely as a Moonie or a member of the Jim Jones cult could be."

In defense of alcohol policy

The past issue of the Echo included an editorial that dealt with the alcohol policy on campus. The author made accusations that the current policy is unfair and that the staff and Student Senate were not following their best judgment in allowing this policy to stand. The author made the suggestion that the college should either 1) allow all 21 year olds to drink, no matter what the residence hall, or 2) that Maryville College should be made a dry campus.

This column is my own opinion and does not express the opinion of the entire Student Senate, but I feel I have a right to respond to the claim that the Senate does not care what students want. The author of the past editorial needs to realize that we live in a real world. I would like to discuss both scenarios that he/she has suggested and point out the catastrophes that could occur in both cases.

Scenario 1: Any 21 year old can drink anywhere on campus.

Now there are dorms in which some people can drink and others cannot. I am not sure that the RAs in each of these dorms is ready to keep a mental log of who is of age and who is not. In fact, I was an RA for two years, and personally I think it would be hell to try to enforce such a policy that allowed only some of the people to drink.

I can read the mind of the author now, "Why are you so concerned about writing people up?" This mindset is totally bogus. I did not like "writing people up" and personally I do not think any RA likes getting someone else in trouble, but I had a job to make sure that there is no abuse on the behalf of those under age. No DRB member wants to see people go to alcohol meetings against his/her own will, but the fact is that this college is dedicated to the goal of educating people both academically and by making them responsible individuals. This is accomplished by enforcing rules or principles, referring to the Covenant.

Scenario 2: Maryville College would become a dry campus.

Nobody wants this. This would alienate anybody who drinks from campus and from our community. Maryville College would become a place that in no way resembles the real world. If the College's goal is to teach people how to live responsibly, it should not eliminate alcohol from its student's lives but show us responsibility or moderation in the case of alcohol.

Additionally, the second opinion is incredibly childish. Essentially, the author is saying that simply because some people of age are going to have to make a sacrifice, then everyone would have to make that sacrifice. He/she is saying, "If I cannot have what I want, then dammit, no one else is going to have it." In the real world, some people have to make sacrifices for the good of the community. If one wants to drink in his/her room, then he/she should move to Pearsons. I am sorry that you cannot drink in Copeland or Gamble or whatever hall you want to drink in, but one must make sacrifices in life.

I would like to express again that this is not the opinion of the Student Senate and it is merely my response to the editorial. Solutions are hardly ever found in the extremes. Compromise allows us to find a solution that benefits all. When one destroys the good of the community because he/she is not granted every right that he/she "deserves," the "community" becomes simply a group of awfully selfish people.

What time is it?

Dear Editor,

Could someone please tell me what time it is?

No matter where I go, I am either late or early depending on what building I'm in. The dining hall has a clock on the wall which says we're on time, and it's time to open the doors for lunch. Yet we can't come in until the Marriot computer says it's time, which is anywhere from five to ten minutes later.

In the Fine Arts Center, one of my classes is constantly being interrupted by students who seem to be obsessed with being on time to Fine Arts 210. According to our professor though, these people are fifteen minutes early!

We have gone to all the trouble of trying to get on the "Information Highway." Why can't we keep our clocks straight? Should students call SMOD every morning to find out what time it is?

"Should students call SMOD every morning to find out what time it is?"

Since that is obviously not an option, how about one day (the sooner the better) we station a person by every clock on the campus and set all of the clocks to "real time," perhaps as by use of radio or television? Or let's spend some money and install sundials on campus. Then students will know that they are at least in the ballpark!

Letter to the Editor . . .

In defense of the silent majority—a republican speaks out

Dear Editor,

This letter is in response to the article submitted by Alex Little and the election returns article in the November 22 edition of Echo. Some of you have quit reading this already because the subject matter here is not just politics, but Republicans, eww! Just stick with me a minute; it's about time somebody around here opened their mouth on behalf of the majority. Maybe I have not spoken with the right circles of people, but I have found that, by and large, students do not care about politics; and I guess I can understand that because it requires reading and looking at too many words and stuff. The only thing people seem to know is that Republicans are bad and are not to be trusted for some reason. But what do people really know about Republicans other than the negative media blurbs and what others (who dislike Republicans to begin with) tell them?

First of all, I am proud of what I believe and why I believe it. I am not an in-your-face-with-my-beliefs type, but I have grown weary of having my ideals maligned to the point that I would like to educate those of you who know nothing about Republican ideology, yet continue to slander it. Let's face it, a Republican politician or voter is considered an irrational, insensitive loose cannon. Democrat politicians/voters are praised for being responsible; they are sensitive, they are compassionate. Well, how do Democrats define compassion? By the number of people they can help into the welfare system. A Republican measures compassion by the number of people he can help out of the welfare system. You may have heard an analogy that goes something like, give a man a fish and he can eat for a day; give him a fishing pole and he can serve himself. Needless to say, I believe in providing fishing poles, so to speak.

A democrat says, "We will provide your happiness!" a Republican responds, "You are in charge of your own happiness!" Democrats have created a beautiful system in the past 40 years. The more handouts they give, the more supporters they have. The more supporters taking handouts, the more people depend on them. The more dependents the Democrats have, the more power they have, and government gets bigger and bigger ad nauseam. Republicans want to dismantle this national hammock that has evolved, and they are labeled as insensitive bigots. I have no doubt already been labeled by you: "Just another rich white male," right? Wrong. I come from a very modest income family who has made sacrifices to provide my education. It gets harder to earn a living when government grows as it has, because after all, what does big government need to stay up and running? Big taxes.

Now, I have not had the honor of meeting any of the College Democrats, and I doubt I have endeared myself to them thus far; but like it or not, this is where the Democrat ideology stands these days and it's up to you to change

"... it insults my intelligence and I dry heaved when I read it"

I. I am sure you Democrats do not like what you have seen from Democrats in Washington and would have done things differently had you held a public office. But you have to admit that Clinton is the reason we saw the Democratic party crumble on Nov. 8. Let me remind you, not one incumbent Republican lost a race. It is Clinton's liberal policies that no one supports. It was like pulling teeth among his own party members, not just the "obstructionist Republicans," to get anything Clinton supported to pass in Congress. That is why we criticize Clinton; it is not just arbitrary "status-quo bashing."

Mr. Little stated, "It is time that the public gave Clinton a chance. Let's not forget that President Clinton has created jobs, proposed [government run] health care legislation and passed the [pork ridden] crime bill." I won't begrudge him NAFTA; it was Republican legislation in conception that created jobs. However, on other issues, he has a chance and we have not forgotten these things, that's the whole point. Who appointed Mrs. Clinton to create a 500 member task force of people we did not even know to take control of our health care? Check out the arrogance from an AP source quoting Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D): "We're going to push through health care reform regardless of the views of the American people." No joke, at the very least, it insults my intelligence and I dry heaved when I read it.

I also read the quote, "I would rather see Darth Vader as House Speaker than Newt Gingrich." Sure, it was probably a lighthearted comment, but what would elicit such cynicism? Is it because Mr. Gingrich is a Republican? Why then? Has anyone even listened to his speeches? I know they are very hard concepts to stomach, but they are things like, "America is about the pursuit of happiness. That spursuit... that doesn't mean 'Happiness Stamps,' not 'The Department of Happiness,' but the pursuit of happiness." Educate yourselves, people! Don't go shooting your mouth off about people of whom you know nothing. We just got rid of Democrat House Speaker, Tom Foley. This guy would not even let a Republican piece of legislation onto the floor for debate! Oh, they were real scary ideas too; like a proposal to cut the capital gains tax, which would offer tax incentives and allow private sector growth to go through the roof. Democrats would not stand for it though because that way, dam it, fewer people would depend on government. They want you to believe that the only way you can make it in life is through them and their government programs. Allow people to do for themselves and they will say, "Hey, I don't need those guys after all!"

Remember, America was founded on the idea of equality of outcome. Sorry if I ruffled a bit; I felt that these things needed attention. Just abandon all those outmoded, negative misconceptions about Republicans and maybe you non-thinkers can establish some credibility.

“Here you are”—

Marta Rivero, an MC international student, hands one of the Headstart children a cup of herbal tea from Argentina. International students participated in Headstart's international week.

Retention, continued from p. 1

“People leave Maryville because there is absolutely nothing to do here,” said, Staci Davis, freshman. Levetta Buggs, junior, agrees. “There is nothing at all to do here, but it's really hard to transfer credits, so I've stayed.”

Chris Stephens, sophomore, does not agree. “You make your own fun here,” he said. “You can always find something to do.” Karson Leitch, freshman, also keeps busy. “We have a lot of fun,” she said. “If we can't find something to do, we make something to do.”

Dr. Gerald Gibson, president of MC, stated, “We are trying to make sure that we are sensitive to the needs of students and that we create the best possible living and learning environment for them.”

One way to insure this was the establishment of the Peer Mentoring Committee. This is a group of 14 upperclassmen who were seeking to create a support system besides the faculty and staff that freshmen could go to when they needed to talk to someone.

This committee is strongly concerned about retention. They feel that by stressing a strong sense of community and by helping students come together as peers and friends that they can help student relationships and help keep them returning to Maryville.

The Peer Mentoring Committee embraces the notion of the Campus Covenant. In order for a concept like the Covenant to work, newcomers must be acquainted with the community. This should be done by people who have lived here and who understand what the community is all about.

After the Peer Mentoring Committee was established, the Big Brother/Big Sister Program was developed. This program provides moral support for freshmen and promotes freshman involvement. Students who quickly get involved in the campus culture are less likely to leave, so this program positively affects retention as well.

Sophomore Aaron Stone, chairman of this committee, said, “Students need to realize that they can make Maryville College better simply by staying here. The foundation is here. If there's a problem, let us know, and we'll work it out.”

The MC 2000 Plan deals with retention, too. This plan has a strong commitment to exploring the problems associated with retention and to solving them quickly and efficiently. The plan's specific goals are to retain 75% of first-year, full-time students and graduate over 50%. Although it may take years to meet these goals, MC is well on its way.

Gibson has also appointed an Enrollment Management Team to work with factors affecting enrollment and retention. Members include: Cathy Cate, Mardi Craig, Becky Hedrick, Venita Jones, Carolyn Morton, Wendy Whaley, and Vandy Kemp as convener.

This group tries to identify specific problems with retention and brainstorm strategies, proposals, and solutions to them. They stress the fact that everybody on campus has to be aware of and thoughtful about retention. If everyone would share suggestions, ideas, thoughts, and strategies, it would be easier to deal with problem areas.

Vice-President of Admissions Donna Davis said of these reinforcements, “These are instruments for peoples' growth and development, and sometimes that growth and development means leaving Maryville College. That doesn't mean that the year wasn't worth it. Because it was worth it if we helped to get someone's feet on the right path. That was a success just as much as their graduating from here would be. But we do need to have enough people here—the critical mass of people—who have made the right choice, who made a thoughtful decision, and who carry the campus culture forward.”

I-House students help out at Headstart

The Headstart program is a government effort to give underprivileged children the Headstart into the school system that many of them would not get otherwise.

Lydia Cobb, a MC senior who volunteers at Alnwick School, which has four four-to-five-year-old Headstart classrooms. Cobb volunteers for Carol Rosenbals' class. Cobb has been volunteering at Headstart for three months as a Bonner Scholar.

Last week was “international week” for the program, and Cobb arranged for international students from MC to come and speak to her class. “I look at our International House as a resource that is relatively untapped,” Cobb said. Working with Kelly Franklin, the International House director, Cobb was able to get a group of volunteers together.

The response to Cobb's request was met with enthusiasm from the international students. “They were really excited to do it; they went out of their way on a big part, and they took it very seriously,” Cobb said.

Japanese, Ethiopian, Venezuelan, and Argentinean students participated in the international week at Alnwick. Each group of students told the children of Alnwick about their country, and sang songs. “They all talked about the weather, talked about Santa coming, and what they eat,” Cobb said. They also spoke to the students in their native tongue. “You could tell the kids at first were, maybe not a little confused, but they would giggle, but then they would get used to it.”

The international students also did things specific to their country. The Japanese students showed the children how to do origami, and made book marks for them with their name in Japanese on them. Josef Addis, the Ethiopian student that represented his country to the class, brought a meat dish for them to sample and traditional Ethiopian clothing to try on. The students from Venezuelashowed the children pictures of their native land, and the Argentinean students fixed herbal tea for the children.

“We did this because it's important. A lot of these kids might not get out of Tennessee, its good for them to see how things are done in different countries,” Cobb said; “They learned a lot, I learned a lot, and I think the teachers learned a lot.”

Davey McCammon asks alumni for donations for the Maryville College Annual Fund at the November Phon-a-Thon.

1994 Phon-a-thon raises $150,000 from alumni

by Amanda Martin
Staff Writer

Students raised over $150,000 for the Maryville College General Fund in the Phon-a-thon in November.

The Phon-a-thon took place over four days at Willard House and consisted of students calling alumni and friends of the college who have contributed financially to the school in the past five years.

According to Junior Beckie Heckler, student coordinator of the Phon-a-thon, fifty students volunteered to man the phones.

"It was a good experience for the students," said Heckler. "They got to hear [the alumni's] stories and experiences and let them know what is going on now."

According to Jane Gilbert, former Director of Alumni and supervisor of the Phon-a-thon, total pledges amounted to $145,552.

Bo and Chris— in search of a decent flick

by Bo McMichael and
Chris Stephens
Staff Writers

As the holiday season begins, the movie industry goes into overtime and prepares for the battle of who is number one at the hottest time of the year. Many have the chance to be noted as being different and worth the several dollar bills out of your pocket. There are some not even worth the lint in your pockets, but we won't mention them.

To begin the venture into the greatest season of them all, we begin with a riveting motion picture that brings the famed director of "La Femme Nikitia," Luc Besson, to American films. "The Professional" is a story of a hitman (Jean Reno) who through unusual circumstances forms a bond with a young girl (Natalie Portman—remember that name) while trying to evade a cop gone bad (Gary Oldman) on the streets of New York.

Bo: "It is my belief that 'The Professional' is one of the greatest love stories ever told. While watching this movie, I focused on the idea that age did not matter, which helped me to get beyond the fact that the girl was 12 years old, and the man was 36 years old. It's definitely a movie that makes you believe love has no boundaries."

Chris: "Bo always seems to read a love story into everything. The next thing you will know he will try to convince you that 'Jaws' had a greater meaning, and that the fish actually loved those people. As for the movie itself, it was not 'Speed,' nor did it move me like 'The Shawshank Redemption.' It did keep my attention and it is worth going to see. The ending is different than your average movie, and will surprise the average movie-goer."

You have to ask yourself sometimes, why do great action heroes do comedy? The answer is profit! Arnold Schwarzenegger is a research scientist who lets Danny Devito talk him into becoming a guinea pig in a male pregnancy experiment. 'Junior' is a new comedy by the man who brought you 'Dave,' Ivan Reitman.

Chris: "If for some odd reason you wanted to see the Terminator in drag and a remake of 'Twins,' 'Junior' is for you. However, if you want to keep any dignity in your life you, will watch this one on the NBC Sunday Night Movie in, oh say, a month."

Bo: "Don't listen to the remarks from a person who has not taste in comedy. There is only one condition you should consider before seeing this movie; that is, you must have partaken in the childbirth experience. Since that is not everyone, this movie is going to have a hard time making it in the race for number one at the box office. Sorry Arnold..."

Journey to the unthinkable when the two most famous people in the future join forces to defeat a madman. "Star Trek: Generations" joins Kirk (William Shatner) and Picard (Patrick Stewart) in the seventh installment of the legendary cult classic.

Chris: "Before I present my opinions of this movie, I would like to first say that this is not meant to offend anyone, especially certain English teachers. O.K. Turk? No, no Jerk? What is that fat man's name? Oh yeah, Kirk. And where was the pointy-eared guy? I mean if the fat man got to die twice in the movie, why can't the pointy ear guy be on the show? Simply said, what a stupid movie. And I thought 'Stargate' was bad. Save your money."

Bo: "I am deeply sorry, Trek fans, for the awful criticism by my partner; his opinion should only be trusted a little, if at all. The reason for this is because he has never seen one of the six movies before this one, and he also has no imagination for the future. As James T. Kirk admirably said about being captain of the Enterprise, the movie was fun. It is not as well directed as 'Star Trek IV,' but to see the two captains of the Enterprise join forces on the same screen is worth anybody's two hours."

Tim "The Tool Man" Allen has just killed Santa Claus, and just like everything in life, there is a catch to it. The catch is becoming the big guy up at the North Pole himself. This is Allen's first movie, and to play the role of Kris Kringle he had to gain 150 lbs. Wow!

Bo: "Keep to the Nielsen ratings Tim, because the box office is not ready for you yet. Even though 'The Santa Clause' brings the holiday feeling out in you, it just can't deliver enough Christmas spirit. I found myself waiting for Wilson to pop out of the back of the sleigh and help 'The Tool Man' with his Santa Clause. This is definitely a 'feel good' movie for the holiday season, and a don't miss if you need a good laugh to get rid of that 'ba humbug' feeling."

The holiday rush is far from over, and Santa will have much more to bring. In his bag of toys this year we might find Wesley Snipes and Gary Bussey in the air, Demi Moore and Michael Douglas in the bed, and find out the answer to the ultimate question. Who is dumber, Jeff Daniels or Jim Carey?

Until next time...Merry Christmas and we will see you at the movies!

Mellon grants—McNeill, Perez-Reilly

by Jessica Lemler
Staff Writer

The projects that were funded by Mellon Grants were presented to students and faculty on Dec. 1. The presentation was sponsored by the Humanities Club and was given in the CCM.

Senior Sarah Goelz began the presentation by discussing the project that she and Dr. Sarah McNeill completed this past summer. Goelz and McNeill examined three diaries belonging to Jonathan Hoffmeister, a former Maryville College student.

There were three diaries, covering the years 1847, 1852, and 1855-57. The diary from 1847 was written while Hoffmeister was a student.

Goelz pointed out several of the similarities between student life in 1847 and student life today. Hoffmeister, like many present-day students, wrote about paying money he owed to the college by doing odd jobs. One of these jobs, as mentioned by McNeill, included doing the lettering on diplomas.

Another similarity mentioned by Goelz was the distraction offered by fellow students. Hoffmeister wrote that he was often distracted by his friends while trying to study, something not too uncommon to today's students.

Goelz and McNeill found most of the background information on the diaries here at Maryville College. They also did research at the Blount County library, the special collections department at UT, and the library in Rogersville, where Hoffmeister lived. Hoffmeister had been ordained a Presbyterian minister, so Goelz and McNeill also found information through the Presbyterian Church.

The second project was presented by senior Angela

McLemore and Dr. Elizabeth Perez-Reilly. This project involved researching Spanish novels to define and observe the picaresque literary genre. It is thought that the genre may have begun in Spain, and it can be traced through Spanish novels.

McLemore and Perez-Reilly came up with several characteristics of the picaresque novels, including: an episodic plot that involves travel, a theme of fortune that is lost, a chain of events that moves rapidly, an open-ended plot that allows for a sequel, and a protagonist that is of low standing and has an unknown background.

By reading and closely examining these novels, McLemore and Perez-Reilly were able to learn more about the picaresque novel and compile their findings for other peoples' use.

349 spaces still available, promising courses in psychology, ASL, and the humanities

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

Spring semester registration is approaching, and with it comes the usual flipping through the schedule of courses. As you're searching for that perfect class, don't overlook the 349 selected topics and seminars.

This spring, the three 349 courses being offered are Psychology of Women, which is being taught by Dr. Kathy Shiba, Advanced ASL Studies, which is taught by Sherri Moran, and Women and Evil in History and Literature, taught by Drs. Peggy Cowan, Clarice Doucette, and Amy Livingstone.

Shiba described her course as a seminar in which they will be "discussing issues important in understanding women."

Some themes and subjects that will be covered include feminism, sex-typing, health issues, violence against women, and women of all cultures.

"It's really a wide range of different topics," Shiba said.

Shiba hopes to address these topics using many different mediums.

These include films, guest speakers, discussions, journals, papers, and presentations.

"I encourage both females and males to attend. I'd like to have a variety of backgrounds and majors represented," Shiba commented.

Shiba hopes to keep the class size fairly small.

It is required that the students be upperclassmen who have already taken Introduction to Psychology 101.

Moran's class on advanced ASL studies is also limited to upperclassmen, specifically those with a strong background in ASL. It is described in the college catalog as selected topics on deafness and interpreting. No other information on the seminar was available at the Echo deadline.

The final 349 course being offered by Cowan, Doucette, and Livingstone bears the title "Sinners, Saints, Sorcerers, and Damns in Distress."

The objective of the course is to study the portrayal of women in historical, literary, and religious writings.

Students will examine the different ways women have been represented in historical and religious texts, as well as short stories and novels.

The class is being offered by the Humanities Division. It can be counted towards the major or minor in either the English, history, or religion departments.

Registrar Martha Hess described the 349 courses as classes that are "taught more in a seminar fashion. The students contribute more," she said.

"The topics may vary. A student may take two or three 349 classes under one major that are all different topics," Hess continued.

She described the classes as being upper division courses for students who have a background in the area that is being taught.

Hess said that the best way to find out what 349 classes within a major will generally be like is to look them up in the college catalog.

She also mentioned that if a group of students in a department have an interest in a particular subject, "The group could go to a department member and see if something can be worked out."

MC cagers tipp-off successful season

by Chris Stephens
Staff Writer

As of Dec. 13, both men's and women's basketball teams seem well on their way to very successful season. The men stand at 5-1 and the women at 7-1. The men are in the midst of a modest five game winning streak and the women's only loss came to a NCAA Division II team, Belmont.

Since dropping their first game of the season the men have beaten Centre College twice, defeated Tusculum and Mt. Union to win the Maryville College Invitational Tournament, and, behind a career-high performance by Dee Bell that saw him pour in 33 points, defeated Emory & Henry.

The women have enjoyed equally good success. They have captured two tournaments this season, the second of which was in Rocky Mount, NC. The Lady Scots defeated Marymount by the final of 89-71 to win the North Carolina Wesleyan Tournament.

In recent action the Lady Scots defeated the Tusculum Pioneers by the score of 81-77. At the time, Tusculum was undefeated and sitting pretty at 6-0. Junior Jamie Parrott lead the onslaught by scoring 34. This included the first 12 for the Lady Scots.

Upcoming games for the Lady Scots include a home contest against Centre College on Dec. 15 with tip-off at 6 p.m. The Lady Scots will then remain at home for their next contest, which is a Dec. 17 showdown beginning at 1 p.m. against Milligan College. Coming up for the Lady Scots in early January will be the Maryville College Invitational on Jan. 6 and 7 with the games starting at 6 p.m.

As for the men's team, their next game will be Dec. 17 at home when the team tries to avenge an earlier loss. Thomas More College will be here for a 3 p.m. tip-off. Next for the team will be an early January tournament at Tusculum, the Tusculum Classic on Jan 6 and 7.

The Good News And Bad News About Campus Religion

by Robert Watts Thornburg

Editor's Note: The following article is reprinted here from "Orientation 89" with permission from the Board of Higher Education and Ministry of The United Methodist Church, Nashville, Tenn., copyright 1989. It was submitted to the Echo by the Rev. Stephen Nickle, college chaplain.

You're standing alone. This is such a big place, and strange, too. Everyone else seems to know where to go and what to do. Can I ever find where to go, know what to do, or even look as if I know what the score is?

Then two students come along who are so friendly and upbeat. They are friendlier than those "hosts" who showed you around campus while you were still a prospective student, and before you had put down the big bucks to attend this place. Can we show you around campus? they ask. Need a hand with that trunk? Hey, doing anything tonight? We're part of this great group that is having a party, and we're inviting lots of new students to come.

Now this sounds so much like the way you were supposed to greet new people for the Youth Fellowship back home that ask: Is this some sort of a religious group? Yes, is the reply, but we're strictly non-denominational—all sorts of people attend. They say that as though the denominational connection is the only reason someone who is new on campus would stay away from a church group.

What's wrong with this scene? Sounds perfectly innocent, someone says; I can't believe that a university chaplain, no matter how cynical, could ever find anything wrong with that. I guess that's the reason most of us are not very effective in talking about destructive religion on campus. But destructive religious groups are very much a part of campus life in many places.

Groups have different names and lots of difference in belief systems. Some are developments of Eastern religions; other are self-help groups; still others sound like standard Christian evangelicals. Though the beliefs change, the behavior in all of these groups is nearly identical. And it is their behavior that is destructive of personality, faith, and all other relationships. Lots of people call them cults; I don't like to speak of cults. That's a media buzz word. It conjures all sorts of images of Jonestown or Satan worship. Instead, I'll describe what seems destructive about the approach and behaviors of certain religious groups. Then, I will explain how a reasonably stable, idealistic, and intelligent student like you might get hooked into them. Finally, I can suggest what you can do to become aware of the dangers and deal with them when they come up.

How could religion ever be destructive? The best answer I know is to describe what a good, strong, healthy faith looks like, and then look at the opposite. Start here: The core of any high religion is love. That's the first word we learned in Sunday school; it is the most important word in the Christian faith. But what we are talking about is a genuine love that we give to others, not in order to control or manipulate them, but because we have been loved by someone before and need to show love to others.

Students who join destructive religious groups really are sincere. They believe that they are the only ones who are following God's will. But their love is a conditional love, conditioned upon your joining and participating in their group. And if you do not join, all the attention showered on you in the beginning disappears like the morning mist.

Think of this: Healthy faith is able to include all of my experiences, and it should encompass everything I do. Different perspectives are important. When we go to college, it is a time in which we begin to form our own values and standards. We often challenge the standards that our family and our church gave us during the first eighteen years of our lives. This is important because these values and standards must now be our own, not secondhand. We can and should be able to question and wrestle with the beliefs and traditions of our church. Questioning leads to stronger faith and understanding.

The kind of dogmatic belief-structure that says, You can't ask that question, is simply not adequate. Equally important is the understanding that faith touches every phase of life and thought. It has to do with how you think and how you work and how you behave when you go out. If you have questions about someone who has invited you to join a religious group, don't hesitate to ask those questions. If you get vague or evasive answers or hear, We just can't explain it, you just have to come and experience it, that group may be very dangerous to your personal, emotional, and spiritual health.

The faith of the Scriptures is inclusive, not exclusive. College may be the first time some of us get to know friends who are Catholics or Jews, Buddhists or Disciples. That's what makes the college experience so expansive: You can experience all sorts of new and wonderful flavors of faith and learn from new friends what other patterns of faith are about. But always be suspicious of someone who tells you that God gave them a corner on the whole truth. It is likely they have substituted their own notions for those of the divinity, and that is what blasphemy is all about.

A religion is destructive when it tells you that your parents and your past are wrong. I suspect there are times when you have pondered that idea yourself, but when the representative of a "religion" tells you that your folks are not "Christian" or are satanic, or that anyone who does not follow their very specific rules of conduct is going straight to hell—well, you'd better remember that God alone decides on our final destinations; no set of doctrines can establish the ground rules on that one.

How could any reasonably stable and intelligent person ever get involved in such a group? That's the question one of my best students asked at the start of a college class I taught last year on destructive religious behavior. By the end of the course, these twenty students, who had read the basic documents and had made personal visits to three groups which are usually considered destructive, wrote as part of their final exam how they thought stable and intelligent students get involved with these groups. See if you qualify as a potential target according to their standards. What follows are reasonable statements that you might make and how a destructive religious group member might respond:

1. Statement: I have strong beliefs and love for my own church. I don't think I would be very interested in joining another. Their answer: But you are open-minded aren't you? You are interested in new ideas, and this is a wonderful bunch of students to go around with.

2. Statement: I'm really interested in doing some volunteer work in my spare time. Their answer: We do that sort of thing all the time.

3. Statement: I just have a couple of questions about your group. Their answer: Those are great questions! Just hold that question for a minute, and you will have the answers.

4. Let's suppose you have attended the group once or twice.

Statement: I really need to study tonight; perhaps I can come some other time. Their answer: Grades aren't the only thing that's important in college. Where are your priorities?

The problem is that each of their responses on their own are valid and important. While it is important to be open-minded, destructive religious groups are in reality the most genuinely closed and sectarian on campus. That means that they have a single set of beliefs from which no member is allowed to question or stray. When one goes to college, the best attitude is to question everything. It is this kind of critical examination that makes life worth living.

When any group asks you to join, you have a right to ask what they are, and what they believe. Do they believe, for example, that Christ calls some to be physicians and some teachers, some homemakers and some musicians, or does a good Christian mean one is professionally devoted to full-time service in some church institution? We know that God calls persons to many vocations, and ordained ministry is good and important, but it is not the only, or for that matter the most important, vocation that you might take up.

Finally, the question of the use of your time is one of the most important issues that will confront you as you enter college. You are in class only about 15 or 20 hours a week; much less than any high school program. This means that you must decide what to do with the rest of your time. You will have lots of time for goofing off and lots of time for different campus activities. Successful students are those who learn to budget their time as carefully as they budget their money. Your primary vocation is to be a good student, and although religion is important to give direction to your life, it's especially important to maintain balance and perspective. Your faith will be with you in every moment of study but the time you spend on "church work" ought to be balanced with your other demands.

What do I do when I am approached by someone who seems to represent such a group? The first response is the name of a great little pamphlet we give to all our new students. It is called "Learn To Be A Questioner." That's very good advice. True religions never fear questions. Any chaplain, campus minister, or professor who gets angry when you ask a significant and sincere question is trying to hide something. These can be very simple questions like the name of the church, its connections with denominational or national organizations, its history, and the source of its beliefs.

When someone approaches you to attend a group meeting, ask what they want of you. If your joining them is their real purpose, it's probably a group to be avoided. Ask about ex-members of the group such as what were their reasons for leaving. Groups are known by those who get out as well as those who stay in. And remember always to be aware of ambiguous or evasive answers.

Second, learn to say no. That sounds simple, and yet it is very important. In college most new students are so anxious to be liked that they beat around the bush when approached to attend a new group or take a stand on some topic or cause. You must learn to say no to all sorts of invitations that will come to you during the next four years. When you face an unwanted religious intrusion, just say no. But clearly that is not always very easy to do, so we all need a system of support groups.

Find persons with whom you can talk easily and freely. This may be a chaplain or campus minister of your own denomination or a member of the faculty, or an administrator. It is important to bounce ideas off someone you can trust.

Most of us were reared to respect religious observance and beliefs, especially when they are different from our own. That is exactly what these groups are counting on. You do not have to be rude or mean to say a clear, no thank you, when someone tells you that your salvation depends on going to their group this very day or taking up their pattern of beliefs.

Religious faith is important for your whole life, but nowhere more important than during the years you are in college. Make it a firm and joyous faith, one which accepts the new learning you are receiving, and one that is able to firmly integrate your old ideas, values, and friends with new ideas and new friends.

Collins resigns Marriott position

by David Downs
Campus Life Editor

This past week, Maryville College lost an individual who, in a way, took the place of a student's mother while away at college.

Kevin Collins resigned his position as Food Service Director for Marriott to pursue a life-long dream in the wine industry.

For the last five years, Collins has worked for the Marriott Corporation at MC where he organizes, supervises, and directs the food service that supplies student meals each day.

Collins graduated from Penn State University in 1985 with a degree in Hotel/Restaurant Management. His first real job in this field was with Disney World in Florida. Shortly thereafter, Collins was hired by Marriott and moved to Huntington, WV, where he worked for three years at Marshall University. After feeding the "Thundering Herd," Collins was hired by MC as director of food services.

Collins is currently heading to Nashville to work for Lipman Brothers, where he will be selling wine and spirits to restaurants like the Hard Rock Cafe and many others. He has always had an interest in the wine industry.

"I've always had an interest in this," said Collins. "I remember when I was a little kid, my parents took me to wineries and vineyards, and, this past summer, a friend of mine set me up with some tours in California and had VIP tours of the vineyards."

Collins started taking classes in wine a few years ago. For the past

Food service facilities not up to par

by Josh Goocey
Staff Writer

One of the essential facets of student life at Maryville is where and what they eat. It is not uncommon for the food services division of the college to receive the greatest amount of dissatisfied comments from students. One student stated "I'm sick of it! You are not providing enough vegetables," and another claimed "I have never seen anything as bad as today's lunch." Comments such as these seem to be the consensus of the students at Maryville College.

Students pay a moderate sum of money to be on the meal plan. The exact figures vary, but it is approximately $1,105 for 21 meals a week, and $775 for 10 meals a week. This translates to an estimated sum of $10 a day for Marriott's services. However, Marriott does not receive all of the money that the college collects for meals. Of the $10 Marriott receives five dollars and 10 cents. Stephanie Wyatt, director of residence life said that the remainder of the money is used "for maintenance, equipment, utilities, insurance, and the basic running of the facilities." Thus the quality of the food students receive is less than what they pay for.

Outside catering plays a somewhat important role in the Marriott food services because it helps generate more funds. Kevin Collins, the former director of Marriott at MC, stated, "We are trying to increase the amount of catering we do outside of the college." By increasing the amount of outside catering, Marriott should be able to generate more funds, thus increasing the quality of food. Marriott is required by their contract to provide the president of the college with up to $5,000 in free catering. This can be used any way that he chooses. He may use this for personal or business purposes, but this $5,000 dollars is subtracted from the $5.10 that the students pay for daily meals.

This lack of money does not only affect the quality of food, but it also reduces the quality of service that the students receive. Maryville College is 175 years old, and its age makes it more susceptible to breakdowns and maintenance problems. The cafeteria is no exception to this problem. Maryville provides all of the large machinery for Marriott and has been unable to update the equipment because they do not have enough money.

The Maryville cafeteria has a food

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

As recruiting for the Resident Assistant position begins, I feel that it is necessary to examine the role of the RA, and how Student Development (and the college) supports its staff.

This year, three RAs have resigned their positions, and a few others have seriously considered that option.

And why not? There are a number of problems with the Resident Assistant position at Maryville College.

The job itself is not an easy one. An RA works a thankless job. Available at all hours and chained to a desk every few nights, it's not what most people would consider to be a fun job.

RAs do get paid for the job they do—approximately $120 a month, they get a discount on a single room, and they get to enforce all the rules that just about every college student lives to break.

RAs get paid $120 a month—at a rate of $4.25 an hour. Okay, that's probably fair enough. The single room deal, however, is a different story. An RA has no choice but to live in a single; it's all part of the job. As you hear the story told in most places, an RA gets a single for approximately the price of a double. Approximately is the operative word.

Last year an RA paid for a double in the dorm that he or she lived in, and the remainder was picked up by a housing allotment for RAs.

Well, at the end of the year, MC experienced an increase in tuition and room and board. The price of a double increased, as well as the price of a single.

Suprise! The housing allotment for RAs did not manage to pick up the extra bit of change that came along with the 7.49 percent increase (the lowest in years!). So, RAs pay just a little more to live in a single rather than a double. Big deal. It's not that much, but when you're faced with the cost of books and living, every little bit counts.

It probably would not be that big of an issue if RAs had the choice to live in a single or a double, but they don't, so essentially, RAs pay to be RAs.

Sure, the paycheck covers it, but that just isn't the point. If you take a look at other schools, RAs either get room and board for free, or they get a large paycheck, or a combination of both.

But not at Maryville. Here, they get a $120 paycheck a month, and they get to pay $27.00 extra to live in a room that they are required to live in (if they are living in Copeland, Davis, or Gamble). That is wrong.

In addition to that purely material gripe that many RAs share, there is another.

Many RAs feel that there is little or no support from Student Development or the Disciplinary Review Board and the Judicial Board.

The rules that RAs enforce are not being acted upon. The MC Handbook sets forth some pretty strict guidelines. Those guidelines, however, are not being enforced. Once an RA writes a student up, the incident is out of their hands. The decision of what happens to the student ultimately lies in the hands of the DRB, if the MC judicial system is too soft on those individuals committing infractions, the RAs lose credibility and ultimately respect and authority. When a resident can say, "Big deal, I'll just get a letter of reprimand," the RAs can't do a great deal.

So how do we solve these problems? Student Development needs to provide for the housing of RAs—at least a supplement to cover (completely) the additional cost of a single room. The pay itself isn't quite as big of an issue. Anyone going into the job knows that they aren't going to rake in the big bucks. It's just not possible to pay RAs for the actual hours that they work.

Support from above is something that is completely necessary. Student Development needs to be willing to eliminate or alter inconsistent policies, and the MC judicial system needs to be held accountable for its decisions. If residents are supposed to be kicked out of Pearsons for infractions of the alcohol policy, then they should be kicked out. DRB members should not be heard uttering the words, "they were only drinking"—or anything similar.

It appears we Americans have done it again. By "it" I mean, in the spirit of R.E.M., we have again "exhumed McCarthy." Newt Gingrich, I must admit, has long annoyed me, but his latest ideas have made my stomach churn uncontrollably. Not only does he insist that we must cut funding of such programs as Head Start while reinvesting in defense spending, he now insists that it is time for the National Endowments for the Humanities and Arts and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to go off the government dole. So it appears that not only must Newt and his comrades impugn the character of our President—he still is president by the way, despite Newt's wishes to the contrary, and deserves at least a little respect—but now he is attacking one of my childhood heroes, Big Bird. Apparently, according to Newt, Big Bird is a cog in the propagandist machinations of an elitist controlled public television network.

Don't mess with my elitist yellow bird

Newt's solution to the "problem" of Public Television and its use of tax payers hard earned money is to make Public TV essentially like every other station, dependent on advertisements which demand shows that catch the viewer's eye.

It has even been suggested that Big Bird be marketed like a Power Ranger or Barney. What's next—Mr. Rogers' Neighborhood action figures? Must we be subject to "Sesame Street is brought to you by the letter 'W', the number '7' and new, nacho-cheesier Doritos"? I cannot bear the thought of such a development.

The other plan, abolishing the National Endowments for both the Humanities and the Arts, is no more pleasing. Sure, these programs do fund an occasional project that is not exactly inspiring to many of us or any of us. Nevertheless, the benefits of wonderful Broadway musicals and stimulating research for the humanities far outweigh the harm of whatever "pornographic" or "innappropriate" projects are funded. Of course, the discussion over what is pornographic opens up a whole other debate which I am not concerned with at the present. The simple fact of the matter is wonderful shows like "Les Miserables" and "Phantom of the Opera" could face serious cutbacks. They would likely survive, but what about the many minor shows that are just as wonderful but have less financial support outside NEA? Are we to allow American theatre suffer? Just think, theatre is only one of many things that receive NEA support.

It has been said that Public Television will likely not go out of business, though Newt would probably be happy to see them auctioning off pieces of equipment to pay the bills. Even people who say that losing PBS is unlikely admit that the network will be adversely influenced. I'm sure that it's not too wild to imagine PBS creating its own "Melrose Place" or "As the World Turns" to compete with the other networks. At the very least, viewers will lose some of the programming they cherish.

Why do Newt and Rush want to cut funding for PBS? Is it because it is a symbolic action to show the American people they have what it takes to make the hard decisions? It's certainly not necessary; all three organizations combined take up about 600 million dollars of the federal budget, or a little over two dollars a taxpayer! Rush says the reason is that the channel is not worth the audience it draws. On his show he scornfully derided the programming of the channel saying something like "Oh look, here's a show on the life of the Buddha; that sounds real interesting. Here's one on the war on poverty saying what a great guy Lyndon B. Johnson was for pumping all that money into a failed program." Of course, that's not verbatim, but it's close to his sentiment. The real reason is symbolic, not of Newt's resolve, but of his desire to rid himself and his fellows of "Liberalism." Let's face it, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting is known for its liberal bent. Newt can't very well boast of liberalism being dead if it is alive and well on a television and radio network that gets some of its money from the government.

It seems then that Newt and his buddies mustn't get away with what amounts to little more than censorship. Much of my anger over this has dissipated, but my resolve has not. Mr. Gingrich can mess with a lot of things, but not Big Bird!

Bo & Chris—still searching

Slowly dust off the chair and sweep the popcorn off the floor. Once again a new year awaits the cinema crazed movie goer. However, there is still some unfinished business to take care of with some movies from the past. Over the holidays many movies saw an end to their careers as big screen films. Others, however, made a race to fight for that number one spot at the box office. As for Chris and me, we were separated during the holidays, but we are back and ready to compare our notes and try to help the restless college students over the winter months.

If you ever wanted to sky dive and you never had the chance to do it, your time has come! The prices is only $6.00 for one admission ticket to see "Drop Zone". Wesley Snipes and Gary Busey led the credits with a lot of air in between them.

Bo: "I have to admit that I am the first to say that I am afraid of heights. But this movie made me, and will make you, want to feel that major rush that comes when nothing stands between you and the ground but several hundred feet and a piece of cloth."

Chris: "Well I don't know about that. It sounds like Bo has watched one too many movies this holiday season. He is right about the intensity, I felt like I was on the edge ready to jump with Wesley every time."

The next movie really explains itself in the title: "Dumb and Dumber." This movie stars our favorite funny-man Jim Carrey and Jeff Daniels. This no plot, no brains movie brings every joke to the screen. Too bad they couldn't find any funny ones.

Bo: "Carrey's Trilogy of '94 came to a close with little or no intelligence. Whether it was a stab at comedy or not, this movie had its moments of side-splitting humor. Carrey's window of fame will not be decided until he dons the outfit of the Riddler in "Batman Forever" this spring. Good luck, Jim.

Chris: "The absolutely, positively stupidest movie that I have ever seen, (except that Star Trek thing). There can not possibly be anything dumber than this. No humor at all. Good try guys, try again some other time. I really did not like Carry to begin with, but sorry, Bo, you are going to have to go worship the Riddler solo, I refuse."

Well, once again Demi Moore of "Indecent Proposal" and Michael Douglas of "Basic Instinct" have ventured into one of the last sexy movies of '94. However, this time Moore calls all the shots, and Douglas plays the victim. Michael Crichton's best seller, "Disclosure" is brought to Hollywood on the shoulders of Barry Levinson, who's latest films have been seen more at the video store than at the theater. The story revolves around the accusation of sexual harassment in the work place. The premise of the story surrounds a computer executive's (Moore) seductive attempts at a male co-worker (Douglas). When turned down, the executive turns the tables and presses charges that the co-worker made a pass at her.

Chris: "I guess that Douglas has some of the strongest will power that I have ever seen. Good for him though, I guess. The intensity is second to none.

Bo: "I'd have no problem with Moore as my boss. Not to say that I would not have made that same decision myself if the situation arose. Well, maybe.

In 1991 John Singleton brought you "Boyz-in-the-Hood". Now this time in 1995 he brings you reality on a college campus in "Higher Learning". Ice Cube, Omar Epps, Kristy Swanson, and Laurence Fishbone bring this thought provoking film to life.

Chris: "There isn't a lot to say about this film. It will touch every emotion in you and come back for more. If Maryville College is your picture of a average college, this is a must see movie."

Bo: "I have to agree with my buddy, this movie really shook me up and then dropped me on my head. Ice Cube and Fishbone help bring the concept of life to this film, as well as logic! Just see it with an open mind and remember to unlearn."

We had to split time to help cover all the new films over the holidays. "I.Q." is a romantic comedy that tells you love is a mystery, even to Albert Einstein. Tim Robbins, Meg Ryan, and Walter Matthau formulate an I.Q. about love and life.

Chris: "Ryan and Robbins need no help to fall in love. The movie brings smiles and laughter."

More match-making sprang up, but this time it was totally political.

and Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

Michael Keaton and Geena Davis play rival speech writers in this sort-of true life political romance. Unfortunately, it turns into a moment of total "Speechless"-ness.

Bo: "I wish I would have seen 'I.Q.' because there was no chemistry between Keaton and Davis. All they did was take stabs with one-liners, and that got old quick.

The year of '94 has closed it's door, but thanks to this critiquing duo, never will the doors of the theater be closed. Next time we will bring you the epic "Legends of the Fall," "Murder in the First," and the conclusion of the "Highlander" series.

Until then, we will see you at the movies...

Greetings and Salutations, I hope everyone enjoyed their holidays and are rested for the new semester. I am sure that all those New Year's resolutions are being followed. Don't expect me to keep mine.

The beginning of the new year has brought lots of work for the Student Senate. I have been working with the Metropolitan Drug Commission. The commission has formed a group composed of the student government presidents of Carson-Newman, the University of Tennessee, Knoxville College, and Pellissippi State. The group is focusing energies on enlightening people on drug and alcohol abuse. If you are interested in working with this group or any of the student governments listed, please notify me.

A number of students form the senate were busy because the Board of Directors met the weekend of Jan. 27. I would like to thank Aaron Stone, Clint Wight, and Alex Little for their extra time during these meetings.

Many of you know that Kevin Collins has left, and the Food Services Committee spent extra time interviewing people to fill the Marriott Director position. The new director is Marge Bradley. Welcome, Marge, and I hope you enjoy Maryville College.

Senate will be discussing the visitation policy in all residence halls at upcoming meetings. There is some work to be done on revising the Lloyd 24-hour visitation policy, and a number of students have proposed 24-hour visitation on the weekends for Copeland, Davis and Gamble. Even if the Senate votes unanimously to have 24-hour visitation in these dorms, there is more red tape to work through. The administration at this college generally keeps the students' best interests in mind. Unfortunately, it cannot appease student desires all the time. This proposal will be examined closely by the Student Senate and by the staff and administration. If you want to support or offer suggestions concerning this topic, please contact Jim Galyon, Josh Goocey, or me.

If you are interested in running for an office for next year, please contact me soon because Senate President elections are in the middle of April, and the sophomore, junior and senior position elections will be in late April. I would like to see big races in all of the elections. If you are interested and feel you have the time, please look into it.

Greetings and salutations to all those whose eyes are fortunate enough to grace this page. I was going to start my column with some witty Jesse Jackson-esque phrase like "Keep hope alive in ninety five," or "For excellence we strive in '95." It was easy to convince myself to do otherwise because I'm sure that you will be subject to some sort of torture of this nature elsewhere during the year. I hope that everyone's New Year has begun on a prosperous note and that you have big plans for the next 300-something days. I know I do.

Before I begin, I would like to invite anyone and everyone to write me and tell me what they think about my column or to give me some ideas as to what to write about.

We are almost upon what I like to call "The Day of the Demon." Others refer to it as Valentine's Day. This is the day when that evil little demon Cupid takes over the minds of all who allow him to and forces men, and some women, to make complete idiots of themselves by making plans and buying and doing things that they normally would not.

It has always disturbed me as to what an incredible jackass I make of myself when Valentine's Day approaches. By the time I reached the age of eighteen, I realized that during this time of the year I would rather be alone.

I have this huge problem, I am what some would call a "Love Extremist." When it comes to the loved ones in my life, I tend to go to extremes. The last Valentine's that I spent with a girlfriend, I did everything that she wanted to do. I even let her come to my place and pick out my outfit for the evening. She hated everything in my closet and decided to go out and buy me something. The outfit I wore made me look like a cross between a very eccentric gang member and a retired Temptation. The jacket had rhinestones (yes rhinestones!) going down the lapels, the pants were hunter green and had a matching vest that had a hood on it. The shirt was cream and the shoes were black retro tennis shoes. I felt like an idiot, and I had the outfit to match. She took my car and kept it all day, and when she came to pick me up she had a dozen roses. It gave me a really giddy feeling to be getting flowers. I now understand how women feel when they get flowers from men. My car was full of balloons and her friends. She neglected to tell me that we were going out with another couple, and I know why she didn't tell me. I hated those two. You know the couples that are always on each other. I don't mean in private or every now and then, I mean ALWAYS on each other to the point that it just makes you want to vomit. Every time you see this couple together, which is all the time, your stomach turns because it reminds you of that one episode of "Wild Kingdom" when they showed the hippos mating. I can understand public displays of affection, but some couples take it to the extreme, especially the unattractive ones. This couple was like that, and it made me pray that they never decide to procreate. It would just be one more ugly baby brought into the world.

All in all the date was terrible, and the only thing I wanted to do was go home and try not to have nightmares about those two and what I think they were doing under the table in the restaurant.

I have always had bad experiences with the friends of women that I date. I know that when you accept a person into your life you accept their faults and strengths and all the baggage that they bring into the relationship, including their friends. I just can't stand the ones who believe that their friendship overrides any relationship that you might have. Everyone has experienced what I call the "third or fifth wheel" syndrome. This is that friend that is always around and they never leave or they want to go with you everywhere you go.

Here's an example: Recently my girlfriend and I were at her house hanging out with her very good friend. I don't know, let's call him

Leroy. She and Leroy had already been to the movies, and the three of us met and went out to eat. When we finished eating we decided to go to her house just to chill out. After several hours of doing nothing, Leroy never caught the hint. We wanted to be alone and he refused to leave. I never said anything to him because I felt it wasn't my place to tell him to get out. He's not my buddy, he's her buddy. She finally invited him outside and decided to spare his feelings by telling him that we were tired and we were going to sleep. (I slept on the couch.) I have to sympathize with people who are so lonely that they have to live other people's lives or interfere with them. It's hard to tell someone that they can't be involved with this part of your life, but I happen to like Leroy and he's a nice guy, so we decided to find him a girlfriend. I guess there are things that one has to tolerate when it comes to the kingdom of "coupledom," and for those things that are not tolerable they must be simply overlooked or taken care of immediately.

Until next issue "Ladies and Gentlemen, There it is...."

Letter to the Editor...

In the last edition of the Highland Echo, a letter was written by David Sims as a response to a Nov. 22 letter that I wrote. David, I hope that this will be the last time that we communicate our ideas through the newspaper. I want to say that talk is extremely cheap, and if you disagree with some of the points in my letter, call a forum. In this forum, you can deviate from the tone of your letter in which you resort to name-calling and how elected officials have insulted your intelligence. For a change, you can talk directly to me and an audience in order to test this bank of knowledge you claim to have.

In your response to my letter, you claimed that government was too big. President Clinton had no part in the NAFTA agreement, and that our first lady overstepped her bounds with the health care bill. First, as a Republican, I am sure that you lean towards the view of a hands-off government approach and the trickle down effect of big business. Mr. Sims, it seems that you have forgotten your history. In our history, there was a time when there was very little regulation of business. Child labor violations and unfair and unsanitary working conditions along with the mislabeling of consumer products are just some of the factors that led to big government. Secondly, you comment that the Republicans conceived NAFTA and the Democrats had no part in its conception is partisan politics at its finest. Mr. Sims, I don't think America cares about results. Lastly, you talk about Hillary Clinton and her attempt to create health care legislation. We need to thank someone that she's the president's wife, and that she is undertaking a remarkable task for free. I think that it is a weak man who cannot swallow a woman breaking from her traditional role in an attempt breaking from her traditional role in an attempt to solve one of America's biggest problems.

At the rate that America is traveling, the nation will not survive. It will take a person with profound convictions to tackle the dysfunctional system in Washington. Anybody can criticize and point a finger, but how many can step up to bat and solve some of America's problems. I don't claim to have all the answers. However, I want to say to you, Mr. Sims, don't criticize me for what I felt on election night. The words I say are mine, and I stand by them. I want to say to you one more time that talk is cheap, and that if you or anyone of your Republican cronies disagree with what I say, be a man and discuss your opinion with me in a forum. In a forum, you can address just how good the Republican party has been for Tennessee families, the one point in my editorial that you failed to address. Finally, since all those who do not agree with your particular form of thinking are non-thinkers, what are you? Are you a thinker, or are you just another so-called educated man who feels that, since you have gone to college, your intellectual capacity supersedes that of the common man?

Letter to the Editor . . .

Dear Sir:

The article on attrition and retention in a recent article of the Echo had one remark that puzzled and intrigued several of us who have been nestled in the foothills of the Smokies for some time. You indicated that there are several Maryville College students who have left the college or are discontented at the college because "they have not had the full college experience."

That remark raises two questions, and many of us would love to discuss with students the issues involved in the questions.

We do not normally answer letters to the editor, however, we felt that this letter deserved some response other than a follow-up article on retention and attrition. Your rephrasing, "What has the College told students they will experience here that in fact they cannot find here" is perhaps the key to MC's poor retention rate.

This could be attributed to a number of things—inaccurate brochures and advertisement of the college, admissions counselors who are not visible on campus and therefore not well versed in the campus community and what type of student would do well here, and, of course, the students who have needs that just cannot be met by the college.

We have noticed another problem, the retention rate of staff and faculty seems to be suffering also. To date, we have counted 12 members of the faculty and staff who have left, or are leaving Maryville College, in this academic year alone. Only four of these can be attributed to what might be called "natural attrition." They are each leaving for their own personal reasons, just as each student who transfers leaves for his or her own reasons. However, this mass exodus may very well point to a much larger problem, and certainly will make it difficult for Maryville College to be "the best possible college."

1. What is, exactly, "the full college experience"?

2. The second question is epistemological. If the students haven't had this experience, how do they know what it is?

On a more solemn note, we suspect that the colloquy ought to have a different phrasing: "What has the college told students they will experience here that in fact they cannot find here?"

Awaiting some answers,
David R. Carlidge
Ralph W. Beeson Professor of Religion.

Letter to the Editor . . .

To the Editor:

The Highland Echo used to be a school newspaper of decent quality that printed stories that the students wanted to see. Last year, just one issue provided information about Vision 2000, the Student Senate elections, a very distinguished guest speaker at the college, how to survive Senior Comps, happenings around campus at that time, a history of some of the college buildings, an editorial about dreams and goals, and a column. I received a copy of the Echo today and read about a member of the staff resigning, a church group invading the campus, a Christian holiday being exploited, some movie reviews, letters to the editor (one about a church invading the campus), and an article telling me the evils of church groups that invade campuses. That may be a slight exaggeration, but not much of one. In the last couple of issues of the Echo, in fact, I have read Christian commentaries about a whole lot of things. I thought maybe it was just chance that all these editorials and columns were being written at the same time, but now I am beginning to wonder. I am not a Christian, and the constant stream of Christian theology in the college newspaper is not anything that I am interested in. I understand that just because I am not interested in something does not mean that those things should be excluded. However, the abundance of Christian remarks in the Echo takes it almost to the level of a Christian magazine.

The paper (it is still a newspaper, I hope), in order to print no less than four statements of Christianity this issue, cut stories we would all find fun to read, such as a story about how to get through finals. I think the Highland Echo staff needs to sit back and understand that they are not on campus to tell us what our religious values are or what they should be. If we make mistakes, so be it. Everybody makes mistakes.

P. S. In a totally unrelated comment, the great masses of non-thinking Democrats salute David Simms for showing us what asses ignorant people can make of themselves.

Eric Obermiller

As stated earlier, the Highland Echo is not in the habit of responding to letters to the editor. However, both of these letters address the paper and its staff directly, and therefore warrant a reply.

*The editorial, letter to the editor, and the reprint "The good news and bad news about campus religion" were all included in the December 13 issue of the Echo to address the same issue, the presence of the Knoxville Church on campus. The intent of the paper was to inform the students and administration of Maryville College that there is a group on campus that is operating opposite to some of the most important aims and goals of this institution—the tolerance of other races, religions, and ways of thinking, and the freedom of thought. The Knoxville Church is attempting to prey on the students of this institution and should not be allowed to continue to do so.*

*The goals of the Echo do not include converting the student body to Christianity, and none of the articles printed in issue 5, with the exception of the featured column, included either Christian theology or the idea that Christianity is superior to any other set of beliefs.*

"The best possible college . . ."

As a public service to the students of MC, the Echo is running a series of photographs of serious maintenance needs on campus. The way we look at it, part of your tuition goes to the up-keep of the college facilities, and the facilities are not being kept up—so where is your money going . . .

To the left, we have the Anderson bell tower, the symbol of our college. The paint is peeling, and slats are missing, and have been for quite some time.

On the right, columns on campus add to the charm and dignity of the college—it is truly a shame that they are falling apart. This particular column is located on the front porch of Pearsons Hall.

"Parting is such sweet sorrow"—

two years, he has been teaching wine classes at MC. In these classes, he teaches about the different classes of wine, different types, marriages between wine and food, how to rate wine, the process of using grapes, and drinking and moderation. He has even put together a manual that is used as a textbook for the classes.

He not only appreciates wine, but collects it as a hobby. So far, Collins has collected around 115 bottles of wine that he stores in his own personal wine cellar. He does end up drinking most of them, but after he does, he writes down his personal reactions to that particular wine. His most prized possession is a 3-liter bottle of Robert Mondavi Cabernet Sauvignon 1978 which was rated a 90 by "Wine Spectator." This is also Collins' favorite wine.

Collins hopes that working for Lipman Brothers can get him a foot in the door and that someday he can own wine distributing company.

For Collins, leaving MC was a difficult decision, especially leaving the students and staff. "The students have been great," Collins said. "I've gotten a lot of cards. I was trying to be more than just a food service director. I wanted to take care of what they wanted for food, but I also had a lot of students come up to me about personal problems and things."

Collins continued, "It's been like a family watching kids come in as a freshman class and growing, graduating. I've enjoyed it. It's just time for me to try some thing else right now."

Marriott continued from p. 1

mixer that dates back to 1905, and it is not in the best working condition. The other major cooking machinery, which is not quite as old, doesn't work properly. For example: of the six ovens that the school owns, four of them do not cook food evenly, and the other two are considerably small. Last year, all six of the ovens were completely inoperable because of an electrical problem. The college also owns two grills, but only one of these works. This is the reason why Marriott is unable to cook omelets until ten; they need the grill to cook for lunch.

Another problem for Marriott is the freezers. Above one of the freezers there is a leak that comes in from the roof and eventually drips into the freezer and on to the food. In another freezer the ceiling is falling apart. Even though part of the money students pay for meals is used for these types of problems, the college has failed to repair or replace the equipment.

These type of problems seem to be weighing down the possibility of good service from Marriott, and the relationship between the management of Marriott and the management of the physical plant does not seem to be helping matters. The physical plant staff has a large job. They must keep the students, the faculty, and the visitors happy by keeping the college in working order. They are the ones who fix light bulbs, toilets, and all of the other small problems around the dorm. They are also responsible for the maintenance of Marriott. Andy McCall, director of the physical plant, says that "Marriott is one of our top priorities."

Marriott has a multiplicity of mechanical problems, and most of them are not the easiest problems to fix. For example: when students are forced to eat with paper plates and plastic utensils it is because the washing machines are broken. Maintenance has to assess the problem, obtain the parts, and fix the glitch. Yet somewhere along the bureaucratic paper trail there is no communication between Marriott and the physical plant, and the repair of the equipment is delayed. Both Collins and McCall refused to comment on the situation.

It is very difficult for any service that is responsible for satisfying a large mass of people to succeed in pleasing each and every one of their customers, but the Marriott staff is doing the best they can. There are a multitude of tasks that lie behind those food lines students walk through every day, and the Marriott staff does its best to please every student that stands in those lines. One student wants less meat and more vegetables, and another student wants less vegetables and more meat. Marriott is blamed when these demands are not met.

Collins stated "If I could change one thing about Marriott it would be that all of the students would give positive feedback about the problems they see, and when they wanted something changed or added they wouldn't be afraid to ask." With a combined effort of Maryville College, the Physical Plant, Marriott, and most importantly, the students, there could be a drastic change in the quality of Marriott service.

MC Crime Log: Picard kidnapped from Pearsons

by Sarah West
Campus Politics Editor

• August 31, 1994—Student "A" bought alcohol for four minors. The City Police caught Student "A" and notified Maryville College. All students are on probation.

• September 18, 1994—A student's room in Carnegie Hall was searched for marijuana. Although none was found, there was paraphernalia and a lingering scent of incense. This was turned over to Student Development.

• October 17, 1994—A vehicle was damaged by a foul baseball.

• October 18, 1994—A credit card was stolen and never recovered.

• October 23, 1994—A wallet was reported stolen, but it was later recovered. The wallet was then determined to have only been missing.

• November 2, 1994—A student reported theft of personal items, such as keys, wallet with $125, and identification cards, which were located in the Gym of the Cooper P.E. Building. The actual theft took place on October 30.

• November 11, 1994—A book bag left on the pavement near Carnegie Hall was reported stolen.

• November 12, 1994—Beer was confiscated in a room in Carnegie Hall.

• December 6, 1994—Pearson's dining hall reported the theft of the cardboard Star Trek model of Captain Picard from the kitchen area. The Kellogg's property costs $30 and was believed to be taken between 5:00 p.m. and 6:30 p.m. through the side exit.

• December 9, 1994—Suicide attempt.

• January 15, 1995—Davis Hall was vandalized by Student "A," who was arrested. Outcome has not been decided.

Scholarships available for returning students

by Claire Stancampiano
Staff Writer

There is $200,000 available to increase the level of grants and scholarships for returning students, 85% of which receive financial aid. The following information is to help students improve their financial aid award for 1995-1996. It is important to remember that all students wanting to receive a scholarship, grant, loan, or college work/study must file either the Renewal Application for Federal Student Aid or the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA). The following scholarships and grants are being offered:

- Presidential Scholarships provide full tuition each year up to four years. The requirements include three semesters or 45 hours completed at Maryville College with a cumulative grade point average of 3.50. Application guidelines available in the Financial Aid Office. Deadline: Feb. 28

- Dean's Scholarships have requirements similar to the Presidential Scholars and provide half tuition up to four years. Deadline: Feb. 28

- Bradford Scholarships are based upon a good academic standing and willingness to participate in training and weekly tutorial sessions in Blount County's adult literacy program. Certain current scholarship students are ineligible. Application guidelines and scholarship requirements available in the Financial Aid office.

Deadline: March 27

- The Senior Leadership grant requires senior standing and demonstrated leadership. Students will receive a $1,000 room grant. Students who already receive full tuition grants or scholarships are not eligible. Application guidelines available at Student Development and Financial Aid Offices. Deadline: March 10

- The Academic Achievement Award is for current full time students who have achieved cumulative grade point average of 2.75 or better who are not currently recipients of a Maryville College, Dean's, Presidential, or other full-tuition scholarship. Awards range from $500 to $1,000.

- The Tennessee State Assistance Award goes to Tennessee residents who qualify on the basis of need as determined on the FAFSA. Deadline: Feb. 15

- The Maryville College Grant is a need-based grant awarded upon receipt of the FAFSA. The award can be up to $6,000. Deadline: Feb. 15

- Pell Grants are federally funded and are received by students who demonstrate exceptional financial need. U.S. citizens or permanent residents are eligible. Amounts ranged this year from $400 to $2,300. According to Financial Aid Director, Venita Jones, "We look at every possible source for aid when we package a student. The earlier they file their FAFSA the greater chance they have for a better award."

"Umm, excuse me..."

Susan Kopetz, Australian delegate to the Environmental Committee, waits to be recognized by the chair. Kopetz, of Chattanooga, was one of many high school students who participated in the Model United Nations organized and staffed by the January term MUN class, taught by Dr. Young-Bae Kim.

Model UN held on campus—celebrates tenth anniversary

by Dara DiGiacomo
Staff Writer

On Jan. 25, 289 students representing 23 high schools from as close as Maryville and as far away as Chattanooga came to Maryville College for the Tenth Annual Model United Nations.

Their purpose in coming here was to learn about diplomacy, foreign policy and world politics while posing as an actual delegate to any one of the seven standing committees to the United Nations.

By the time they left on Jan. 27, the students had spent thirteen hours in committee meetings debating various topics and an additional six hours on Friday debating the resolutions presented by each committee.

This event has occurred here at Maryville for the past ten years, under the direction of Dr. Young-Bae Kim. To hold an event such as this requires months of preparation. Each year, the students who are chosen to lead the conference begin preparations in September, starting with a mailing to schools all over Tennessee and Northern Georgia.

In January, during the Model United Nations Security Council class, also taught by Kim, college students get an opportunity to see what the high school students experience. During the course of this experiential class, students are assigned a country on the first day. Students must prepare a short presentation, explaining their country's position on trade, who their trading partners are, what the main export and imports are, the type of government, and other things which indicate how the country should act.

Then each student writes a resolution asking for action by the United Nations, and the debate begins. However, during the class, students only have two issues to debate, whereas the high school students debate a minimum of four issues per committee.

The amount of preparation for a high school student varies from student to student.

"Advisors from various schools commented that this year's conference was very well-run," said Brad Thomas, Secretary General of the Model United Nations.

Maryville College offers $10,000 in scholarship moneys to participating delegates who choose to attend the college. The student voted best overall delegate is awarded $3,500 every year for four years at MC. This year Jonathan Fallin, a senior at the Chattanooga School for the Arts and Sciences was named Best Overall Delegate. Fallin represented Great Britain in the Security Council.

Men back in win column, look for strong finish

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

Now standing at 12-4, the Maryville College Men's Basketball team ended one winning streak and has since started another. The teams 10 game winning streak ended on Jan. 14 at Knoxville College. The Scots then lost two close games to Greensboro College at Greensboro, NC and then at home to Covenant College.

On Jan. 19 the Scots faced the Covenant Scots. The visitors stole one by escaping with a 69-65 win.

Maryville led for most of the first half until Covenant's Joel Lawrence made a three-pointer to tie the score at 25-25 with 5:27 left to go in the half. This sparked a 10-2 run that led Covenant to a 32-35 half-time lead.

The second half saw both teams battle back and forth. Maryville came out and tied the score at 39-39 with 18:51 to go in the game on a monster dunk by Dee Bell.

This propelled the home Scots to a 16-6 run that gave them the lead with 11:32 to go in the game.

Covenant answered right back and again captured the lead at 57-56 with 4:23 to go.

From then on the game was wire to wire until the Covenant's Nathan Unruh stole the ball and scored on the other end to make it 64-62 visitors with 1:17 remaining.

Unruh lead Covenant with 15, 13 of them coming in the second half. John Robinette lead Maryville with 18 points. That game was the last of three losses as the Scots raced back into the win column with back to back wins over Emory & Henry on the road at Emory, VA on Jan. 22 by a score of 90-76, and then on Jan. 25 at home against Sewanee by the final of 91-77.

Against Sewanee, the Scots jumped out to a commanding 13-5 lead five minutes into the game and never looked back.

The Scots were up 19-9 when Bell stole the ball and took it in for the score. Scott McDaniel decided to follow Bell's act when he stole the ball and took it in for another score. Robinette followed this with a deep three-pointer from the corner to make it 28-16 Maryville with 7:42 left in the half.

At the half it was all Maryville by the score of 42-30.

The second half was much of the same as Sewanee couldn't cut into the lead that grew to as many as 16 with seven minutes to go in the half.

Bell led four Scots in double figures with 16. Jeremy Burgess, Robinette, and Pennington had 15, 14, and 12 respectively.

In some early action by the Scots, the home crowd saw their team go over the century mark when they defeated Stillman College 108-92 on Jan. 11.

The first half saw Maryville dominate until Stillman went on a 14-2 run to close the half and pull within seven at the half, 52-45.

Maryville took over in the second half and was up by as many as 22 with seven minutes to go. Robinette led the Scots with 22.

In a double header with the Lady Scots on Jan. 28, the men also came out victorious, but it was a battle to the end.

Maryville seemed in control for much of the first half and on into the second. In the first half the Ferrum coach lasted all of 19 minutes as he was ejected after his second technical foul. Much of the concern for the coach may have been caused by Stan Pennington, who was unstoppable. At the end of the first 20 minutes the Scots were up 45-34 and Pennington already had 17 points.

"He shoots, he scores!"—

In the second half the visitors slowly battled back and tied the game at 51 all at the 14:55 mark. It was a close game the rest of the way. Ferrum again tied it at 73-73 with 3:21 to go and then took the lead for the first time since it was 2-0 in the early going. The basket by Albert Hobbs made it 75-73 Ferrum with just over two minutes remaining and the home team was in trouble.

It looked like Ferrum was going to come away with the win until Sammy Williams drove the lane and scored the basket with 7.2 seconds left. The Scots held the tie for the remaining time and the game headed into its first overtime.

In the first overtime Ferrum again took control. When River made three consecutive throws it looked ever worse for home team.

But Jeremy Burgess was no time in coming right back and making a clutch shot in the lane with a hand in his eye with only two seconds left.

The two teams headed to second overtime and it would be all Maryville the rest of the game.

Pennington started the game by making it 92-90. Scott Burgess then scored a clutch shot straight to make it 97-90 with 2:43 to go. The rest of the game was a free throw shooting contest and Maryville came out on top, 107-96 in an exciting two overtime affair.

The Scots play next at Bryn Mawr against King College.

The team's next home game will be Feb. 11 against Knoxville College.

Lady Scots at 16-3, brace for rest of season

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

Like the men's team, the Maryville College Lady Scots also saw their winning streak stopped and have since begun another one. The Lady Scots, 16-3, had won nine straight when they ran into Ripon College on Jan. 12 at home.

The first half saw both teams play evenly as the score was tied at 10-10 with 16:03 to go, 16-16 with 13:33 to go, and at 18 all with 11:52 left to go before the half.

Then Ripon out scored the Lady Scots 24-13 over the last 10 minutes to take a 42-33 half-time lead.

In the second half, the Lady Scots continued to cut into Ripon leads, but could not catch the visitors.

Ripon held leads of 9, 10, and 11 points for much of the game. The Lady Scots got as close as seven at 65-72 with just under three minutes to go, but they would get no closer.

The final score was 81-71 as the Lady Scots came up on the short end of the score for only the second time of the season.

The team was lead by Jamie Parrott with 23 and Lisa Campbell with 19.

Prior to this loss the Lady Scots won what was to be the final game of their winning streak at Milligan College on Jan. 9.

The team was all smiles after the game at Sly's Pizza after a hard fought road win of 76-73.

At the half Milligan lead 34-32. The second half would see much of the same at the game remained close throughout.

The Lady Scots took the lead on a few occasions, but it was always short-lived as Milligan stormed back time and time again.

Maryville was up 57-54 with 8:09 after Jama Cameron scored four straight points. The Lady Scots then took the lead for good on a Whitney Williamson three-pointer after a Maryville time out with 6:14 to go in the contest.

Cameron then sealed the game with a three-pointer with 1:19 to play as the clock ran down. At this point the Lady Scots were up 75-69.

The Lady Scots defeated Ferrum College on Jan. 16 and then dominated Sewanee on Jan. 18 before running into Tusculum on Jan. 21.

Earlier in the year the Lady Scots defeated the Tusculum Lady Pioneers by the final of 84-81.

The rematch turned out to be possibly the game of the year as a packed house turned out to see the two teams go to battle.

Neither team could take control, and even after Campbell scored 13 straight points over a nine minute span the game was still very much in doubt.

Tusculum seemed to have the advantage with three minutes to go leading by eight.

The Lady Scots came back and Tracy Spiers almost brought the house down when her three-pointer found the bottom of the net with time running down sending the game into overtime.

Shelly Johnson wrestles with a Ripon player for the ball. The Lady Scots lost 81-71.

Still tied after the first overtime, the teams tipped it up once more and when the clock ran out it was Tusculum escaping by the most narrow of margins, 87-85.

Parrott lead with 22 points and 10 rebounds, while Megan Casey added 15, including four three-pointers.

On Jan. 28 the Lady Scots defeated Ferrum college by a score of 88-78 at home.

The home dominated most of the game and found themselves up by seven at half.

In the second half, the Lady Scots were again able to build up leads of as many as 15 points, the last coming with 3:55 left to go in the game. Ferrum then proceeded to go on a 13-2 run and get within four points with just under a minute to go.

Cameron then sealed the game with a jump shot from the wing with 29 seconds to go, and then came away with a rebound at the other end to put the game away.

Parrott was unstoppable with 39 points, while Cameron added 11.

The team will be heading north this weekend to Berea College on Feb. 4 and then will face Thomas More College on Feb. 5 at Crestview Hills, KY. Both games are at 2 p.m.

The Lady Scots final home game will be Feb. 19 against Knoxville College at 2 p.m.

Reid makes all-american

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

In 1994, the Maryville College Men's Soccer team had many season highlights. An impressive 15-3-0 record topped the list, which almost landed the Scots a trip to the NCAA III Playoffs. Sophomore Chris Reid has now added to the list of highlights in a big way.

Reid, a native of Ft. Myers, FL, has been selected as an all-american. The talented second year player scored 17 goals and had eight assists.

During his freshman year, Reid set the stage for his outstanding sophomore season. In his opening campaign, Reid scored 15 goals while developing into a team leader. Reid could be counted on for a goal, and at one point during his freshman season it seemed that a game would never go by without him scoring one.

What also helps out Reid is the work that he does in the off-season.

"I play semi-pro ball in Iowa. I did it last year and will again this year. I am trying to get more involved and become more of a leader on the team," he said.

As far as his future plans, they seem rather straightforward. Although being an all-american again would be nice, he said that his one main goal for next year, and for the years to come, would be to win a National Championship.

Reid thinks that one of the greatest things about the team is the way that they get along. Since many of his current teammates will return next year, Reid's goal of winning a National Championship may yet be met.

Bowling for dollars

On Feb. 25, from 9 am to 5 pm, Maryville College students, staff, and faculty are invited to come to Crest Lanes to help raise money for the BB/BS annual fundraiser, Bowl For Kids' Sake.

Bowl For Kids' Sake is a major fundraiser for BB/BS, raising over two-thirds of the agency's entire budget. Thousands of bowlers from across the country bowl in the month of February to benefit their local BB/BS agency.

Last year, MC students, staff, and faculty raised over $600. This year's campus goal is $1,000.

All student and campus organizations are invited to participate by finding sponsors and coming out to bowl a free game on BB/BS.

Everyone raising $75 or more will receive a free t-shirt. There will also be door prizes as well as major prizes for bowlers who get the most pledges.

Students can pick up sponsor sheets at all area banks and certain locations on campus.

BB/BS of TN Valley provides goal-oriented companionship to children who have suffered family loss of disruption. Besides a one-to-one friendship, volunteers can get involved by becoming a mentor to a child in a group or in an educational setting.

For more information about the program and Bowl For Kids' Sake, call Alison Frost at 983-6713.

Mark Twain once said, "Travel is fatal to prejudice, bigotry and narrow-mindedness - all foes to real understanding."

Applications for study abroad for fall semester 1995 are being accepted by Maryville College's International Programming Committee.

"We (the Maryville College Community) firmly believe in study and work abroad...it's an important and valuable experience," said Dr. Clarice Doucette, chairperson for the International Programming Committee. "Students need to be aware that it takes advanced planning," she added.

The general criteria for participating in the program are junior or senior standing at the time of participation, an overall GPA of 3.0 or higher, and successful completion of an application and interview process. In some instances there is also a language requirement.

Students are asked to complete an application containing general background information and to write an essay which includes a brief personal history, travel experience, and reasons for wanting to participate in the program. After the application process, the student must be interviewed by the committee. According to Doucette, the interview usually lasts approximately 15 to 20 minutes and consists of a discussion of the student's interests and preparations.

The committee is comprised of three faculty members and one student. Faculty members of the committee for this year are Doucette, Dr. Lori Schmeid, and Dr. Young-Bae Kim. The student member is Nadia Edoh.

In addition, students are asked to write a "re-entry essay" upon their return so that they "can share in an informal way what they learned from the experience," said Doucette.

There are four programs available to students who wish to study or work abroad. The first is through direct exchange with Maryville College and universities in Korea, Puerto Rico, Japan, and Great Britain. A student pays tuition to MC and receives a financial aid package just as he or she would for a regular semester. Room and board fees vary according to the particular institution. Travel and personal expenses are the students' responsibility.

Students may also participate in the study abroad program from Alma College, Michigan. In this program, students may travel to Spain, Mexico, or Germany. They are responsible for tuition costs that exceed the amount of MC tuition. Financial aid is usually available in this situation.

A third option to students is to participate in some other program. However, these students will not maintain status as an MC student while abroad and will not be eligible for MC financial aid. Also, the credits earned while abroad will not automatically transfer to MC.

For students who would prefer to work abroad rather than study, the International Cooperative Education Program is available. The program places a student in a summer job in Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, France, Finland, or Singapore. Work permits and housing are secured by the coordinator. There is a four hundred dollar fee plus airfare expenses.

"Students always come back with a greater understanding of themselves, their own culture, and the culture in which they lived," said Doucette.

For more information or to apply, contact Doucette in Anderson Hall, room 213, or call extension 8242.

Best Buddies added to list of service organizations on campus

by Amy Trent
Staff Writer

Best Buddies is an international volunteer organization that's mission "is to provide opportunities for college students and persons with mental retardation to become friends."

Best Buddies began as a national non-profit organization in 1989 with Anthony Kennedy Shriver as its first president.

This year Best Buddies begins once again on the Maryville College campus after approximately a two year absence.

Laurie Cribb, the College Buddy Director, and Stephen Nickle, faculty advisor, work in cooperation with Diane Beasley, the coordinator of Douglas Cooperative Incorporated, an establishment dedicated to providing services to disabled persons in Blount County and several surrounding counties. Douglas Cooperative is the host site that assists the college Buddy Director in pairing up students with a buddy.

Once a student is teamed with a buddy, the student has several responsibilities. "Students must visit their buddies at least twice a month and have some sort of other contact at least once a week, such as a phone call or a letter," said Cribb.

This contact is important and necessary for a successful friendship to take place. According to Cribb, "All the buddies and the students meet together twice a semester for group activities." Students continue this contact with the same buddy for a school year.

"It takes a very committed person to be a Best Buddy. Not only does it involve a lot of time but also patience and caring," said Cribb. "One of my goals and hopeful outcomes of being involved with Best Buddies is to heighten public awareness of mental disabilities, and to break the barriers disabled persons face every day, such as being considered worthless or stupid."

Cribb continued, "Each of our buddies are very functional and very necessary and deserve more respect. We've got to work together to prove to society there is mutual worth in all human beings."

There are many benefits to being involved in Best Buddies. Not only does one gain a friend for life, but skills such as leadership and social skills are enhanced. Both parties experience an increase in self confidence. Best Buddies also assists the community in realizing that all persons deserve to be treated equally.

Although the deadline for joining Best Buddies has passed, Cribb encourages all who are interested to come by and listen and participate in the meetings and "rap sessions."

"Listening in on our rap-sessions is the best way to learn about Best Buddies and how it works. You also get to hear others discuss their experiences with their buddy," she said. Cribb is also hoping to bring a speaker to the campus for discussion of Best Buddies or mental retardation.

Since the program exists on money from fun raisers and grants, students and faculty at Maryville College may be seeing some Best Buddies merchandise for sale.

The group will be holding an organizational meeting on Feb. 6 at 7 p. m. in the Center for Campus Ministry. All are invited to attend.

If you have any questions or comments regarding Best Buddies, please feel free to contact Cribb at 681-2242 or box 2349.

Additions made to MC family tree

by Christie Stalans
and Claire Stancampiano
Staff Writers

With Maryville College's population being equivalent to that of a remote Venezuelan village, the births of two new members is quite a significant event. The new babies were born to Catherine and Rev. Stephen Nickle and Dr. Amy Livingstone of the history department and her husband Gordon Thompson.

Zachary Oliver Morell Nickle was born on Jan. 10 at St. Mary's Hospital in Knoxville. The baby weighed 8 lbs and 15 oz. and was 21.5 inches in length. According to Rev. Nickle, "He has a lot of black hair." The name consists of Oliver, a family name, and Morell which is Catherine's maiden name.

The Nickles also have two young children, Christopher and Abigail, who are "very excited about him specifically," according to their father. When asked about future hopes for the new baby Rev. Nickle replied, "I hope this child grows to be a healthy and discerning human being."

As for the Livingstone-Thompson baby, he arrived on Jan. 23 at 12:45 pm. Samuel Southworth Thompson was born at Fort Sander's Medical Center in Knoxville. The new baby weighed 9 lbs. and 4 oz. and was 21 inches in length. Livingstone was unavailable for comment. However, Dr. Sally McNeill, also of the history department, explained that "The baby had had a slight infection, but they have diagnosed him and are treating him at the hospital." She added, "It's nothing serious."

Congratulations to both families for having the first babies to extend the MC family tree in 1995.

MC theatre plans spring season

by Sarah Stevenson
Assistant Editor

The Maryville College Theatre spring season is about to begin. A few changes have been made in the schedule, but planning is under-way.

"Things came up that we couldn't foresee," Dr. Jill Bergeron said when asked about the changes.

"This schedule was planned last April," she continued. "Things change. The important thing is that there will be productions for the public to see on the dates we scheduled. They'll just be different shows."

Auditions for the spring mainstage production, "Look Homeward, Angel," will be Feb. 1 and 2 at 7 p. m. in the theatre. The show will be under the direction of Bergeron. The dates of performance of the play have been changed to March 9, 10, and 11 at 8 p. m. in the theatre.

Auditions for the Alpha Psi

Omega production, "Bury the Dead," have been moved to March 13 and 14 at 7 p. m. in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall. The play will be directed by Senior Brian Prather. Production dates of this show will be April 27, 28, and 29 at 8 p. m. in the theatre.

"Dr. Bergeron and I are putting great faith in Maryville College because both plays require pretty large casts," Prather admitted.

He continued, "If anyone is interested or has thought about auditioning, this season is the time."

Auditions for the Readers Theatre Festival will be April 2 at 2 p. m. in the Fine Arts Center Music Hall. The production date for the Festival is May 11 at 8 p. m.

The public and MC alumni as well as students, staff and faculty are invited to audition for any production, Bergeron said.

"There is so much opportunity for involvement," Prather said.

The reception for theatre alumni has been moved to next fall. It will be a part of the 100th anniversary of the theatre.

Any questions regarding any of this information are to be directed to Bergeron, x8161.

Commemorative MC class ring commissioned for 175th anniversary

In honor of its 175th anniversary, Maryville College has established an official class ring symbolic of the college and its heritage. The ring is sponsored by the Maryville College bookstore in cooperation with the alumni office and parents programs.

The newly commissioned class ring was offered for the first time in early December to students who had achieved junior or senior standing. It features a copyrighted design of the Anderson Hall tower and the college's founding date of 1819 in solid gold.

According to Beth Stuart, manager of the MC bookstore, "The historical significance of the 175th anniversary of Maryville College renewed interest on campus in establishing the tradition of a distinctive class ring that would be truly distinguishing to Maryville." Stuart continued, "The official ring will be available only on a limited date each semester. While we still plan to have the standard customized rings available as an alternative, the students' reaction to the initial offer of the official ring in December was overwhelming."

Elton Jones to replace Burkey

by Kenyon Evans
Staff Writer

After working for ALCOA for 28 the past 28 years, Elton Jones retired from his position as the ALCOA Tennessee Operations public relations manager.

Less than a month into his retirement—he 'unretired.' Jones accepted an appointment as Maryville College's vice president for College Advancement. He will be filling the position left by Dr. Fred Burkey's resignation last semester.

Jones' new position deals primarily with fund-raising and public relations. this is his first position working in higher education, but he has worked for MC in many areas on a volunteer basis for several years.

What he lacks in experience in working for higher education seems to be more than made up for in his enthusiasm and experience in the business world. "I am grateful for the opportunity and excited about joining a great group of folks on the advancement staff of an institution that I care a great deal about," Jones commented.

A long list of accomplishments accompanies Elton Jones. He has been heavily involved with the Maryville community, having served as president of: Blount County Chamber of Commerce, Blount County United Way, the Knoxville Opera, and the University of Tennessee Theatre Advisory Board. He has also been involved with fund-raising efforts for the Blount County Public Library, the Martin Luther King Jr. Community Center, and the United Way. For MC he has served Maryville College was blanketed with snow this past week, causing Dean Bolden and Alden Stuart to open the college at 10 a.m. instead of the usual 8 a.m. on February 8, and February 10. The forecast for the rest of this week predicts highs in the upper 50's and lows in the 40's with a chance of showers.

Resident Assistants—staff and student wrapped into one

by Josh Goocey
Staff Writer

The Resident Assistant position is one that requires a love for students and a willingness to hold a demanding leadership position that renders very little monetary compensation, and sometimes very little personal satisfaction. They are the people we go to when we are having personal problems, or when we need maintenance repairs in our room, and when there is a disturbance on our floor.

RAs are forced to "turn their friends in," and most of the time it is not a pleasant experience and leads to tension between them and their friends. Dave Golden, a sophomore Gamble RA commented, "I hate writing my friends up, and I wish that they would have enough respect for me to avoid placing me in such a situation." There is a vast amount of responsibility that is placed on the RA's shoulders. Their job is never complete. That is to say that they are on duty twenty-four hours a day, and there must be at least one RA available at all times. Some of the duties required of the RA are: they must be on duty a certain number of nights a week; while on duty they must make a certain number of rounds in the dorm so that the dorm will remain quiet and orderly; and if there is a disturbance they are immediately sent to solve the problem. But these are the routine facets of the job. They are required, by their job description, and much to their dissatisfaction, to write their friends up; they must uphold a level of respectable integrity among the students, faculty, and the Maryville community; they must prove themselves as persons of leadership and responsibility. Mike Lewis, the Senior RA for Gamble Hall, says that "there is more stress in the job than is accounted for." David Forster, the SRA of Copeland, claims that "the responsibilities are sometimes overwhelming." On top of their responsibilities they are required to attend a specified number of training sessions each semester. The training sessions range from First Aid and CPR to stress management. And, if that is not enough, they have their classes to study for.

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial . . . Editorial

Poverty, crime, racism, and violence—all of these social ills can be overcome by education.

These are also things that our governmental representatives have pledged to eliminate.

Education may not be the sole solution to these problems, but it is a key solution.

Politicians pay lip-service to the American people—confirming the importance of education and pledging to be benefactors of the cause.

Then they decide to cut federal financial aid to students.

The new Republican Congress ("Republican Revolutionaries" as a "Time" columnist referred to them as) is attempting to balance the federal budget by cutting unnecessary expenditures, such as education. During the 1993-94 fiscal year, the United States Government expended $31 billion in federal financial aid.

The Republicans in Congress are proposing a $20 billion cut over the next five years.

Assuming a planned cut means no increases, that leaves approximately $11 billion in federal aid available to undergraduate and graduate students seeking government loans and other forms of assistance.

This means that black, white, male, female, and other students alike are going to be left out in the cold.

Currently the federal government provides 75 percent of the financial aid received by students in the United States.

Here at Maryville College, 85 percent of the students count on one form of financial aid or another to attend school.

Cutting federal student aid is sure to deprive countless Americans of the opportunity to pursue post-secondary education.

Without financial aid, children will be denied the opportunity to escape the American economic caste system.

Whatever happened to the great American dream? The land of opportunity? Have we given up on equality and equal opportunity? Is America becoming the land of inopportunity, where higher education is a luxury of the wealthy?

If federal aid to students is cut, then we may very well be heading in that direction.

If the government wants to cut the budget responsibly, then cut defense spending, cut federal jobs—close down the Department of Education, and put the money directly into the schools.

Take the pensions from the politicians, and in doing so topple the career politician!

Do whatever is necessary, but do not sentence the United States to ignorance. Reckless cuts, without any thought of what the future might bring, will lead our nation into dire straits.

Some of the smaller, private colleges may not be able to remain in operation if such drastic cuts are made.

Education should be our top priority, we should be pumping money into education at every level!

How can we expect to compete in the "Global Economy" if we are an uneducated society?

Economically speaking, college graduates earn more money, are more likely to be employed, possess more financial resources, and, as a result, depend less on the taxpayer's dollars to support them.

Fewer college graduates depend on welfare or health care.

Cutting federal aid to students cannot be accepted by the American people.

The National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities has begun a drive to express to members of Congress that these cuts are unacceptable.

Recently the members of the newspaper staff were asked to write a little blurb about whatever January Term class they had taken. I deferred initially, thinking it was not something I would really like to discuss in this format. I suppose the main reason I was reluctant—well, not really reluctant, but unsure—was that the sheer volume of information and experience available from the class I took paralyzed my thoughts on the subject. Now, though, I have my journal at my disposal and I will share some impressions of my J-term class, "Fabled India," taught by Dr. Robert Bonham.

Two experiences in particular have carved a permanent place for themselves in my mind. During the month, we all went to a service at the local Hindu Community Center which houses a temple and a meeting hall for the many Hindu Indians of the area. At this point it may be good to point out that not all Indians are Hindu. Many are Muslim, many adhere to Jainism—practicers of extreme non-violence—and still others are Christians. I borrow directly from my journal in describing the temple; otherwise I could not properly describe my initial impression.

Leaving our shoes at the door, we walked through a narrow hallway with a concrete floor and into the temple area itself. The carpeting was spongy and thick, and the back part of the room was decorated with designs reminiscent of Persian rugs or flying carpets on old cartoons.

The front part was a solid color, the name of which I do not know, with a green stripe separating the area into two halves. The front of the temple was dominated by statues that I presume represent the different manifestations of the god Vishnu, who is a member of the Hindu trinity—Brahman, Vishnu, and Shiva—and himself only one manifestation of the one true God. All the statues were dressed richly in gold ornamentation, not unlike statues of saints in a Christian church. In front of this scene was a small patch of white cloth which seemed to be a sort of small altar area. A picture of a god, possibly Vishnu or one of his manifestations, sat on this patch with a plate of offerings before it.

The ceremony was one of beautiful simplicity. The congregation or community sang many chants in Sanskrit that left the impression that each singer was born just for that offering of creativity. The chants were followed by everyone rising to make offerings.

An even deeper imprint was left in my memory by my personal contact with a Hindu in the East Tennessee community. The experience I had in this encounter was worth the entire class. He is probably fifty years old and had been in the U.S. since the age of 23. I'll now touch briefly on some things we discussed in regard to the Hindu religion.

Hinduism, first of all, is more a way of life than a formal religion as we know it (in this man's experience). I commented that it seemed to be rather easy for someone coming from a western and Christian background to look at Hinduism and call it a pagan religion given to worshipping elephant-headed gods and strange apparitions. This, on the surface, seems to be the case. (Recall the statues at the temple.) He replied that a deeper look at Hinduism reveals that the basic tenets of the religion proclaim one true God in the form of a Trinity, which is in many ways like Christianity. His reply to the abundance of gods or images thereof is that people approach religious practice in different ways, some through philosophy, others through objects of devotion, and still others through mythology.

He said, though, that all these approaches to religion have the same goal in mind. For instance, a scientist who may characterize him or herself as an atheist is still searching for Truth. For him, the words of Jesus state the whole point to religion: "Love your neighbor as yourself."

It has been a hellish three weeks for the dynamic duo. With school beginning and the movie industries taking a winter nap, it has been hard to find that one movie that will put a tear in your eye, or make chills run down your spine. However, we will never let our movie-goers down. Consider us the mailmen of movie viewers. It does not matter if there is rain, sleet, snow, homework, bad seats, because the reviewing must go on. Now take a seat and allow us to take you through murders, legends, immorality, demons, and madness.

"Murder in the First" is as cold as its name. Kevin Bacon, Christian Slater, and Gary Oldman bring the story of the pain and the suffering of the most dreaded prison to life - Alcatraz. Slater plays a Tom Cruise wanna-be young lawyer whose first case is one that could not possibly be won. Until...

Bo: "I have to say that overall this movie was incredible, however as I walked out of the theater I felt like it was missing something. Then I realized that it was missing only one thing. A happy ending."

Chris: "Well let us all just have a moment of silence for poor old Bo because he did not get his love story with a happy ending. Try Cinderella aisle two. This movie had it all, except maybe what Bo was looking for, and I liked it. Slater and Bacon did a great job, and Oldman was his usual unlikable self."

In a person's lifetime not many movies come along that are a must see: "Gone With the Wind," "Jaws," "Wizard of Oz," "Star Wars," and "Legends of the Fall" are exceptions.

Chris: "Well, gee Bo, those are some classics and I would surely put "Legends of the Fall" in that class. Not! Are you kidding me? The only thing that this movie did was touch a few different emotions. If you have some time to kill go see it."

Bo: "My partner's views should be ignored, due to the surroundings he watched this film under. He watched "Legends" in the dreaded

"not many movies come along that are a must see"

Foothills Cinema, and if my memory is not mistaken, he has not liked one movie that he has watched there. I myself saw it there and it almost brought tears to my eyes. This movie brings the definition of climax to the big screen, with not one, but five heart-stopping turns, of events."

Chris: "Would somebody get Bo a tissue? And Bo, are you saying that I sat through the whole movie and missed five climaxes?"

Imagine the horror that could occur if Stephen King's novels came to life. This idea is brought to us by John Carpenter, the creator of "Halloween." His movie, "In the Mouth of Madness" brings Sam Neil ("Jurassic Park") to his begging knees.

Bo: "Insanity is the majority and sanity is the minority. However, it does not take someone crazy to enjoy this psycho-horror film. I watched it with one eye open and one arm around Chris!"

Chris: "It was his other arm that I was worried about! It was rather scary and it will keep you jumping. If nothing else it will make you check bikers twice the next time you drive by one. Go see it."

The battle of the immortals continues in "Highlanders: The Final Dimension." Christopher Lambert is teamed up against Mario Van Peebles in the final battle.

Bo: "Well, at least Chris is honest, and that is why I put up with him. As for the movie itself, it didn't leave much for the imagination, and not much for thought."

However, if you liked the first Highlander, you will enjoy the last journey of Conner MacLeod."

Hold on to your socks and shoes because February has just started and the movie industry has been given a shot of life with new films with old names. Sean Connery in "Just Cause" and Sharon Stone in "The Quick and the Dead" will light up the screen. Stone in spurs? As if she needs them.

However, let's not forget about a story of a lovely lady, who was bringing up three lovely girls. That is right, "The Brady Bunch" is coming to the silver screen, and people, lock your doors.

Until next time, we hope to see you at the movies...

Senate appropriates money to Echo, BSA

supported this move to improve the paper.

The Black Student Association hosted a Black Alumni weekend and needed funds for the BSA ball and pageant on February 11 and 12. Once again the senate voted nearly unanimously to allocate $500 to the BSA budget to help pay for these events.

In my last column I referred to the visitation policy being revised in Lloyd Hall and for Davis, Copeland, and Gamble Hall. There will be two committees formed to revise these policies and then bring them to the complete Senate to be passed or rejected.

The chairs for each of these committees are Robert Polstra (box 2183, ext 8354) and Josh Goocey (box 2187, ext 8632), respectively. Please notify them if you would like to be a part of that process.

Well, everyone knows that "Blister in the Sun" is coming soon and if there are any student groups that want to have a booth there notify Stephanie Fugate (box 2098, ext 8760) or Jeannine Quick (box 2469, ext 8775). Lets make this one even better than the last the last two.

Once again if there is anyone who is interested in running for senate offices, the Senate presidential election is in the middle of April and the rest of the positions are elected in later the month.

If you are even the slightest bit interested, RUN!

If there is anything that you feel is important and/or needs to be changed, please express your opinions to me or a member of senate. The senate does care for the well being of the campus but cannot make changes unless they know the problems.

Hey everybody,

Once again I am here to inform you about the happenings of student senate.

Our past meeting on February 9 yielded some important legislation that everyone should know about. Jeff Gary, and the Echo Staff asked for some money to beef up the paper and the publications office. The senate voted to allocate an additional $1,987 to Echo budget for color pictures and graphs, syndicated cartoons, and new equipment. This proposal passed nearly unanimously and the Senate clearly

As we all know, February is the month that is chosen to express love to those we care about. It is also the month chosen to celebrate the heritage of African-Americans. The campus does host a few events to celebrate the month, but they offer very little insight as to what the heritage and culture of African-Americans is really all about.

Many people feel that it's unfair to even have a Black History Month. To those people I say this: it is the shortest month of the year and who's to say that it might not be a learning experience for you, so grin and bear it.

I've always believed that in order to understand a person, you must understand where they come from. The John Singleton film "Higher Learning," a film that I suggest everyone go see, gave me great insight as to why some people do what they do. I don't know why some Caucasian people feel that they must degrade black people, but I do understand the motivation behind it. I don't know why so many black people blame their problems on white people, but I can understand their reasoning behind it. I'm not asking anyone to condone Black History Month, but I am asking you understand it.

I have a problem with the distrust of African-American people in America and on this campus. I can easily see why it occurs: When you only see black people being portrayed as criminals or buffoons on television, how can you think otherwise? We're seen as being either crazy or angry and that's about as real as a tuition increase NOT occurring in the '95-96 academic year.

To understand what I mean about distrust of African-Americans on this campus, let me tell you of some things that have happened to me while living here. My first semester as a freshman, I was coming from the Anderson Hall computer lab. It was a little after 9 p.m. and it was already dark. I looked up and notice a girl coming towards the lab on the same sidewalk that I was walking on. Instead of just passing by me, she took a 5-foot walk around me! I thought to myself "Boy you must really be getting fat!" Then I realized that it wasn't my size, but it was my skin that was intimidating her. I noticed as I walked away that she kept looking back at me as if she were making sure I wasn't following her. I'm a puppy! Everyone who knows me knows that my bark is definitely worse than my bite. I felt like running up behind her and chasing her around campus until security arrived. Speaking of security, do you know that I've been stopped on campus three times by the same officer, and asked if I were a student here? When I answered "yes" I was asked to show my student identification. I think it's kind of obvious that at 10:30 at night no one is going to be coming from a computer lab or the library and going into a residence hall unless they are a student, or a maniac.

You don't have to agree with anything that people do, but you can at least try to gain some insight as to why they do it. The girl went around me because she was afraid of me.

Security stopped me because everyone was parked in the right spot that night. So understand that Black History Month is a celebration of more than just history, but a reflection of a people and their continuing struggle to be equal. I advise everyone to learn to appreciate African-American culture, the real culture, not the crap on television. You can do this by celebrating with us and not being afraid that we will talk about you (Although some of us will, I won't). Don't be afraid to sit in "The Corner" of the cafeteria, I promise we won't run you away. We are all here to learn with each other and from each other, so instead of taking that 5-foot walk around us, walk with us and we can reach our destination together.

Until there is a shortage of Afro-Sheen "Ladies and Gentlemen... There it is!"

✦ Letter to the Editor...

To the Editor,

In the Feb. 1 issue of the Echo Alex Little wrote a letter in which he kept addressing David Sims. Since Mr. Little decided to write a letter to someone who graduated last semester and who has no way of knowing that he was addressed in an editorial in our school newspaper, I felt that it was my duty as President of the College Republicans to defend our fine friend, Mr. Sims.

First of all Mr. Little, you argue for big government, and it just does not make sense to me. Government serves a purpose and is needed in some areas, but too much government interference in someone's life is where the problem is. As our fine President Ronald Reagan once said, "It is not my intention to do away with government. It is rather to make it work — work with us, not over us — to stand by our side, not ride our back.

Secondly, I don't know if I can help on the NAFTA issue. I was in the minority within my party as I argued against NAFTA. I support most of what the Republicans believe, but I'm man enough to admit when they are wrong. NAFTA was initiated by Reagan and Bush and was passed by Clinton and Republican support in Congress. I hold both Clinton and all Congressmen who voted for it responsible.

Also, I am highly offended by your comment concerning Hillary Clinton. You said, "I think that it is a weak man who cannot swallow a woman breaking from her traditional role in an attempt to solve one of America's biggest problems." Health care has nothing to do with Hillary Clinton being a woman. It is her ideas that we disagree with. I don't care what gender someone is, if their ideas about health care are as warped as Hillary's, then I'm going to disagree with them. Why don't you quit trying to create gender warfare and argue about the ideas behind this issue? I'm proud to say that Alaska just became the first state to have women running the state legislature as Speakers of the House and Senate — both of them are Republicans. We are concerned about ideas, Mr. Little. We do not discriminate on the account of gender. I had hoped that yourself being an intelligent man, you would have been above this.

Also concerning health care: if it is true as you said, that health care is "one of America's biggest problems," then why did your president abandon the health care issue in his State of the Union address?

You also stated that Mr. Sims failed to mention how good Republicans have been for Tennessee families. I think I can handle this by asking you a question. If Democrats are so good for Tennessee and Republicans are so bad for Tennessee, then why did we just elect a Republican Governor, two Republican Senators, and five Republican Congressmen?

Mr. Little, I also have a message for you. Chris Noe is in Nashville, but nonetheless, he accepts your challenge of a forum. You name the place and time, and Mr. Noe will be there.

Letter to the Editor . . .

Dear Editor:

It is especially upsetting to me as a taxpayer and a politically educated citizen that such frivolous spending has been continually appropriated for such things as the liberal National Endowment for the Arts and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting when it does little public good for its cost. In response to Josh Hogan's column in the January issue of the Echo, I cite the following facts about Newt's common sense approach to redirecting badly needed dollars into truly helpful programs.

The relationship between the NEA and the CPB and the taxpayer has long been one of controversy. In fairness, both sides are guilty of hyperbole but I will tend to agree with the more logical argument of letting CPB be privatized. If these commodities are so valued, they will not close down. I must admit that I agree with Newt when he says, "I don't think that this government at this time has the moral authority to ask families to squeeze their family budget because the government refuses to squeeze its own budget." Because of such government spending, those youngsters who are having so much fun counting and singing with Big Bird now are the ones who will be financing these and other such programs for most of their tax paying lives.

I adamantly believe that the CPB and NEA must be taken off the government's dole and be privatized for the benefit of all. I ask you, do you feel it appropriate and morally just that a hard working, low to moderate income family, should be forced to pay for subsidizing such programs that actually are offensive and unproductive to them personally? In fact, these programs actually make huge profits, so why do they need such massive amounts of tax dollars to stay afloat when the CEO himself is a multi-millionaire; quite ironic, huh? As Newt says, "Big Bird makes money; Barney makes money. These are profit-making centers. They would survive fine. I understand why the elite wants the money (for public TV), but I think they ought to be honest. These are a bunch of rich, upper-class people who want their toy to play with."

I feel Newt again is right when he says, "All I'm suggesting is if you want the arts to survive with federal funding, you have to assure the average taxpayer that they are not going to have blasphemy and egregious obscenity forced down their throat that they're going to have to pay for."

Because a play or piece of art is liked, does not necessitate public subsidizing of such, which takes food from children's mouths, in my opinion (note the hyperbole to show the absurdity in such public funding).

To ask a family to bear the brunt of the cost for such things is a moral outrage to me!! However, the real facts should remain at the forefront of this debate—opportunity costs.

In stark contrast to Josh's comment about it not being necessary to end funding, I say that public broadcasting has been generously nurtured by the elitist liberals pushing their leftist propaganda by over $4 billion dollars in federal funds since 1968.

This has been hardly necessary or wise; think of the opportunity costs: public broadcasting expounding how great Johnson's "Great Society" is or $4 billion dollars in education? Other wise suggestions have been that the CPB should rewrite its agreements with program providers to collect more, or a share, of the huge profits from the franchising of successful children's shows, such as "Barney and Friends" and "Sesame Street."

So in conclusion, I am sure that Newt would be happy to see Public Television auctioning off pieces of equipment to pay the bills, especially when the CEO could fully subsidize CPB himself.

Letter to the Editor . . .

Dear Editor,

At the beginning of the year I received in my box a flier which had the dates for all the senior events. I eagerly penciled them in on my calendar.

A few weeks ago I received an invitation to the 100 Days Celebration. When I went to my calendar to write down the time and location, the date on the invitation was a week earlier than the date on the flier. How could this be? How could the 100 Days Celebration be moved?

I went to express my confusion to a friend of mine. It was told to her that the change in date was because the president had a "previous engagement." Upon counting the number of days from the 100 Days Celebration to graduation I discovered the original date (February 13) was scheduled for 97 days and the new date (February 6) was scheduled for 104 days.

Why, you may be asking, is this so important? The fact is that an annual event, such as 100 Days, can be planned a year in advance. Therefore, no other "engagement" should interfere causing a change in the date.

"The best possible college . . ."

"The best possible college" series continues. If you know of any maintenance needs on campus, please write in and let us know.

To the left we have the landing in the stairwell between the second and first floors of Fayerweather. The wall is water damaged from a leak that may originate on the unrenovated and unused third floor, or the water may come from the roof. Other areas of Fayerweather that show substantial signs of water damage include the Commuter Lounge and the Faculty Lounge, both on the second floor.

On the right we find another shining example of the beautiful columns on campus—this particular one happens to be a part of Thaw Hall, and also happens to have holes in the main section and the top area, and peeling paint. This seems to be representative of the condition of the columns on campus.

If I have to see one more glitter-haired, lip-pierced, drag queen who is confused about his (or her) sexuality because his mother left him in the family Ford Fiesta for too long when he was little, I am going to get in my car, drive to Chicago, and personally pummel Jerry Springer.

Network TV shows have sunk below scrounging for a topic. They've recruited a nationwide group of freaks with problems spanning far beyond the realm of ludicrousness.

The latest topics never provide enough material for an hour's worth of discourse, so the host usually resorts to having the freaks parade around in lingerie or get into fist fights with each other. I'm guessing that there are about 7.3 people across the country who actually identify with these problems being discussed and can get help through the talk show. Everyone else watches attentively so that they may rant and rave and gawk at the spectacle of weirdos arrayed on stage. These guests most likely have legitimate problems and are being exploited to the fullest extent permitted by the media.

Today's topic: inane talk shows, idiots who love them

I was apparently mistaken in my belief that this type of programming was designed to examine commonly occurring problems in society. What happened to the good old talk shows of the 80's when we complained about our parents beating us or talked about the latest self-help book entitled "Twelve Steps to a Better Me." Back then the guests threw chairs directly at Geraldo and not at each other. Those were the kinds of shows that usually led to a resolution for the guests, the audience, and the viewers.

Oprah Winfrey and Phil Donahue are the only two who seem to maintain some standard of dignity on their shows. However, the other day even Donahue had on a mall rat with teased hair and 100 pairs of shoes whining because her mother wouldn't buy her more. Whatever!

Not only are these talk shows exploitive, but they contribute heavily to the stereotypes of all races, homosexuals, both sexes, and southerners. I refuse to believe that our society has created an entire audience of people who are willing to sit and watch these shows seriously. Maybe these avid talk show fans are the same people who keep QVC in business.

I love reading the titles they give people at the bottom of the TV screen like, "Terri— says she was fired from Shop&Save because of excess facial hair." I am also amused by the questions they flash on the screen during the break in order to recruit more freaks. For example, "Hey! Is your neighbor an HIV positive vampire but you are afraid to confront them? You could be a guest!"

Sadly enough this multi-million dollar business is booming. It seems as if they will give any model-turned-actress with a moderate grasp of the English language a shot at her own show (I seriously doubt Rikki Lake has ever taken a journalism class). I only hope that Oprah and Phil can maintain their integrity in this environment.

For those of you who have cable, I suggest changing the channel (not to QVC or "Baywatch"). For the rest of us who only get 3.5 stations and are forced to endure these midday fiascos, I vote we either nap or watch PBS.

Letter to the Editor . . .

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the editorial that appeared in the Feb. 1 issue of the Echo. I would like to address in particular the comments made about the DRB and J-Board. While I am not currently serving in the campus judicial system, I was a member of the J-Board for the past two years and I believe that our judicial system works. The editorial voices a concern that the system is "too soft on those individuals committing infractions," in contrast to the "strict guidelines" given by the MC Handbook. Any incident reports are first given a blind review by the DRB. If the sanctions for the violation are clear, the DRB delivers them and no further action is necessary. This is the route taken by the majority of cases. If, however, the DRB feels the case needs further review, it is referred to the J-Board. While I was a member on this board, I heard probably six or seven cases, and I do not feel that any sanctions we delivered were at all lenient. Of course we did our best to be fair, but all the members I served with took very seriously their responsibility of actively discouraging repeat offenses. I am confident that any member of the J-Board, past or present, would be more than happy to "be held accountable for its decisions." In the judicial process here, those who violate the rules and are caught receive either those sanctions set out by the handbook or those handed down by the J-Board. Perhaps some of the sanctions seem to be a mere slap on the wrist, but these penalties were decided upon under the assumption that the first incident report represents the first time a student has broken a given rule. Those of us who live in dorms realize that this is probably not true, that it is pretty difficult to get written up. RA's don't want to write anybody up, and maybe this is the place where leniency in the system is introduced. I'm not saying that RA's should want to get their neighbors and friends in trouble, or that they should go around listening at doors for signs of a party where alcohol might be involved. I am saying that the judicial system here is a good one, and that anyone deciding to take an RA position thinking that it is all about authority and a single room, should probably rethink this decision.

MC gains 38 students, loses 85

by Claire Stancampiano
Staff Writer

Hundreds of students filter through the ranks of Maryville College each year. For the spring semester of 1995, MC has gained 38 new students and tentatively lost between 85 and 90.

The issue of retention has been one of some concern among faculty, staff, and students. According to Registrar Martha Hess, there are several reasons why approximately 85-90 people have left.

She began by explaining that "a chunk of those people, about 16, have graduated." Hess continued by saying that besides graduation, occurrences such as "deciding on a major unavailable at Maryville" contribute to those numbers.

Some students who receive low grades discuss with their families the idea of attending a junior college and decide that it is the best option. For some, money also ends up being problematic.

The 38 new students are a compilation of various academic backgrounds. Fourteen are transfer students. According to Donna Davis, vice president of admissions and enrollment, "These are students who attended another college for only one semester before coming to Maryville." Ten of the 38 are readmits who had previously been enrolled in school at MC. There are also five first time freshmen and seven special students beginning this spring.

Special students include those who are not on a degree track but include, for example, international students taking a few English courses.

RA continued from p. 1

There seem to be mixed sentiments about the RA position. Some of the RAs (mostly the veterans) are dissatisfied with the position. They feel that they are compromised by the position, and that there appears to be an overall lack of respect and support for the RAs on the MC campus. One RA claims that "lack of support from student development makes the job more difficult." This lack of support usually precedes the write up process. After the RA has completed the forms for an incident the responsibility shifts to Student Development and the DRB, and this RA feels that there is a breakdown somewhere in this process. Even though there is a breakdown in the process, no one seems to be able to pinpoint the where, or pinpoint the problems that they see in the system. Stephanie Wyatt says that this problem "prevents us from solving the problem." However, another RA says that the reason these problems are not pinpointed is because "student development is hard to work with, they don't cooperate with the RAs, and they are sometimes hostile." None of the other RAs expressed these sentiments, but it is rather shocking that Student Development would be perceived this way.

With all of these pressures and problems the RAs receive very little compensation for their troubles. They receive approximately a $122 monthly salary, and $600 in room credit. Stephanie Wyatt is trying to add a ten meal plan into the benefits, but she says that the RAs should not take the position for the money because "it's not a job, it's a leadership position." But some of the RAs complain about the great gap between the amount the RAs at MC receive and the amount the RAs at UT are given. In actuality, the RAs at UT receive less than the RAs at MC. They are given a 300 dollar monthly salary, and no room credit. Their work load is also more strenuous. They have larger dorms, and there are many more problems with the students that they have to deal with.

The RAs chief complaints seem to be about their friends and their residents. The RAs have been placed in a position of responsibility, and they feel discouraged when the very people that should be respecting them, are in actuality despising them because they are doing their job. Dave Forster says that he loves his job because "it makes me feel good to help people, to see freshmen mature and develop." They want people to respect them and come to them when they have problems. That is why they took the job. The RA is one of the essential people in the dorm, and if the students would utilize them, and give them the confidence and respect they deserve, then it would make residence life easier for the residence and the RAs.

as a member of the 175th Anniversary steering committee, liaison for the Affiliate Artists program, and a member of the board of directors.

Jones received a broad-based education at Texas A&M by majoring in business but also studying a lot of journalism and broadcasting. He intended to go into broadcasting but instead built a career in public relations. He is enthusiastic about his opportunity to work in the area of higher education and credits his ability to adapt to this job to his broad education and willingness to learn. Jones commented on the benefit of a liberal arts education by saying, "One of the strengths of getting a liberal arts education is that a lot of people study one thing and then do something different because their interests change. If you have the firm foundation and breadth of a good education from somewhere like Maryville College, you're pretty well equipped to almost go in whichever direction you want to."

Jones said that he felt much of the education that is needed for a job is learned on the job; that is the situation he feels that he is in right now.

Student Senate President Lance Klosterman said of Jones, "You can tell he's a very sincere man and I know he's going to work for the good of the college."

Voices Of Praise celebrates Black History month

by Amanda Martin
Arts Editor

In celebration of Black History month, the Voices of Praise Gospel Choir will present its annual concert on Sunday, Feb. 26, at 4 p.m. in the Music Hall of the Fine Arts Center.

The choir will be under the direction of Larry Ervin, director, advisor, and arranger for VOP, and Elias Smith, choral director. The group will perform some pieces from its tour and some from its new compact disc.

"We are hoping to involve brass and woodwinds to add to our repertoire of sounds," said Ervin.

Soloists will include Funmilayo Eke, Letitia Hall, Davy McCammon, Brandee Schaffer, Dwane Settlemire, and Aaron Stone.

"I feel especially blessed for the anointing the Lord has given the Voices of Praise," said Ervin, "and I pray his blessings will continue on our efforts."

Compact discs and cassettes of VOP will be available at the concert.

MC baseball players swing into action with high hopes for an excellent season

Baseball team preparing to throw out first pitch

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

It is that time of year again, as the baseball team prepares for their 1995 campaign. This year's team is not only large, with 44 players, but also returns almost all of last year's team that went 16-14.

Among these returning players are John Roszell and Ryan Rogers. They were both All-South performers last year. Roszell hit .351, while Rogers hit .319 as a freshmen catcher. Both were named Collegiate Baseball Players to watch.

Another player to watch is pitcher Scott Watson who is a senior this year. According to head baseball coach Eric Etchison, he is only six wins away from becoming the all-time win leader in Maryville College history.

Some new faces should also contribute. Two transfers that may help are Jason Stine from Ball State and Mike Maddox from Louisville. A few freshmen may also see some playing time early, including Scott Haddock, Jason Norris, Shane O'Brien, Bryan Penland, and Brent Wright.

"The key point to our season this year is going to be our pitching staff. We have a very strong and deep pitching staff. We have 12 full-time pitchers," said Etchison.

As far as this year's schedule and games that may prove to be key, Etchison had the following to say, "We need to play a more competitive schedule on the Division III level. This year we have picked up Methodist College (3/22) and North Carolina Wesleyan (3/23). North Carolina Wesleyan is ranked second in the country and Methodist is on the top 30. We need to have good record against them and have a good showing against the other teams to be considered for the tournament."

Etchison also mentioned that the overall schedule is a strong one.

During the past few weeks, the team has been preparing hard, and according to the coach it has been going well.

"I am very happy with the way things have been going. We have tried some different things this year. This included a live batting practice every practice to get the players ready for game situations," he said.

With the number of players that make up this year's team, Coach Etchison broke them up into Varsity and Junior Varsity teams.

This Junior Varsity team will play 11 games this season and will face some tough competition. Most of these 11 games will come against scholarship programs. Some of these games include a match-up with Tennessee Wesleyan, who is seventh in the country, and Carson Newman who is 10th in the country.

One goal for this year's squad mentioned by Etchison was to break the school record of 24 wins. If this were to happen, Coach Etchison said that his team would deserve some consideration for the tournament.

The team's first game will be Feb. 25 at Savannah College of A&D. They will play once that day and twice on Sunday against the same team.

Their first home game will be Feb. 28 against University of the South at 1 p.m.

Maryville also will hold the Foot-hills Classic from March 24th through the 26th. Teams competing will be Knoxville College, Earlham College, Oberlin College, as well as Maryville.

Softball team "excited" about start of season

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

Along with the baseball team, the Maryville College softball team has also been working hard preparing for the 1995 season. Head Coach Kandis Schram had this to say about the upcoming season,

"We are really excited about this season. We have 16 players this season, and compared to last year's and some other years past, that is a large squad."

Some players that will be looked at to provide leadership for this year's team include Sr. Misty Walker, who is a pitcher, Jr. Kasi Ault, and Jr. J.J. Hearon.

The lone senior on this year's team is Tobi Russell and she will also be counted on to solidify the infield from her short stop position.

Schram also stated that there was a strong freshman class that should contribute a great deal.

As far as strengths and weaknesses, the coach said that it was too early to tell. She did say that she was counting on a strong performance from her pitching staff which includes Walker, as well as Freshman Charity Merritt.

"Over the past few years batting had been a real weakness for us, but it looks like this year that it may be coming around. Brandi Wilson and Kelly Jannett should help this a lot," said Schram.

The hardest thing for the Lady Scots to face is their schedule. Maryville College is the only Division III fast pitch softball team in the state of Tennessee, and therefore the team is forced to play a lot of scholarship teams.

"This year we tried to get more non-scholarship teams on the schedule. One of these games will be against Hanover College on March 4 at home, and we will just see what happens against Division III schools," mentioned Schram.

Schram spoke very highly of her players. Julie Posey, according to Schram, will bring speed to the team from the left hand side of the plate, which should help the team. Kim Moss should also bring speed to the team Schram said.

The team will be participating in the Ferrum Tournament on April 1 upon returning from Spring Break, which should be a good test for them.

The Lady Scots will open up on the road with the baseball team at Savannah College of A&D on Feb. 25.

"We are really excited about traveling with the baseball team and looking forward to cheering each other on. It will be really nice to have some support there," said Schram.

The Lady Scots first home game is that match-up with Hanover College on March 4 at 1 p.m.

Downs recovering

The evening of Feb. 8, MC sophomore David Downs was injured while Lloyd Beach "skiing."

Downs was taken by ambulance to Blount Memorial Hospital, where he was airlifted to the University of Tennessee Hospital.

Downs is listed as in serious condition. He sustained multiple facial fractures, a leg fracture, and a severed artery in his leg.

It is uncertain when he will be released and if he will be able to return to MC this semester.

Please keep Dave and his family in your thoughts.

Lady Scots standing at 19 - 4

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

With only two games remaining in the regular season, the Maryville College Lady Scots are now standing firm with a 19-4 record and the number two ranking in the South Region.

The most recent game came on Feb. 9 in Emory, VA where the Lady Scots took on the Wasps of Emory & Henry.

This contest was decided in the first half as the Lady Scots raced out to a 44-22 half-time lead. In the second half it had the Lady Scots again dominating play as they stayed in control.

Emory & Henry did make a charge at the Lady Scots, but could not cut into the lead that the Lady Scots had built.

The lead was cut to under 20 for the first time in the second half when the Wasp's Angie Simpkins came up with a steal and found Rebecca Mumpower for a three-pointer. This cut the lead to 60-41 with 12:34 to go.

This was followed by two baskets by Jackie Greene and another three-pointer by Sallie Lefler. This made the score 65-48 with 9:54 and Maryville called a time-out.

The Wasps did stay within 15 for the rest of the game, but could not get any closer than 11 and that was not until only 47 seconds remained.

The final score was 85-71 as the Lady Scots earned their 19 win of the season as the Wasps fell one game under .500 at 10-11.

The prior week the Lady Scots made a weekend trip to Berea College in Berea, KY on Feb. 4 and then to Thomas More College in Crestview Hills, KY on Feb. 5.

The home team made it a clean sweep as they defeated Berea 64-53 and came out on top of Thomas More by the final 96-89.

In the Berea game Junior Jamie Parrott lead all scorers with 23 points. She also added 15 rebounds and three steals.

Jama Cameron also reached double figures with 12 points as the Lady Scots took a 36-26 half-time lead and made it stand up.

The following day at Thomas More the Scots were lead by Junior Lisa Cambell with 24 points and seven rebounds.

Cambell was just one of four players to reach double digits in scoring as Parrott added 20 points and nine rebounds, Freshman Christine Rajkowski had 12, and Junior Whitney Williamson added 11 points, as well as leading the team with nine assists. Cameron took care of the glass work as she pulled down 10 rebounds.

Thomas More was lead by S. Clinkenbeard with 28 points and Kay Connaughton with 20.

Coming before this string of three straight wins, the Lady Scots traveled to Roanoke, VA on Jan. 31 to face Roanoke College and close out the month of January.

The Lady Scots dropped this contest by the score of 72-66. At the time this made the teams record 16-4.

The Lady Scots will then finish up their regular season at home against Knoxville College beginning at 2 p.m.

Guys take 2 of 3, 5 remain

by Chris Stephens
Sports Editor

Since their thrilling double overtime victory on Jan. 28 against Ferrum College, 107-96 at home, the Maryville College Men's basketball team has won two out of their last three games.

Now standing at 15-5 with five games remaining, the Scots are coming off a 78-65 victory over Rust College from Holly Springs, MS on Feb. 11.

With 16:42 to go in the half and the Scots trailing, the bombs started landing as the home team hit their first four three pointers. The first was by Senior John Robinette, then Junior Sammy Williams hit one to make the score 9-5 Maryville before Robinette hit two more to make the score 19-15 with 9:54 remaining and the Scots on top.

Following a time-out by Maryville with 6:01 left, Williams took over for the Scots, hitting first a three pointer and then taking the feed from Scott McDaniel and converting a lay-up to make it 24-21 Scots with 4:45 to go.

This sparked a 24-7 run for the Scots to close the half and they would never look back after building a 43-28 half-time lead.

In this first half Robinette had 15 points, including 5 three pointers, as Williams added 10 points and two three pointers.

The second half was dominated by the Scots and especially Junior Jeremy Burgess and Sophomore Dee Bell. Each had 12 points in the half.

Bell came out and scored the first six points for the Scots, each coming on strong moves around the basket.

Then Burgess came up big with back to back three pointers from the same corner to make the score 59-44 with 11:04 to go.

Ben Virgus lead Rust in scoring with 22 points as Rust fell to Maryville by the final of 78-65.

Robinette and Bell each had 17 and Burgess and Williams each had 12 to lead the Scots.

In the two games prior to this one, the Scots earned a split as they defeated King College in Bristol, TN and then were defeated by Savannah College on Feb. 5 in Savannah, GA.

On Feb. 2 in defeating King College by the final of 87-82, the Scots ran their record to then, 14-4.

In the game Robinette lead the team with 24 points followed by Bell, Bryan Mills, and Williams who had 21, 11, and 10 respectively.

A few days later in Savannah the Scots suffered the defeat by the final of 72-50.

The Scots next game will be tomorrow against Tennessee Wesleyan in Athens, TN starting at 7:30 p.m.

Then, after a re-match with Rust College on Feb. 18 in Holly Springs, MS and a trip down to Tuscaloosa, AL on Feb. 20 to face Stillman College, the Scots will put the finishing touches on their regular season at home.

First will be a Feb. 23 game against Savannah College starting at 7:30 p.m. and then on Feb. 25 against Knoxville College for their final regular season game at 3 p.m.

Noe interns with Tennessee Legislature

Maryville College has many fine students, and one, in particular, who never seems to slow down. He roams the campus serving it in many capacities, while at the same time stimulating debate. He contributes to the community, while maintaining a high level of scholarship. He believes in reform, and at the same time honors tradition. So, who is he? He is Maryville College's very own Christopher Noe.

Where is the junior? Noe is currently representing Maryville College through his internship with the Tennessee Legislature. Of the 34 institutions, including universities and private colleges, across the state who are participating in the internship program, 25 are represented by 26 state interns. Noe has been assigned to the Senate Commerce, Labor and Agriculture committee.

Since the session has reassembled, Noe and other interns have been researching the Tennessee law books for specific legislation that deals with the bills that Senators want to sponsor. The interns then summarize and prepare packets for every committee member to review, and often these summaries are what is voted on and sent to General Assembly to possibly become law.

"I love government. I love how it works. It has several flaws as any system does, but I love being a part of it and learning where I can help reform and make changes," said Noe.

Qualifications for this highly competitive internship are a junior/senior standing in undergraduate school or a graduate level, a 3.20 GPA, an interest in government, and a broad range of knowledge. Noe attributes his selection as an intern to his Maryville College experience, "My liberal arts background has enabled me to deal with the many topics raised in researching and summarizing."

Noe's future plans include graduating MC with honors, earning a law degree, and serving the public in some capacity, maybe in litigation and perhaps in public office.

In his time at MC, Noe has served as Freshman and Sophomore class president, Chair of Judicial Committee and the Student Health Services Committee, as a student liaison to the Alumni Executive Board, the Inaugural Committee, and the Commuter Committees. He also co-founded and chaired the College Republicans and sponsored the founding of the College Democrats.

As a Bonner Scholar, he tutors adults at the Family Education Lab and contributes in other areas. "It [Bonner program] is an excellent program for this institution, and I would like to see other colleges catch on."

Noe has also been involved with Student Foundation and the International Club.

Last summer, the political science major was able to work with U.S. Congressman John J. Duncan, Jr. in Washington, where he learned how the federal level of government functions. He hopes to secure another congressional internship this summer, but first he has another agenda.

Noe plans to run for student body president. "I have very high goals for MC," said Noe. The candidate will be coming out with a comprehensive package as to what he would like to do specifically for this college. Noe emphasized, "I want to see it [MC] to continue to uphold its fine tradition of producing good leaders for communities and the world at large."

SPB gears up for spring climax

by Becky Lill
Staff Writer

Winter doldrums? Not at Maryville College if the Student Programming Board has its way.

Being in charge of all of the social activities here on campus is a tough job, but the SPB is on top of it. Recent meetings have resulted in the scheduling of traditional events such as Spring Fling, Mardi Gras, and Blister in the Sun, as well as a lot of new activities.

The annual Mardi Gras dance will be held in Lloyd lobby from 9-12 pm on March 3. Jai Richie, a Knoxville reggae band, will perform at the event. There is a drawing for a pinata near the end of the evening and refreshments and Mardi Gras beads available also.

Monday, March 6, is the deadline for the Blister in the Sun III T-Shirt Contest. Entrants may use black and two other colors in their designs. Entries, including two 8 1/2 x 11 copies, one black and white and one color, are to be put in Box 2098. Pocket designs are to be 3 1/2 x 5. A prize of two free shirts and $30 will be awarded to the artist of the chosen design.

There will be a Lip Sync Contest on March 15 in Lloyd lobby at 8 pm. First place prize is $50, Second place is $25, and Third place is $10. If you're interested in participating in the contest please contact Jennifer at x8774 or Mark at x8428.

Blister in the Sun III will be held on April 8, from approximately 12-6 p.m. This is a day-long event to help campus clubs and organizations raise money. Booths will be set up on the football field and Day of the Iguana and other local bands will provide entertainment. Students can picnic, sunbathe, play frisbee, and get a nice big dose of "campus-life" before finals.

The deadline for booth registration is March 17. Any club or organization interested can contact Stephanie at x8760 or Jeannine at x8775.

Spring Fling will be held at Royal Oaks Country Club on Saturday, May 6.

Applications for next year's Student Programming Board will be available sometime in April. Those students interested in planning the campus social calendar are encouraged to pick one up.

Since the Student Programming Board is funded by student money, the members are attempting to find activities that amenable to a wide range of students, but they can't do this without student input.

All students are invited and encouraged to attend the meetings and share their thoughts and ideas. Students are also welcome to speak with any of the representatives about their ideas.

Upcoming SPB Events

March:

3- Mardi Gras

15- Lip Sync Contest

April:

8- Blister in the Sun III

May:

6- Spring Fling

Do you have candid pictures of you and your friends that you want to see in the yearbook? If so please drop them in box 2351 by March 17. Pictures will be returned fall of '95. We reserve the right to decide what pictures are used.

February Meetings have international flair

by Kristin Kant
Staff Writer

Maryville College is rich in tradition, and evidence of such tradition is the February Meetings. Since 1877, these seminars have brought speakers from all over the world to campus. Topics have varied within the theme of promoting one's individual faith. As stated by Chaplain Stephen Nickle, the purpose of February Meetings is to "create a forum for people to think about faith in their life."

In the past, February Meetings have served as enlightening moments in students' lives. Records show that there have been tremendous numbers of conversions to Christianity during these meetings. However, such conversions have "not been a primary focus of February Meetings for some time," according to Nickle.

This year's February Meetings bring two speakers. Rev. Patricia Lloyd-Sidle, an MC graduate of 1970, is the Coordinator of the Global Awareness and Involvement Worldwide Ministries Division of the Presbyterian Church in Louisville, KY. Speaking along with her is Rev. Thomas John, a psychology professor and minister of the Church in South India. John just recently served as the General Secretary of the Student Christian Movement of India.

Sidle will be speaking about reverse mission, a new twist on the trend of ministry. Instead of following the historical way of ministering, reverse mission focuses ministry on the Western church, specifically the United States. Sidle's role in the Presbyterian Church is to bring people from various places in the world to the U.S. so that they can help us grow in our faith.

John is one such person who, by his reflections of the cultural challenges of modernization and the fast growing global community of which we all belong, hopes to help MC students and faculty reflect on their own faiths. John's areas of special interest are sociology, the effects of modernization and globalization, and the interaction of economics and Christian values.

According to Nickle, Sidle and John will describe the human predicament using illustrations from the Bible. They will also question how relationships within the global community and of God will redeem the predicament.

Speaking on this growing global community, Sidle and John will attempt to answer how individual denominations and churches can or do connect with each other and support each other in their common purpose. Furthermore, they will discuss the mission of such a global family.

In addition, John will share his experiences as a Christian in India. February Meetings will be held on Feb. 14-16, at 11:00 a.m. in the CCM. At 3:00 p.m. on Tuesday and Wednesday a coffee chat will be open for anyone who would like to visit with Sidle and John. Both will also be speaking at various classes.

February Meetings are funded by the Staley Foundation which supports evangelical speakers at various colleges.

In conjunction with February Meetings, the World Student Christian Federation will be celebrating its 100th anniversary with a reunion of members of the regional chapter on Feb. 15 in the CCM.

Gianaspero visits MC

by Amanda Martin
Arts Editor

The art exhibit in the Fine Arts Center for the month of February is "Recent Works: Mixed Media by Mark Gianaspero." Gianaspero gave a gallery talk Feb. 3 in which he discussed the portraits.

Gianaspero, an Ohio native who currently lives in Akron, became interested in art at the age of eight.

"I've always been interested in portraiture," said Gianaspero. "I've tried purposefully to steer away from traditional portrait painting."

Some non-traditional traits of Gianaspero's are the extreme closeups and realism. "They're not really flattering," he said.

Gianaspero recalled that his mother did not like the study for a portrait he drew of her entitled "Delores," so he abandoned the project in order to avoid "getting into trouble."

The purpose of the close-ups is to make the portraits "more confrontational," said Gianaspero. In traditional portraits, the person pictured is passive, but in these portraits the person in the picture is staring back at the viewer, he said.

Much of his time is spent thinking and planning as well as painting. "The thought process is very important," he said.

Community Forum examines deaf culture

by Christie Stalans
Staff Writer

The focus of Maryville College's Community Forum for the spring semester is sign language interpreting and understanding the deaf culture. Peggy Maher and Sheri Moran, both instructors of ASL, are the coordinators for this semester's community forum.

The invitation to attend Community Forum is extended to anyone interested. However, some instructors require their students to attend C.F. to receive credit for the class. The first of many programs started on Feb. 9. Kimberly Syphrette, a sign language major, had a very positive reaction to the topics being covered this semester, "I'm really excited about it because it gives me the opportunity to learn about the field I am studying and it also allows the Maryville community to experience and find out about another American culture."

The times, dates, and general information about the programs are as follows:

- Thursday, Feb. 23, 11 a.m., Fine Arts Center—"Sociolinguistics" by Dennis Cokely, PhD, of Sign Media Inc. and "The History of ASL Linguistic Research" by William Stokoe, PhD, of Linstok Press.

- Thursday, March 9, 11 a.m., FAC—"Deaf Culture. Hearing Culture. What?" Sheri T. Moran, an MC Instructor of American Sign Language.

- Thursday, March 16, 11 a.m., FAC—"Using Interpreters—Helpful Hints" Role Plays by Interpreting Majors, MC Staff and Faculty and Peggy Maher, MSSW, MS instructor of Sign Language Interpreting at MC.

- Thursday, April 6, 11 a.m., FAC—"History of the MC Sign Language/Interpreting Department" by a Panel of its creators.

- Thursday, April 20, 11 a.m., FAC—"The Life and Times of a Deaf Leader" Hubert Anderson, Jr. Executive Director of the West Virginia Commission for the Hearing Impaired, and Nancy Allen, Staff Interpreter at the Commission and 1994 MC Interpreting Graduate.

Upcoming Events . . . .

- Liza Chon will present a sophomore piano recital Thursday, Feb. 16, at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall. The program will include works by J. S. Bach and Chopin.
- Pianist Steven Ballard will give a guest recital Feb. 17 at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall.
- There will be a student recital Thursday Feb. 23 at 8 p.m. in the FAC Music Hall.

"Toodly doodly," Loy

by Kimberly Syphrett
Staff Writer

Marriott employee Loy Branch was diagnosed with Pulmonary Hypertension in the lungs on Feb. 6. Pulmonary Hypertension is a condition which impedes the flow of blood within the body. Oxygen and other essential products are unable to fulfill their functions because the blood actually coagulates within the vessels.

Loy reported, "When I went to the doctor on Monday, a friend who was with me noticed the blood wouldn't hardly come up through the needle. The arteries that lead to the lungs were so clogged."

Loy's condition is particular to her lungs. As a result, some of her symptoms are dizziness, faintness of breath, and light headedness. "Sometimes even my lips turn blue," Loy added. Loy recalled an occasion when she was walking: "My chest hurt and up in my throat. It felt like somebody was choking me more or less, like...blood clots in the vessels."

Her doctor at the UT Medical Center prescribed rest, 24 hour oxygen treatments, and blood thinning pills which must be taken daily. He also told her she'd have to quit her jobs. Loy worked two jobs which required her to keep a 7-day work schedule. "He just told me I couldn't work anymore. I couldn't work a notice or anything," she said.

Loy said, "I miss the people I work with, especially my kids. I had an opportunity to leave my station at the door years ago, but I like talking to the kids, especially the foreign kids." She continued, "When I left I gave everybody (staff) instructions: When they (the students) come in, holler 'Yodeee!' and when they leave, say 'Toodly Doodly!'"

Wyatt, VP for Student Development, retires

by Sarah Stevenson
and Dave Downs
Assistant Editor and
Campus Life Editor

Maryville College has seen many changes occur this year, including changes in its faculty and staff makeup. Recently another alteration in the staff listing was announced. At the end of this fiscal year, Dr. Sue Wyatt, vice president for student development, will be leaving to pursue another career. "I'm ready to move on to some new things in my life," Wyatt said.

"I've been involved in student development for 25 years now," she continued. "I really think it's important for people who do that to have a high level of energy." Wyatt went on to say that she doesn't think she's lost that yet, but she feels it's time to move on.

Wyatt is hoping to begin her own business here in Blount County. "It will be a business that will help retired folks with the services they need to stay at home as long as they can," she explained.

The name of her business will be Heritage Home Services. "There are a lot of folk who just need help managing their home in order to stay there," Wyatt said. She explained that she will serve as a contractor of sorts to help older people locate the services they need, such as maintenance, housekeeping, transportation, and yard care.

"It will start out with just me, but I hope that it will grow. All indications are that there's a real need for it," Wyatt said. "I'm excited about it."

Wyatt began her work in the field of student development during her senior year of college at the Shenendoah Conservatory of Music. "I really got into it because, at that time, it was not a student oriented profession in my view. I felt that it needed folks who really could

From the Staff, the Echo Editorial. . . Editorial

The federal government provides for $31 billion in financial aid to students.

But not for long, if the new Republican Congress has its way.

The plan is to cut $20 billion of that aid, leaving only $11 billion—starting with next years financial aid packets.

What does this mean to Maryville College students? This means that if Congress passes this rescission bill (probably in April, or later) any financial aid packets that have been put together by the Maryville financial aid office which include federal aid will have to be reworked—including those that have already been accepted. Students at Maryville College could lose financial aid.

As of fall semester, 85 percent of Maryville College students received some form of financial aid. Of that 85 percent, 79 percent received financial aid from the federal government. That means that 570 of us depend upon federal aid to attend Maryville. 570 of us out of 856.

Maryville College, as a whole, receives a total of $3,225,315 in Title IV federal aid.

If congress passes the rescission bill for the 1995 fiscal year, a number of federal programs will be eliminated or severely cut. Subsidized student loans will cease to exist. The SEOG program, from which Maryville College receives $100,000, would be eliminated. The $250,000 that Maryville College receives in SSIG would be lost, along with $60,000 from the Perkins loan program, and the federal work study program would be completely eliminated. The total loss that Maryville College is facing is approximately $490,000—and there are no replacement proposals being considered.

The good news is, of course, that Maryville College will experience a six percent tuition hike, and that could place even more students in a position to be dependent on the federal government for financial aid so that we can continue our academic careers at MC.

If the money isn't there, however, some of us may be put in very awkward positions. My great-grandmother used to say, "You can't squeeze blood from a turnip." If you can't get any more money from your parents, or from MC, or from bank loans, and the federal government has made it clear that education is not part of its primary agenda, then you may well be sunk.

The move to cut federal financial aid points to a much larger problem—government has ceased to serve the people. The federal government can spend billions on three new stealth bombers (which we don't really need), and it can provide pensions to politicians who decide that it is in the people's best interest for them to stay on capital hill for 40-plus years, but it cannot find it in the nation's interest to make education a priority.

What happened to the education presidents of yore? What happened to the philosophy that government serves the people and not itself? How long will it be before Congress votes itself another raise?

If tough cuts are what the Republicans want to make, then cut the pensions. Government should serve the people, and politics should not be a career. People should not "plan on going into politics," it should be a service that individuals are called into temporarily, we should not have politicians on capital hill, we should have statesmen—people who leave private ventures to serve their nation, and then return to said private ventures shortly thereafter.

Whether or not the politicians are allowed to make a career of politics is up to us. We are the individuals who elect them, and whether they pass term limits or not, we can—we can determine how long a congressman stays on the hill.

We can also do our best to determine what direction our country takes. We elect congressman to represent us on the federal level, but for them to represent us, they need to know what we think. If we want the federal government to continue supporting higher education, then it is up to us to write, call, and sign petitions saying so. We can only blame the government so much before we have to begin examining ourselves.

Before I begin I'd like to acknowledge my indebtedness to an article in the newsletter "Crossroads" by William Droel entitled, "Students, Be Unprincipled." This article argues that if we stand on our own principles, not only are we prideful, but the needs of the day are not accomplished: "Changing the real world is a complicated business. It calls for idealistic people who are secure enough to admit their faults and savvy enough to be unprincipled." This is not to say that one should not be guided by principles, but one should temper those principles with healthy action and a willingness to learn from and cooperate with others.

Now that I have discussed that basic argument, I'll turn my attention to another article I read recently in "Time" called, "Congressional Chain-Saw Massacre." It appears that one of the features of the Republican Party's "Contract With America" may—and I stress may—endanger some of the environmental laws such as, for example, the Safe Drinking Water Act. There is no direct attack on environmental laws, but there are fears that some of the principles of deregulation found in the "Contract" will make some laws null and void while interfering with future legislation.

Especially alarming to many people connected with such organizations as the Sierra Club and the EPA are three main proposals: unfunded mandates, risk assessment, and property rights. Unfunded mandates will weaken laws that the federal government does not fund; risk assessment calls for committees to determine the cost of certain mandates and which ones are more important. Finally, property rights means that if an environmental law interferes with a citizen's right to use his or her property in the way they want, the government should duly compensate the citizen.

I must admit that my initial reaction was one of disdain. I asked, "When will people get past how much money something costs and just do the right thing?" This comes from a principle of mine that the true wealth of nature is not what it can do for us, but what humans and nature can do for each other. I think it is commonsensical to take care of the place in which you live.

Let's look at the reactions of some of the people who are close to this debate. Brett Hulsey of the Sierra Club said, "These people want to turn our natural resources back to the robber barons." And in a way it seems that may be the case; the new chair for the House Committee on Resources, Don Young of Alaska, a supporter of the the Contract, wants to fight the "walls of red tape" the "protectionists" have built around our nations resources.

The fact is some of these environmental laws do have unexpected, less desirable consequences than predicted. Towns like Rutland, Vermont have to test for chemicals in the water that would probably have no way of being there. However, procedures like this can also detect other dangers like Cryptosporidium, a Protozoa responsible for more than 100 deaths since 1993. The "Time" article argues that the unfunded mandates bill may keep legislative action designed to prevent sickness from these kinds of dangers ineffective.

We must first of all admit two things: 1) these laws are not perfect, and 2) they have been beneficial. It is apparently necessary to seriously consider reform of some of the less desirable consequences of the many laws. This will take time and money in order to insure that the essence of the laws are not violated by the reforms. This is time and money that the Republicans should be willing to spend since they were already willing to spend money to hire expert panels for risk assessment. For their part, the environmental groups should be willing to have a meaningful dialogue with our legislators in order to enact real, fair reform.

The thing that really bothers me is the unbending attitudes of both sides. Those active for the environment, in some cases, seem to not want to work with Republicans as it seems in the comment by Hulsey. Likewise, I think the attitude of the new Congress can be summed up by Florida Rep. John Mica, a leading mouthpiece for risk assessment: "If they think I am prepared to compromise, they're in fantasy land." And these attitudes are exactly what the "Crossroads" article warns about. No one can be inflexible or nothing will get done. I'll leave you with a warning from the article in "Time": "If Congress and Clinton cannot compromise, the cause of environmental protection may be the main casualty."

What happened to the good old days, when lines such as "May the Force be with you," "I'll be back," "You can't handle the truth," and "Adrienne!" were in the movies? If ever there was a cold spell in the movie business, the month of February had to be it. As winter closes down for the year, spring awaits on the horizon, as good awaits to confront evil.

We don't mean to get all melodramatic on you; however life at the movies has been filled with death and darkness. If you ask us, we are tired of it! We want comedy, suspense, and a little bit of romance in our diet. Now don't get us wrong, there are still good movies out there,

Bo and Chris: maybe March will be a better month

but there are just not many of them!

Put away the ice pick and the sexy dresses. Sharon "Bad Girl" Stone is back, and she is looking better than ever. Her co-star is Gene "The only thing I will act in is westerns" Hackman ("Unforgiven"). "The Quick and The Dead" brings the old western back to life with a gun shooting tournament. However, the tournament trophy involves much more than money. It is kill or be killed, with no exceptions.

Chris: "Well it was not "Tombstone" or even "Young Guns," but it was good, and Stone was her usual sexy self. I myself like her with a gun more than an ice pick and think that she and Hackman make magic on the set."

Bo: "This movie was fun to watch, and Stone was outstanding. Although, I have some bad news to report about my partner. As the movie was reaching its critical climax, the movie, not Stone mind you, Chris leaned over and said 'Would it not be great if Doc Holiday and Wyatt Earp showed up?' The only thing I could do was hug him. I knew then that he had been affected by the most dreaded disease known to man. This disease is known as the 'Bo-Syndrome.' It's the belief that all movies are connected in the great scheme of life. I blame myself for his illness. Unfortunately there is not a cure. What a great life!"

The older he gets the better he gets. Sean Connery is an actor that every actor would like to become. That is, every actor would like to get better with age as Connery has. The new-suspense thriller, "Just Cause," stars Connery, Ed Harris, Lawrence Fishburne, and Kate Capshaw. This thriller tells a tale of a forced confession, in which Connery has to show 'just cause' that the man is innocent.

Bo: "The theater was lonely due to my partner's illness, as he was not able to attend. The movie was great.

The plot had Connery written all over it. His acting, combined with a Hannibal Lecter wanna-be, turned the movie into a "Silence of the Lambs II." However, the movie could not compare to its previews before the feature. The previews consisted of "Outbreak" coming in March, and the anxiously awaited "Batman Forever."

Our last movie stars Whoopie Goldberg, Drew Barrymore, and Mary-Louise Parker. "Boys on the Side" is a heart touching movie that brings three women together and allows them to form an unbreakable friendship.

Bo: "This was definitely a 'chick-movie,' please pardon the expression, ladies. I myself saw it with two ladies. However, they did not get too emotional. As for me, I was just glad Chris was unable to be there. This saved me some dignity, and allowed me not to hear the awful comments about how I view certain romantic movies. So anybody who needs a good laugh or a good cry, you should not mind spending two hours of your life in front of the movie screen watching "Boys on the Side."

To be honest with you all, we could not tell you what is next in the movie department. This is because a lot of old movies are being released due to the Academy Awards. We know that you have seen "Forrest Gump." So now, if you see it advertised anywhere, go see "The Shawshank Redemption." It is the first movie that we saw together and it has not yet been equaled. Anyway, we will have to surprise you in our next entry. Until then, we hope to see you at the movies or rental stores.

Greetings and Salutations,

February has been a big month for Senate, and I am pleased to say that there has been a large increase in the activity of groups as they come to senate for funds. The Feb. 23 meeting was packed, and there was much discussion on changes that are soon to be made at the college.

First, Sarah Stevenson reported on curricular review that she has been working on this year. If you are interested in finding out about the changes, I recommend talking to me or Sarah and she can relay your concerns to the curricular review committee.

Beth Nuchols, chair of the Safety Committee, headed up discussion on measures that will be taken concerning traffic on Lloyd Beach. Given the last accident, I think we need to take precautions to keep the beach a safe place.

A new Student Publications Committee is going to be formed. Josh Hogan will be chairing this committee composed of publications officers and other staff. Hopefully, this committee will aid in communication between the different publications and discuss how issues should be presented in the publications. Additionally, the committee will revise certain guidelines that pertain to student publications.

We had a number of resolutions passed last Thursday, starting with the Student Programming Board. SPB asked senate for $1650 to fund some additional features at Blister in the Sun III at no cost to the students. This proposal passed nearly unanimously. The Equestrian Team petitioned the senate for $218 for next semester, which also passed nearly unanimously. Finally, the Maryville College Republicans asked for money to fund a campus-wide Republican newsletter. Unfortunately, the Senate did not pass this proposal.

Once again, I have been working with the Metropolitan Drug Commission, and we have each submitted the action plans that each of our campuses use for drug prevention. Needless to say, our program is extremely different as compared to the others, in that the whole judicial system is run by students. We also have more effective programs for alcohol and drug prevention. I am thankful that students are given so much responsibility on this campus. Many friends who I have at other institutions are always surprised to find out how much say the students have in campus politics at Maryville College. If the students want something changed here, it is often simply a matter of working through it. At other institutions, that is not always the case.

Remember, elections are coming the middle of April. Talk to a senate member if you are interested.

Additionally, the next two Senate meetings are March 9 and March 30. Lance, x8711 box 2306

I don't know exactly what's going on, but I feel conspiracy brewing. I have had an enormous problem with a certain office on this campus. It seems that no matter how right I try to be, they accuse me of wrongdoing.

My first and foremost frustration comes from my problem with housing on campus. I have not had a very pleasant experience living here. The rooms are not uncomfortable and the food is decent, but I can't stand living somewhere where I am treated like a child. We are not children and the college is not a babysitter. I don't know why they refuse to let students who don't want to live on campus live elsewhere. I am old enough to die for my country, go to jail, and make judicial decisions on behalf of my fellow man (that's voting, for those who don't understand.), so why am I not allowed to live with whom-ever I choose to live with?

In the Maryville College Covenant, the forward says these words: "Our community has an obligation and responsibility involving relationships and mutual understanding, appreciation and respect." Is it not fair to say that the school should respect my wishes and let me be responsible for myself by moving away from campus? I would think that they would appreciate the fact that I want to grow on my own and not have to be watched over like a bad puppy who keeps peeing on the sofa.

Entitled this "Power and Responsibility" because I felt that I had it or that my parents had it, but I was proven wrong. We may believe that we have some sort of say so in the direction that our lives are going, but sooner or later we must be shot down. A prime example is my quest for independence. I attempted to be declared independent in the eyes of Maryville College, but was denied because, as I was told, "It would hurt your package" (meaning my financial aid). Is this not a decision for me to make? If I know that I can make it on my own, then don't deny me the chance to do it. Is that not what college is about? As said in the covenant "Maryville College is a community for learning that challenges students to grow in academic competence, personal and social maturity..." I know my advisors are reading this and saying "Look at your grades and you'll feel that you've grown academically." Well, the answer is, no. I find campus life a distraction and I don't feel exactly safe on campus. I want to get myself out of an element that I feel is detrimental to my performance in the classroom, and moving off campus is the solution for me.

I tried to go about it in a way that would not allow anyone to go running to some college official and say "Gevin lives off campus, and he's not 23!" In other words, I tried to do it legally. I don't appreciate the fact that the wishes of my own mother were denied by the college. They called her and she told them that she agreed with my decision one hundred percent and yet they still said no. So it's obvious that how I feel or how my parents feel means very little to certain officials of Maryville College.

Since I mentioned safety, I am angry with certain groups on this campus who treat students in an unfair manner. I have been ripped off twice while living in a dorm and nothing was ever written up or said about it, but the first time someone says I did something, I am written up, no questions asked. Some officers on this campus abuse their power. For example: Say you're living in Dorm Z and you love to listen to polka music (Yeah, I know, who listens to polka music?) and the Senior RA doesn't like polka music. Without consulting anyone else, he approaches you on behalf of the entire hall and the staff, and he asks you to refrain from listening to polka. You are a definite benefit to the staff, and they really need you. Do you believe it's fair to ask you to do something like this? Until O.J. is released, "Ladies and Gentlemen... There it is!"

Letter to the Editor...

Dear Editor,

In response to Chris Noc's recently published letter to the editor: There are other sides to the human body besides the ears and mouth. I today would like to make this point. Yet, rampantly quoting my favorite Republican leader du jour (and without proper citations, I might add), I am going to use that most ingenious device of human evolution, that organ which lies between my ears and has been well-educated and constructed to deal with the idiocy of mankind—my brain. Remember that? It's that matter which can form personal opinions and can control my ability to think for myself; yet, at the same time, I can think about others.

This letter is not so much about your opinions, or should I say quotations, regarding the NEA and PBS. But I challenge each and every one of the population of this campus to look back and think about life without memories of Big Bird—would that really have been a life? (As for Barney, I'll leave well enough alone.)

This letter is about a symptom of a hideous disease which plagues the ranks of mankind. No, not AIDS, not TB, not even the flesh-eating virus: this is the disease of ignorance and of close-mindedness. We have become a nation of plagiarists and quotsists. We no longer think about what we say, we only say what other people have thought about.

To the readers of this letter, I ask you to remember where you are. You are students at a college which is fundamentally designed to enhance your mental abilities and expand the most basic elements of your individual gnosis. I beg you as individuals to truly become that unique person that you are, among the billions on this planet. Now is the time in your life to take advantage of your youth and your avenues of choice; for in a few short years, maybe weeks, they will be frighteningly cut off to you.

I issue a challenge to each student on this campus today. Go forth and do one thing which has never been done before. Make it yours, and keep it forever in an open mind.

Robbie Patton

Letter to the Editor...

Dear Echo Editor and staff,

This past issue of the Echo (Feb. 14) was exceptional! Over the year, I have seen the paper grow. The staff has improved as have the editorial staff. There are many people on staff, which is wonderful and is the main strength of the paper. This past issue had interesting articles and eye-catching sections. I like especially the section with two pictures of parts of this college that are in disrepair. I hope you continue this section and I hope it will bring attention to some obvious blemishes on campus that some who work here for years have become accustomed to.

Congratulations on the large number of letters to the Editor! When students write, they are representing a student body that wants to share its opinions with others through print.

Kudos to a successful year! And the color photos are wonderful. Never in the past has the Echo reproduced such good pictures in color! Good job, Marcl!

The Highland Echo has improved wonderfully this year. The Echo is always shaped by its staff. This year's annual is a strong one, with some teeth and sharp eyes.

The legal age of adulthood is 18. An 18 year old can enter military service, fight in a war, and vote for the President and congressional officers. But, Maryville College housing policy prohibits students from residing off-campus until they are 23. Unless they live with their spouse, parents or legal guardians there is nothing, aside from lying, students can do to gain the privilege of "real-world" living.

MC stands to gain approximately $5,100 a year per student on room and board alone (not including cost of housing maintenance). The shame of it is that most students take out loans with or without the assistance
